One Serviceman Wants Garage Business and Little Farm After War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 23, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present for the RECORD a letter which I think is indicative of the thinking and post-war desires of a number of men now in service. It is typical of many, many letters I have received from them, both from abroad and from home—a hope that they may be aided in the purchase of a small farm to augment their earnings from other sources and a hope that they may be afforded a fair opportunity to participate in the purchase of the huge stores of Government-owned surpluses that will be disposed of. Many of these men have received specialized training in the use of some of the equipment which will be sold as surplus; naturally, they are interested in acquiring some of this equipment if they intend to follow the work in which they have become skilled.

Last September I introduced H. R. 3200. The bill would give honorably discharged servicemen a number of benefits to which they are surely entitled. Among these benefits is a provision that these servicemen shall be eligible for benefits under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act. This would give them the aid they seek in the purchase of farms. Also, it is provided that War bonds owned by servicemen and used in the purchase of farms will be increased 10 percent in redemption and maturity value. This feature has received enthusiastic endorsement from letters of comment from servicemen.

This bill also provides certain benefits to the servicemen in respect to the purchase of surplus war property. The 10-percent increase in value of War bonds also applies when these bonds are used for the purchase of surplus property. It stresses that a policy shall be adopted in the disposition of such property that will encourage and facilitate the establishment of small business enterprises by members of the armed forces.

Another bill which I have introduced, H. R. 4420, and which deals exclusively with the problem of disposition of surplus Government-owned property, also includes a provision for facilitating the acquisition of material and equipment for the establishment of business enterprises by veterans. Hearings on this bill are now being held before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

I believe that when so many expressions clearly indicate what a number of our servicemen wish to do upon cessation of hostilities or their discharge, it is our duty to make the realization of such plans and ambitions as free of obstacles as possible.

In the January 1944 issue of Click, I read the article entitled "No Bonus March After This War."

I have been in the Army 2½ years, and I am seriously thinking of making plans concerning a garage business for after the war. Also, I have been turning over in my mind the prospect of having a small farm in a suburban location which I could take care of in my spare time. Then, too, I have put all my savings into War bonds; so your 10-percent premium idea appeals to me.

I should greatly appreciate any further information you could let me have in regard to the establishment of a garage business, including the procurement of necessary tools, and of buying a suburban property. Also, could I have a copy of the bill which you propose?

Thanking you in advance for whatever you can do to enlighten me concerning the above request.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES L. MYERS, First Lieutenant.

The Instability of Money Views of a New York Bank Adviser, 1934–44

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 22, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, among the various plans being proposed for establishing a domestic and international monetary system, it is interesting to consider the present-day views of one of our leading economists, the former financial adviser to the Chase National Bank of New York City—with the statements made in his testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House in 1934. Much monetary experience has been had by the American people in the 10 years that have elapsed since Economist Benjamin Anderson advised the Congress as to the plan best to be followed to give this country a sound, workable, adequate monetary system—and the plan he proposes now. It is to be regretted that the economists of his school seem to have learned little or nothing from the disastrous and distressing financial experience sustained by the American people in following the monetary plans they advocate.

For the information of the Members of Congress and the people of these United States, there is inserted herewith Economist Anderson's present-day recommendation in an address to the New York State Chamber of Commerce, February 3, 1944, followed by reprinting his testimony before the House Banking and Currency Committee, February 15, 1934:

INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY GOLD VERSUS BANCOR OR UNITAS

(By Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, professor of economics at the University of California, Los Angeles; member, executive committee, Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy)

Mr. President, gentlemen, and friends of the chamber, I remember one thing with pleasure about the time when I became a member of this chamber. That was the sponsorship. I was at that time the economist of the old National Bank of Commerce. James S. Alexander, president of that institution, sponsored my membership here and A. Bartin Hepburn, of the Chase Bank, seconded the nomination. I feel proud today of that sponsorship in this chamber.

It was before I went to the Chase Bank—but, by the way, there was an inadvertence in your statement which I want to correct. I was with the Chase Bank from 1920 to 1939—19 years—before that 2 years with the Bank of Commerce.

I began this study of post-war foreign-exchange stabilization about the end of January 1919, and I want to tell you about the studies forced upon us in the year 1919–20, because they are tremendously significant as giving the basis for interpretation of the proposals of the Keynes and White plans.

We had a startling figure for exports from the United States in January 1919, with a balance of trade, I think, of $410,000,000. That trade balance ran up—it reached $635,000,000 in June. This great volume of goods going out reversed the business reaction that had started with November, the armistice, and turned business up about March into the beginning of a great boom.

What was doing it? Well, we were, for 4 months after the armistice, advancing money from the United States Treasury which was being used in pegging the foreign exchanges—precisely what these plans propose—francs and lire, but, above all, sterling.

And seeing the immense volume of exports and seeing the immense strength of those foreign exchanges, I looked into it rather carefully. I had as my tutor a man whom I shall always feel great affection for, Franz Meyer, the foreign-exchange trader of the old National Bank of Commerce—a very good trader, a man who knew foreign exchange, who got for me information from various of the other foreign-exchange men.

On March 20, 1919, J. P. Morgan & Co. suddenly unpegged sterling. They had been buying all the sterling offered, with dollars provided by the British Government, borrowed from the United States Treasury. They unpegged it.

I remember Franz Meyer that day coming into the officers' lunchroom of the Bank of Commerce, his face very grave. It was a stirring day in the foreign exchanges. And somebody expressed sympathy about the sterling picture. He said, "Yes; it is grave. It is serious, very serious."

But I didn't think Meyer was as unhappy as he seemed to be, and I ventured a question: "What is our position, Mr. Meyer?" And he answered, his face lighting up, "We are short." He had had no illusions.

Well, that afternoon—I am going to take a little time for this episode—I watched him. I think he had 10 telephones on his desk—maybe only 8.

"Yes, yes; I buy $4.26. Yes; I sell $4.29."

Then he looked at me and grinned. "I make $1,500."

He was a very good trader.

But the market was full of all kinds of disorder for a day or two until something like a level could be established. And he and other men, buying at $4.26 and selling at $4.29, were bringing order into it.

And don't let anyone tell you that the trader who makes a profit in a wild foreign-exchange market is doing anybody any harm. He is doing good. The bid and asked prices would have been very much further apart if he had not been there trading.

We spent billions of good American dollars in direct pegging of foreign exchanges. I say billions—let's get the figure rather exactly—something less than three billions altogether from the armistice down to June 30, in relevant Government advances, in pegging, and in supporting, after the pegging stopped, the foreign exchanges and the export trade on the basis of it.

Then I expected that the export trade would have to drop pretty soon. I thought those foreign exchanges could not stand the strain. The continent of Europe was going pretty badly to pieces -unbalanced budgets, printing more bank notes. I thought that the pressure on those exchanges would bring th thing to an end sooner than it did.

Foreign exchanges did go down, but here was the anomaly: Sterling went with the continental exchanges. And England was the one country over there, of the belligerents, who was improving her financial position—balancing her budget, working toward the resumption of gold payments. The thing was anomalous.

Then late in the autumn it began to be pretty clear what was happening. When our Treasury stopped, London stepped in. Britain interposed her immense credit, her immense financial prestige, between us and the weak Continent. They were buying goods here, giving us sterling, giving us dollar obligations, selling them on the Continent for francs, for lire, for drachmas. And then as we sold goods on the Continent for francs and lire and drachmas, we did not keep them. We sold them in London. London was the great center for all kinds of speculation. If you wanted to sell anything, you could sell it there.

But this time they got stuck. They bought all the drachmas, all the lire, all the Belgian francs, all the French francs, the depreciating exchanges that we created here through exports. And the strength of sterling had been bending, yielding, but sterling carried on that boom for another year.

Private creditors on this side, taking sterling, taking dollar obligations of England, giving also open account credits to the Continent, put up another three and a half billions.

Then we got fed up and our ability to give credit became restricted, and the thing crashed. We went through the great crash of 1920–21.

If we had had a reaction in 1918, when we were braced for it, it would not have done much harm. Everybody was braced for it. By 1920 a great many people had come to accept the idea of a permanently higher price level. A great volume of credit had been extended against commodities at high prices. Immense real estate speculation had taken place—great increase in farm debt for speculative purchase of farm lands. We were not in good shape for a reaction, but we went through it.

And meanwhile this six and a half billions we had given Europe—three billions from the Government and three and a half from private creditors—did no good. Europe was in far worse shape at the end of 1920 than she was at the beginning of 1919.

The point was that the finance minister of a European country, faced with pressure from his people—returning soldiers wanting pensions, wanting pay, people wanting food, pitiful, nobody willing to be taxed, nobody willing to buy bonds—he was taking the easy way, he was leaning on the state bank of issue, he was printing bank notes and more bank notes. And as long as the foreign exchange market would take the paper money which he created, his people could bring in food and luxuries from outside.

We sold them a lot of luxuries in 1920. We sold them everything but the raw materials they ought to have been using to work up and send back.

There was no industrial revival, there was no financial reform in Europe while this thing went on, while we gave an artificial support to foreign exchange.

Now, it is precisely this kind of thing that the Keynes-Morgenthau plan wants to do—to put the dollar behind the weak exchanges and support them, keep them pegged, so that goods may be sold, exports go out. We will have another boom—a very wild, unsound boom. We will get fed up after a while with pouring so many dollars into that great international machine that they propose. We will pull up and cut our losses, and have a crash.

This folly—our own Treasury, I think, has no financial recollection of this episode; Mr. Keynes has. And I want to read you a little passage from the Keynes plan which shows you that he has. The episode was pretty costly to England. She had stood in between us and the Continent.

The Keynes plan, section 14, says, as an argument for the plan:

"This would give everyone the great assistance of multilateral clearing, whereby (for example Great Britain could offset favorable balances arising out of her exports to Europe against unfavorable balances due to the United States or South America or elsewhere). How, indeed, can any country hope to start up trade with Europe during the relief and reconstruction period on any other terms?"

Very nice.

If we had had the Keynes-Morgenthau plan in operation in 1919, England could have bought goods here, sold them at a profit on the Continent, paid for them by putting francs, lire, drachmas into the international exchange fund, while we got credits in that fund, and England, by remaining not debtor to the fund, would have had her profits free and clear, and we would have had big credits in an international fund composed of deteriorating drachmas, lire, francs, and so on.

I don't propose to advocate that measure.

Now, I take it that there is general knowledge of the nature of these plans, and there is not time for me to explain the technical details of them. The big thing that they propose is to put the strength of the strong currencies behind the weak currencies to peg the exchanges. And we did it, we tried it—it was no good. We must not do it again. We wasted six and a half billion dollars doing it the last time.

Now, what is the right way to do this thing?

First: The thing we did last time—gifts for the weakest countries, Red Cross or the kind of thing that Governor Lehman is expected to do—but gifts, not loans. Don't call it loans. Don't expect to get the money back. Wipe it off. Limit it to what is essential. Most of it ought to stop after the first harvest after the war.

And even as you make those gifts, make demands upon the governments of the countries that receive them that they get their financial houses in order. Gifts, as well as loans, should do the recipient permanent good.

But, second: Stabilization loans—tens of millions to two or three hundred millions at the maximum, not the billions proposed by these plans—conditioned on drastic internal financial and currency reforms, conditioned on foreign supervision of the use of the proceeds of the loans.

SOME HISTORICAL PRECEDENTS

Now, here we have historical precedents of a very definite sort. We did that for Austria in 1923. We straightened Austria out. We gave her a good start and the Austrians began to pull up from there.

We did it for Hungary in 1924 and we sent Mr. Jeremiah Smith, of Boston, over to sit on the lid, to countersign checks, to see that the money was used properly.

We did it for Germany in 1924 under the Dawes plan—$200,000,000. That was the biggest of these stabilization loans. There was foreign supervision both of the Reichsbank and of certain of the revenues. Germany started right up into a dramatic industrial revival.

We did it for Poland in 1927—$72,000,000, as I remember. The loan would have been a little bigger if I had not been critical. I did not want to make any more foreign loans at that time, but for some reason the Bank of England was said to have wanted my approval of it, and I carefully examined the figures. I was not satisfied with the figures on the floating debt of Poland and insisted on more information. I finally concluded that they were borrowing too much to use in buying silver for coinage. They had been so sick—their people—of a very inferior, shoddy silver coin that they wanted to give them a very fine silver coin. I persuaded them that the standard of the Swiss franc was good enough, and then took that difference off the face of the loan before I gave my approval.

Well, we put the Honorable CHARLES S. DEWEY, who was in the United States Treasury, over there in Poland to supervise that loan, to countersign checks, to see that it was properly used. It worked; stabilization of currency, balanced budget, it straightened out.

I want to put in parentheses here that I spent Monday night with Mr. DEWEY who is now Congressman from Illinois working from about 6:30 to 1:30, going over a bill that he has since introduced, a copy of which I have, designed to provide a way whereby our Government can cooperate with other European governments or can cooperate with investment bankers in this country, or other countries for that matter, and go in on joint account up to 50 percent of credits.

That is a very modest sort of thing as compared with that $10,000,000,000 bank Mr. Morgenthau wants to establish for investment purposes.

DEWEY'S bill calls for half a billion as a revolving fund. And as it is going to be used on joint account up to only 50 percent, another half billion would be called for from the other participants in the credits. But you don't need more for these stabilization loans, if you see to it that they accomplish their purpose.

I won't go into the details of this bill, Mr. President, but I will say that I endorse this bill. And I am going to venture this request, that you refer it to an appropriate committee of this Chamber for study.

Let me describe the bill for the RECORD. It is House Joint Resolution No. 226, to provide for central reconstruction fund and so on, introduced by Mr. DEWEY February 1, 1944, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That German loan of $200,000,000 looks very small today, but it was amazingly effective. Germany got no benefit from it directly. The German budget was not relieved by it. The German Government could not spend it for domestic purposes. The German Government got $200,000,000 of gold which it put into the Reichsbank as a gold reserve. Then the German Government got from the Reichsbank, in exchange 800,000,000 in marks. But it was obliged to use all of that 800,000,000 in marks in buying goods in Germany for delivery in kind on reparations account: coal and other things. And it was obliged, moreover, to find, that year, 200 millions more, so that none of the proceeds of the loan could be used for internal affairs.

If there had been no reparations problem and if Germany had been able to use, under the supervision of the creditors, that 800,000,000 marks in putting working capital into the industries and perhaps some measures of relief, the thing would have been far easier.

But just the stabilization of currency got them back to a sound gold currency forthwith. They had been through a welter of inflation—money sinking, sinking; everybody losing confidence and hope. Just the sound currency and the balanced budget, themselves, were business-energizing factors. Business started right up, production started right up, full employment came about.

They were pretty helpless when that thing started. There was a desperate shortage of working capital. That shortage of working capital with other complications led to a sharp reaction in the winter of 1925–26; but there was prompt recovery. The thing went on strongly until 1929—early 1929. Then troubles began to come.

Germany would not have had these troubles, Germany would have pulled through and the stabilization would have lasted, had it not been for the complication of reparations.

Now, Germany is a special case after this war, of course. Investment bankers to whom I have talked say, "No; we won't sponsor any German bonds. We are not probably going to sponsor any Italian bonds. But bonds for Denmark, bonds for Norway, bonds for France, bonds for England—yes, we can do that, under the proper conditions."

Now, these conditions, to my mind, involve definite agreements about stabilization of currency on a gold basis.

NEEDED LEGISLATIVE ACTION

There is going to be need for some legislative changes in this country before our investment market can work right, either at home or abroad. We must repeal the Johnson Act, of course, before we can lend to foreign governments.

We ought to change one of these very humiliating provisions of the Securities Act, requiring a foreign government, in the prospectus which it signs, to confess repudiation. The bankers sponsoring such a loan ought to put that fact into the record, of course, but it is a little humiliating to ask a foreign government to submit to the Securities and Exchange Commission a statement like that and perhaps to have to revise it six or seven times to fit the wishes of the Securities and Exchange Commission. There is need for the legislation to be changed with respect to that as a matter of international good feeling.

But for either foreign or domestic freedom of American capital, in either foreign or domestic use, I think we have got to go further.

New capital for domestic purposes through the securities market is very difficult to get—there are tremendous hurdles. Since the securities and exchange legislation has been in existence, we once got up about 50 percent of new issues, as compared with 1923, in a part of 1936 and 1937, but most of the time it has been under 19 percent of 1923. I don't make the comparison with the boom years and the wild years of 1924 to 1929.

I recommend the abolition of the Securities and Exchange Commission. I recommend the substitution for that of a securities and exchange division of the Department of Justice, which shall not work in detail with every transaction, but which shall punish, under criminal law, violations of the securities and exchange legislation—certain criminal law.

There is no more reason for the detailed regulations of the securities and exchange business than any other legitimate business.

I recommend that there be created in the Department of Commerce a purely ministerial body to receive registration statements and prospectuses, so that there may be a responsible document, on the basis of which a man may be sued if he has misrepresented or omitted essential facts, on the basis of which a man may be put in prison if he has done the wrong thing, made the wrong statements.

We have got to do that or something like that to get our securities market free for either foreign or domestic post-war purposes.

Now, one thing that I would emphasize in connection with the measure of Mr. CHARLES DEWEY is that the board is a purely American board. The Keynes-Morgenthau plans and Mr. Morgenthau's investment bank—both have an international board in control. All three have an international board in control.

A bank, a majority of whose board of directors is made up of debtors to the bank who want to borrow more money, is not a safe bank. That feature alone of these three plans would damage any sound plan, I think. The lenders should control, not the borrowers, in a financial institution.

Both of these plans, the Keynes plan and the Morgenthau plan, propose to monetize the bad debts which England owes to the outside world. England, following Mr. Keynes, allowed sterling to get into a very perilous state. It ceased to be gold. It became paper—fluctuating paper, with not even a promise to be redeemed. The irredeemable paper was treated as a thing-in-itself.

Parts of the world followed England in that—in the belief that you can do that. But sterling got to a very perilous state. And the war broke out. Everybody wanted to get rid of it; they blocked it. You cannot even sell it now. It is blocked.

The balances are very great and they are growing. In the middle of August, the London Economist set them at over a billion pounds—around $4,000,000,000 at the official rate of sterling. But added to that, the part to India is increasing alone at the rate of 300 million pounds a year.

Well, if after the war England tries to restore a free pound, lets people sell their claims on London in the open market for what they will bring, sterling will go very low.

And so the Keynes plan proposed a sleight of hand by which all this blocked debt would be put into the international fund, and the Morgenthau plan worked out details. It is to be put in there for 23 years and no payments made for 3 years, and after that 2 percent a year for 20 years.

Meanwhile England's creditors would have credit with this fund for cash, bancor in the case of the Keynes fund. We are not sure in the case of the Morgenthau fund, because we are not sure if that institution will have deposits or not. They don't say anything about their liabilities.

Well, that is no way to help England.

The Federal Reserve Bank of the World ought not to take debts that people cannot pay into its portfolio and hold them for 23 years and create money against them. That is pretty bad.

We must help England, yes, but the way for England to help herself is to make a settlement with each of these countries that they owe separately—the most of them in the British Empire, the biggest part—and then come to us for four or five hundred millions which they will use in making payments to them, giving them some cash and some long credit—work things out as an embarrassed debtor usually does with his creditors. We will help with some cash and she will get that cash on much better terms here, at a much lower rate of interest, if she will definitely go back to gold—fixed gold sterling. I think she has got to do that anyhow in her own interest.

We cannot afford to stay with Mr. Keynes any longer.

GOLD REMAINS THE STANDARD OF VALUE

Gold remains the international standard of value, despite the efforts of governments to substitute irredeemable paper for it, because in the last analysis neither men nor governments will trust anything else. The Tripartite Agreement, involving the United States, Great Britain, and France, which immediately preceded the collapse of the gold bloc in late 1936, did not substitute paper dollars or paper pounds or paper francs for gold. The governments did not trust one another enough for that. If in the course of the day's trading in the foreign exchange market, any government accumulated a sizeable amount of another government's currency, the differences were promptly settled in gold.

GOLD AND PAPER MONEY

Gold needs no endorsement. It can be tested with scales and with acids. The recipient of gold does not have to trust the government stamp upon it, if he does not trust the government that stamped it. No act of faith is called for when gold is used in payments, and no compulsion is required.

Men everywhere, governments everywhere, and central banks everywhere are glad to get it. When paper is offered instead of gold, it will be accepted on faith if the government or the bank which has issued the paper has proved itself worthy of confidence by a satisfactory record of redeeming the paper in gold on demand. If there is a suspension of gold payments, the paper will still be taken on faith, at varying degrees of discount, so long as there remains a general expectation that the government or the issuing bank will some day make good its promise. The amount of the discount will vary in a free gold market or in a free foreign exchange market with the circumstances that make it more or less probable that the government or the issuing bank will make good its promise, and with the circumstances that govern the probable time of the redemption.

IRREDEEMABLE PAPER AS AN INDEPENDENT STANDARD

Governments and loyal peoples have often been quite unwilling to look upon their irredeemable paper money as merely dishonored promissory notes. Always in times of currency disorders there arises the doctrine that "a pound's a pound" and not merely a promise to pay gold coin of fixed weight and fineness. There is believed to be some magic in governmental authority that can make something out of nothing. The prestige of a long-established and powerful government is very great. The habits of the people in accepting the long-established currency tend to sustain its value. The legal tender quality of paper money aids in holding it up, since creditors must take it in payment of old debts, even though they may try to avoid having to take it when new debts are created. When a currency which has had world-wide prestige as long as the pound sterling has, starts on a downward ccurse, it is difficult for the world to believe that the worst is going to happen, and at various stages in its depreciation it has foreign support as well as domestic support.

Thus we saw the unanchored paper pound, 1931–39, treated by British policy as "a thing in itself" and no longer a promise to pay gold, still accepted, though with growing distrust, by central banks of the Scandinavian and Baltic countries as a substitute in part for their own gold reserves. The financial prestige of Britain was very great. Value is a psychological phenomenon. But there are rational elements in the psychology of value, and hope too long deferred and too often disappointed will destroy value.

GOVERNMENTAL COERCION AND THE VALUE OF MONEY

Yet another factor can be invoked by governments to sustain the value of irredeemable paper money, and that is the power of the government over the economic lives of men. In the period of the French Assignats, the laws fixed penalties of the severest kind against transactions which recognized the depreciation of the paper. But despite the penalties, the French paper money dropped steadily in value and commodity prices soared. The Federal Congress in 1864, blaming the depreciation of the greenback on the manipulation of speculators in the gold market, passed an act forbidding gold futures. The results were disastrous and the Congress, without debate, repealed the law 2 weeks later.

It was prevailing doctrine among economists down to the First World War that governments could not coerce their peoples into accepting at face value a dishonored paper money. But war brought an immense revival and intensification of governmental power, and new governmental techniques for intruding intimately into the bookkeeping of the people. In Germany this power was intensified under the Hitler regime and these techniques were elaborated, and we have had the spectacle in Hitler's Germany of a paper currency, with a microscopic gold reserve and without gold redemption, circulating against commodities at fixed prices for the commodities or, at all events, at controlled prices. As faith waned, Germany substituted coercion, and as the Government was virtually omnipotent, and the people dared not assert their individual rights, and as the Gestapo was tremendously efficient, Germany made the system work.

COERCION AND FOREIGN-EXCHANGE RATES

Always the doctrine had been, moreover, that even though a dishonored paper currency might be accepted at home, nothing could prevent it from depreciating in the foreign exchanges, because the people would smuggle it out of the country and sell it for what it would bring to get good money. But we saw develop in Germany a system of control of the export and import of currency, as well as securities and commodities, so tremendously effective that very little German currency could get outside and that when it got outside, the foreign banks had little motive for buying it because they could not get it back into Germany again to use it. We saw rigorous control of all exchange transactions, and such a limitation in the volume of these transactions that the German Government and the Reichsbank could make the so-called official rate effective on the limited volume of transactions permitted, and the "official mark" in the foreign exchanges held firm at the nominal parity. Meanwhile a great multitude of different kinds of marks, valid for special purposes, sold at varying rates of discount in the foreign-exchange markets, but even these were regulated and controlled.

THE TYRANNY OF HITLER AND THE TYRANNY OF GOLD

The temporary success of the German monetary and economic experiment led to the superficial generalization on the part of certain opponents of the gold standard that gold had been proved to be unnecessary, that Hitler had found a way to do without gold, and that the long tyranny of gold was over. Parenthetically, I much prefer the tyranny of gold to the tyranny of Hitler. Gold is not capricious.

All it requires of men and governments and central banks is that they be honest, that they keep their promises, that they keep their demand liabilities safely within the limit of their quick assets, and that they create debts only when they can see how these debts can be paid. Gold has no intuitions, and gold has very little imagination.

In summary on this point: (1) Men, governments, and central banks will accept gold in payments because they want it for itself. (2) Men will take paper promises to pay gold as money without difficulty so long as these promises are kept and they believe that they will be kept. (3) When paper promises to pay gold are dishonored men will continue to take them at varying degrees of discount in the hope that the promise will later be kept, and because of the prestige of the issuing authorities, fortified by the legal tender peculiarities of money and by the habits of the people and of the world with respect to a long established currency. And finally, (4) when these fail, if your government is powerful enough and tyrannous enough, and your people are sufficiently submissive, and you extend the government into the details of the daily transactions of the people, you can make a dishonored paper circulate at controlled prices inside your country, and you can keep it out of the foreign exchange market. If foreigners happen to have deposits in your banks which they want to sell in the world's markets outside, you simply refuse to allow them to transfer these balances on the books of the bank, or you limit the uses to which they can put them in your own discretion.

THE LIMITS OF COERCION

The post-war world will witness, I have no doubt, the complete collapse of the Hitlerian monetary system. I venture the confident prediction that the forces of coercion which have been sustaining the value of the German mark will soon be sensibly abated, and that the controls which have upheld the mark in the foreign exchanges will work with diminished effectiveness.

And the British experiment of a pound anchored to gold, treated as a "thing in itself," can give us a very tragic picture. The prestige of that pound in the international markets is badly shattered. Foreigners who had entrusted their funds to London found them promptly blocked when the war came. The pound has ceased to be a serviceable tool in trade between Britain and other countries, and has almost entirely ceased to be a tool for conducting trade between two outside countries—which used to be one of its most important services. It has in general ceased to be a valid tool for trade among the units of the British Empire. In general it prevails only in the mother country itself. England has gigantic blocked debts to the outside world due on demand, but she does not allow her creditors even to sell their credit claims for what they can get.

But men and governments are still eager enough for gold. Gold is being currently used on British Government account to pull down the great discount on the rupee in India and to bring out hoarded food reserves in India. Gold is being used in Persia which is glad to get gold but reluctant to take sterling.

GOLD AS THE POST-WAR INTERNATIONAL CURRENCY

Now what is the outlook for an international currency in the post-war world? Men, governments, and central banks all over the world will take gold without question whenever they can get it. Most of the paper currencies of the world they will not take except at heavy discount and in limited amounts, and they will seek to hedge them if they can, and they will seek to pass them on quickly if they can when they take them. The American dollar they will readily take because of our practice of exporting gold when the dollars goes to the "lower gold point" in the foreign exchange markets. What else is there but gold to serve as an international currency? I think there is nothing else.

THE KEYNES AND WHITE PLANS REST ON COERCION

But this is not the view of the British Treasury represented by Lord Keynes, nor the United States Treasury represented by Mr. Morgenthau and Mr. White. Lord Keynes proposes an international currency not redeemable in gold, not based on gold, nominally fixed in relation to gold "but not unalterably." He calls it "bancor," apparently a compound of the two words "banco" and the French word for gold, "or." But it is not even gilded, much less gold. The international money is to be credit entries on the books of the international fund and overdraft privileges with that international fund. The assets of the fund are zero when the fund starts and its liabilities are zero, but as transactions multiply and the fund does business, its balance sheet swells on both sides, its liabilities being deposits in bancor and its assets consisting either of overdrafts in bancor or of a multitude of national currencies—dollars, pounds, francs, drachmas—and in time, presumably, German marks. Its purpose is to hold the different exchange rates together, to put the strength of the stronger exchanges behind the weaker ones. It would increasingly lose dollars and other strong currencies and increasingly acquire weak currencies or the bancor obligations of the central banks or exchange stabilization funds of the weaker countries. Its assets would progressively deteriorate. Indeed both Keynes and White plans contemplate this. They contemplate reductions in the exchange rates of the weaker countries, and in the nominal gold equivalent of the bancor or unitas.

Now, on what substance can the value of bancor rest? On gold? No. The Keynes plan has some ingenious devices to prevent situations in which bancor could be shown to be at a discount in terms of gold, which, however, could break down readily, even with good faith on the part of all the participants in the fund, which would certainly break down if important countries remained outside the fund, and which would break down in the event of any failure of any country to comply with the requirements of the fund. But it does not rest on gold. The bancor is explicitly never to be redeemed in gold nor in anything else. On what, then, will it rest? On faith? On prestige? Maybe we can create a prestige for an international fund whose assets consist of the dishonored promises of governments and central banks which have lost their prestige. It is possible that the prestige of the United States would be so great that for a time we alone could carry the burden of sustaining the bancor, but I doubt that our generosity is sufficient for this, and I question that we dare risk our strength, already strained by our war finance, in so great and so needless a post-war task.

But neither the Keynes plan nor the Morgenthau plan proposes to rely upon faith alone. Both propose a great deal of coercion. Governments are to coerce their peoples in preventing the international movement of capital funds, which means, as Keynes himself recognizes, the control of all foreign exchange transactions. Now, here, I think, we find real difficulty. Who shall coerce the coercers?

Who shall force the Government of the United States, or the Government of Russia, or the Government of Britain, or the Government of Argentina to comply with the mandates of the governing board of the international fund? The provisions of the White-Morgenthau plan make it very explicitly their duty to do so, and section VII, 8, of the July 10 version of the White plan makes it the obligation of every member country of the fund "to adopt appropriate legislation or decrees to carry out its undertakings to the fund," and those undertakings are numerous and drastic. For either the Keynes plan or the Morgenthau-White plan to work, would require a world state with an authority over economic transactions as great as the authority which any national state has effectively asserted in peacetime.

Is it realism to suppose that the whole world can hang together in the support of bancor or unitas when the British Empire can't hang together in support of sterling within the British Empire?

The Keynes plan, moreover, definitely suggests international control of commodities and an international ever-normal granary, and an international control of investment. It sees the clearing union as facilitating these purposes as well as foreign-exchange stabilization. The document states, "We have here a genuine organ of truly international government." The White plan is not so frank, but there is much sympathy for these ideas in important Washington circles.

WAS THE OLD GOLD STANDARD A STERLING STANDARD?

There is a myth widely current which I wish to challenge. It is that, prior to 1914, the world was on the sterling standard rather than the gold standard; that London controlled the gold standard; and that it was only superhuman wisdom in London which made it work. The doctrine adds that when New York became the center after 1918 the gold standard failed because New York lacked London's wisdom. Now, the fact is that prewar London had far less control and responsibility prior to 1914 than New York did after 1918, and that policy played a much smaller role in the earlier period. There were many gold-standard money markets competing with London for gold prior to 1914, several of them very powerful, as New York, Berlin, and Paris, and many others of real influence, as Amsterdam, Vienna, Switzerland, the Scandinavian countries, and Japan. These all steadied one another. All would pull gold away from any country that was overexpanding credit and force it to pull up. It was not policy. As Mr. Woodward, of the Central Hanover, said to me one time, "it was nature." International cooperation came only in crises—and then at stiff rates of interest. Now New York lacked this steadying influence from 1918 down to 1925, and did not get adequate competition for gold till France got into the game—in an overdrastic way—in 1928. New York used policy in the 1920's—bad policy. But I must add that Benjamin Strong learned this bad policy from Montagu Norman. Both we and London overexpanded credit in the 1920's, but we had the semblance of an excuse in our overabundant gold, while London had no excuse at all.

I want to see a real gold-standard world again, with several powerful money centers competing for gold and holding one another in check. I don't want international monetary cooperation in ordinary times. It prolongs unsound tendencies, as in 1924–29, and then it breaks down in crises, as in 1931. I want competition in ordinary times, and cooperation only in crises—at a stiff rate of interest.

I have been too close to the centers of wisdom and power in governments and central banks to have any belief at all in the adequacy of their wisdom to do more than routine things. The more I see of governmental economic policy the more I trust the automatic forces of free markets. The more I see of public monetary policy the more I trust gold.

TO ESTABLISH THE FEDERAL MONETARY AUTHORITY

(Thursday, February 15, 1934, House of Representatives, subcommittee of Committee on Banking and Currency, Washington, D. C.)

The subcommittee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, Hon. T. Alan Goldsborough presiding.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The committee will come to order.

Our witness this morning is Dr. Anderson of the Chase National Bank. Will you please come forward, Dr. Anderson, and give your full name and your connection to the reporter?

STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN M. ANDERSON, JR., ECONOMIST OF THE CHASE NATIONAL BANK, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. ANDERSON. My name is Benjamin M. Anderson, Jr., and I am economist of the Chase National Bank of New York City.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. How long have you been economist for the Chase?

Mr. ANDERSON. Since 1920.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And prior to that time?

Mr. ANDERSON. The first part of my work in life was a teacher.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You were in Texas, weren't you?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I was born in Missouri and did my first teaching in Missouri colleges.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In what subjects?

Mr. ANDERSON. Economics and history. Then I was instructor and assistant professor of economics in Columbia University, New York, from 1911 to 1913; then assistant professor of economics at Harvard from 1913 to 1918, teaching money and banking, among other subjects. Then I was economic adviser of the National Bank of Commerce in New York from 1918 to 1920, and then with the Chase National Bank.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Dr. Anderson, your time is your own, and if you will proceed in your own way, the committee will want to ask you some questions, I am sure. You are familiar with the bill we are considering.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have the bill before me, and I have gone over it. I have a statement which I would like to read. This is a brief statement which I want to amplify later.

Permit me first to suggest to your committee the inadvisability of any further radical change in the currency laws of the United States at the present time. The tentative stabilization of the gold content of the American dollar as a result of the President's recent action has already brought a very definite and very heartening revival of financial and business confidence, manifest especially in the bond market, manifest also in the return flow of American funds which had gone to foreign lands, and in a considerable volume of foreign money coming to the United States for investment not only in our stocks but also in our bonds. The process of the readjustment in the foreign exchanges to the new gold value of the dollar—a very violent and disturbed process in the beginning—has made very substantial headway, and the fluctuations have become very much more moderate. To inject new elements of uncertainty as to the gold value of the dollar into the financial situation at the present time by new currency legislation would be an exceedingly unfortunate thing.

The revival of economic activity and the reemployment of millions of men must be the work primarily of private enterprise. Wise governmental policy can help it. Unwise governmental policy can terribly retard it or prevent it. But the main work must be done by private enterprise seeking profit and having confidence enough in the financial foundation of it all to be willing to take normal risks. If the business and financial community are to find important changes in the basis on which they make their calculations at short intervals as they read the news from Washington, their ability to make intelligent plans is greatly lessened, their ability to persuade one another to join in these plans is greatly lessened, their courage is undermined, and their activities are retarded or reduced.

With respect to the currency in particular, it would surely seem that enough has already been done.

Now, I do not agree with you in your plan, but you invite me here knowing that and you want my frank opinions and here they are.

With respect to the specific bill in hand, H. R. 7157, I find only one provision that I can commend, and even there I must make a qualification. This is the repeal of title III of the act of May 12, 1933, which I understand to be the Thomas amendment to the agricultural bill of last year. I should gladly see that amendment repealed, but I should wish to save the final paragraph, which gives the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the President, authority to increase the reserve requirements of member banks against their time or demand deposits. This is a provision which was put in to make a barrier against an uncontrollable expansion of credit in case that should develop. It may or may not be an effective barrier, but it should be retained. The repeal of the rest of the Thomas amendment I should like to see. But I take it that the purpose of this bill is not to repeal the Thomas amendment, but rather to substitute something stronger, of a similar character, for it.

Moreover, the Thomas amendment sets a lower limit for possible debasement of the gold content of the dollar, which H. R. 7157 omits.

In testimony before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency in connection with the gold bill of 1934, recently passed, I expressed the following opinions: (1) That control over the credit situation should remain with the Federal Reserve authorities rather than with the Government, and (2) that, even if the Government saw fit to take over a part of the control of the credit situation, the powers involved ought to be lodged, not with the Secretary of the Treasury, but with an independent governmental agency, because the Treasury is a great borrower, the Treasury is almost always interested in cheap money, and Treasury policy would frequently conflict with what sound credit policy would call for, however, that credit policy might be defined. I should, therefore, favor the proposal contained in H. R. 7157, the bill now under consideration, to transfer from the Treasury to an independent Federal monetary authority part or all of the new powers given to the Treasury under the recently passed gold bill of 1934, if the bill really did establish an independent Federal monetary authority. But I notice that it is provided that the directors of this new monetary authority "shall be subject to removal by the President or by concurrent resolution of Congress." Such an authority would have no independence whatever, and I should prefer to see the powers remain where they are, with the Secretary of the Treasury, responsible solely to the President.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Assuming that was changed and this monetary authority was an entirely independent body appointed for a very long time, and appointed to represent, not some special interest but society as a whole, would you think it is better than to leave the management in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury as the law now provides?

Mr. ANDERSON. The difficulty there is that the present law is limited to 2 years, and by proclamation to a third year. During that time I would rather have the independent monetary authority than the Secretary of the Treasury controlling it, if it were an independent authority. But my thought is we want to get back to a time when we have the Federal Reserve authorities in control of the monetary and credit policy of the country.

With respect to the declaration of policy in the bill, that it shall "restore and maintain the normal purchasing power of the dollar, which shall, for the purposes of this act, be the average purchasing power of the dollar for all commodities during the year 1926," I wish to express the strong conviction that the bill proposes an impossibility. It is possible, by currency legislation, so to undermine the confidence of the people in their dollar that prices will rise rapidly and violently toward or far beyond the 1926 level. It is not possible, by currency manipulation, to bring them to the 1926 level or any other level, stop them there, and hold them there. It cannot be done by varying the gold content of the dollar, it cannot be done by regulation of the volume of currency and credit, it cannot be done by varying discount rates, and it cannot be done by any combination of these devices.

That is the only formal thing I am going to read, and I want to talk, if I may, amplifying certain of these propositions, particularly with reference to a number of the topics brought up in the bill.

The bill provides for the mandatory purchase of silver to the extent of 1,000,000,000 ounces with the limitation that it shall not exceed 25 percent of the value of the gold in the Treasury.

I have studied this silver thing a great deal and have tried very hard to find any grounds from the standpoint of the public welfare, and from the standpoint of monetary policy, why we should be talking about silver, legislating about silver, or doing anything about silver in this situation.

I think there is nothing behind the silver move but the selfish interests of the silver people. I think it is an abuse of the currency to bring this silver matter in, and that the proposal to buy a billion ounces of silver is simply using Government money to raise the price of silver for the benefit of the silver interests, and for no other benefit.

The notion that our foreign trade has been injured by the price of silver, I can find no warrant for. The one great silver country is China, and the figures will show very clearly that our exports with China fell much less rapidly than our export trade with gold-standard countries or countries that went off of the gold standard. The evidence is quite clear in that respect, that China did better in holding up her buying from us in percentage than almost any other country.

Statements have been made that all Latin America is on a silver basis and we must take care of them. Latin America is not on the silver basis. Mexico has recently dropped from gold to a silver basis but it was unintentional, she did not want to. I find nothing to justify the argument of the silver people in this connection.

The provision for changing the price of gold from time to time is a provision which with its continuous uncertainty merely continues an evil which has done more to make disturbance in this great trouble of ours than any other one thing.

We had a great licking coming to us as the result of the follies that took place between 1922 and 1929. The two great follies that made this terrible trouble were, first, the high protective tariffs which choked the trade of the world and prevented countries from paying for what they bought by sending in goods to people they bought from. Then the second is the gigantic expansion of bank credit in the United States, and in a less measure elsewhere in the world, which made it possible for us for 6 or 7 years to overcome those tariffs, getting goods out on credit but making payments impossible.

We received from Europe long-time bonds in the purchase of daily bread, the next year more long-time bonds to buy more daily bread and to pay interest on last year's borrowings. The process went on year after year with the necessity of steady expansion of foreign loans in order to keep going a constant volume of exports. The thing ought to be daily labor for daily bread, and it would have been if our tariffs had been low enough for Europe to send in goods to pay for her cotton, tobacco, and other things.

The bank expansion resting on the policies of the Federal Reserve banks, and resting on the inflowing gold that came to us because the rest of the world was off of the gold standard and could not receive gold, amounted to thirteen-and one-half billion of deposits in the United States in the commercial banks, leaving out the savings banks, and fourteen and one-half billion in loans and investments, which we did not need.

Commerce would not take it and would not use it, and it went into every other abnormal use which you can think of. It went into our vast foreign loans I speak about; it went into real-estate mortgage on a colossal scale.

The real-estate mortgages of the members of the Federal Reserve System stood at $500,000,000 in 1919, and were over $3,000,000,000 by 1928; these figures are roughly right.

It went into installment finance paper, rapidly growing and expanding; and it went into the stock and bond collateral loans, and the bank investments in bonds that wrecked so many banks when the market went to pieces in the last year or two.

We had a great licking coming to us as the result of those follies and as the result of the further folly of raising the tariff still higher in 1930.

But the worst troubles that came were at a later time, and as the result of another thing. We thought it was pretty bad down to early 1931, that we had had a great crisis, but if we could get back now to what we had in the first half of 1931, get back to the volume of unemployment we had at that time and get back to the volume of railroad traffic, we would be glad to do it. The railroads were solvent in the middle of 1931.

Mr. CROSS. You say the railroads were solvent in 1931?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no question about that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In 1931?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; you take the railroad traffic as it was in the middle of 1931 and give the railroads that traffic again today, the figures would look fine.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Don't you know the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was conceived by the banking houses of New York in order to save the stocks and bonds they held in the railroad companies?

Mr. ANDERSON. You are talking about late 1931.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was conceived prior to that time, and actually was launched in October 1931 at a conference which I happened to attend at the White House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; something had come between the time I am talking about, the first half of 1931, and that time. It began in May, and it represented the beginning of fear regarding the standard of value. Austria cracked and Germany began to weaken, with the discovery that France, under political fears, was no longer supporting an international cooperation, no longer cooperating as we expected cooperation in financial trouble.

Then came the fear regarding the standard of value itself, first the run on England when she was pulled off the gold standard, then fears regarding the dollar and the run on the United States.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You speak of a run on the United States, will you illustrate what you mean by that?

Mr. ANDERSON. I mean the frightened foreign withdrawals of gold from the United States because they did not trust the dollar any more.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Weren't our gold reserves increasing constantly during that period, not regularly, but constantly?

Mr. ANDERSON. They increased in the early part of the year but withdrawals following the collapse of sterling decreased the reserves.

Mr. BUSBY. What year are you speaking about?

Mr. ANDERSON. 1931.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Do you object to saying what countries had no confidence in the dollar of the United States at that time?

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me go back a bit in speaking of the follies of 1929, to make this picture a little more clear before you.

One of the theories in this period of cheap money, and one that Professor Cassell, by the way, very much favored, was the substitution of gold exchange for gold in central bank reserves.

There grew up a very wide practice of central banks in Europe holding dollars and sterling instead of holding gold in their own vaults. The Netherlands Bank had a lot of sterling and dollars, and the Bank of France had a tremendous lot of both dollars and sterling.

In the collapse of sterling the Bank of France lost several times its capital, and the Government had to make good its capital. The Netherlands Bank lost its capital and the Government made good half of it.

In the trouble that followed they could not trust sterling, so what could they trust, and the foreign central bank began to pull gold out of us—they wanted it at home where they could trust it.

The Bank of France did not pull gold out of us in the autumn of 1931 when the first big run came, and I was told they had practically the same balance then that they had at the end. The Bank of France took its gold out in 1932.

The point I am trying to get at is this, that when that time came, when the fear regarding the standard of value came and men ceased to trust the standard of value, you got the worst smash, the worst part of this whole smash, and let me give you the figures.

The New York Times average of stocks of 25 industrials dropped from 80 to 34 during February to June and July in 1932. That is the biggest percentage drop of any period, it is a fearful percentage.

Your index of business activity, I haven't got the exact figures, but while it was not satisfactory in early 1931, it dropped incredibly from the middle of 1931 to the middle of 1932, to the lowest in this period of distress.

Your turn in that tide came in June and early July of 1932 when two main things happened, both reassuring regarding the standard of value. One was that we could announce that we had beaten off the second great raid on our gold, that we had paid the foreigners all they could take, that our authorities said come and get it, we don't want it here, and they had taken all that they could, and we could announce that they had taken all they could.

The second was the vote in the United States Senate on the Patman bonus bill, whereby a great majority the Senate rejected that bill which was an assurance that the Senate would protect the standard of value. Then came our turn in the summer of 1932.

Mr. BUSBY. If I may suggest another element, don't you think it was Mr. Hoover's arrangement to take care of Germany rather than the Patman bonus bill that had more to do with the upswing in 1932?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Hoover was not doing anything for Germany in 1932. It was in 1931 he was trying to do something.

Mr. BUSBY. You skipped that upswing.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That lasted only about 2 weeks.

Mr. ANDERSON. It did not last very long because the thing was not carried through.

Mr. BUSBY. I remember differently but the records will clear that up.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I believe the records would be best to clear it up.

However, there was a third thing that helped out, in the middle of 1932, and that was the agreement at the Lausanne Conference between Germany, England, France, and other countries which, had we followed it up, as they were supposed to, would have gone far toward clearing the international atmosphere. But we had a political campaign on and nobody here was willing to follow it up.

I don't want to go off too far there, but I would put as one of the other follies of the period of 1922 to 1929 the very unsatisfactory arrangement made regarding reparations and Allied debts, based on the illusions that expanding bank credit had created. Everybody thought that more could be done than was possible, because credit was expanding and there was a lot of money, and that they could do things with money instead of goods.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think the investigations of this subcommittee in the past several years justifies the opinion that the collapse in values was due to a want of world supply of gold, and that when these other governments and the central banks, as you have indicated, began to try to go on gold again, the world-wide scarcity was very largely responsible for the crash in commodity prices.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I, with respect to that point, put into your record a bulletin of March 15, 1931, called Gold, Some Observations on the Interim Report of the Gold Delegation of the Finance Committee of the League of Nations, of the Chase National Bank.

There were three reports of that commission, and this discusses the first two.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I believe the subcommittee is familiar with that bulletin, and I don't know whether we would be justified in putting the entire bulletin in the record. We will take it up in executive session if you desire but I think we are all familiar with the bulletin you have in your hand.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will call attention to one or two things in it with reference to this point.

By the way, let me say that the gold delegation of the finance committee of the League of Nations, Professor Cassell having the leadership, started out rather strongly with the view that the gold factor was highly important. In its second report they softened this a great deal, and the final report, Professor Cassell would not even sign, and he had a minority report, while the rest of them put emphasis, not on gold, but on other things.

I think it might be interesting for you to know the fact that Cassell is a dissenter in the last document, whereas he was the leader in the first two documents.

The contention in the first interim report of that committee, that there is a fixed volume of trade in the world and a fixed volume of gold production required to keep pace with it, that credit is fixed by the volume of gold you produce, and that if gold is not produced fast enough it would strangle trade and force the decline of prices and so on; it just is not so.

The first big flaw in the argument is in the post-war world; there has been no fixed relationship between the growth of credit and the growth of gold. Credit expanded far more rapidly than gold production, and far more rapidly than production or trade.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. We all agree that there is vastly too much credit in relation to the metallic base, if that is what you mean.

Mr. ANDERSON. I mean vastly too much credit in relation to the need for credit—in relation to the kind of things credit can properly be based on.

I do not want any credit unless I can see how the money is coming back. It is not a good thing to give a man credit unless you can see how he can use it to get money back.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Isn't it true—and I say this with absolute respect—but isn't it true that the great banking houses of New York are the institutions which were solely responsible for flooding the country with these worthless foreign bonds which you have so accurately described?

Mr. ANDERSON. The primary responsibility for the excessive security issues of all kinds lay not with the numerous independent banks and investment houses but with the central money market authorities who made money so excessive that it was splashing around inviting use, and that it spoiled the perspective of even conservative men—men who were very much troubled about the thing in 1925 and 1926 were often convinced by 1928 and 1929 that it was all right. However, you can find individual cases of great abuse.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Of course, the condition which I am about to describe, I am sure, existed all over the country: The great banking houses of New York sent representatives all down through Maryland and induced the country banks to purchase these foreign bonds, and it seems to me that the loading up of the banking institutions of the country with securities of doubtful value, or of no value, was almost entirely the result of the direct activity of the great New York banks.

Isn't that a fairly accurate statement, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. ANDERSON. You say of the New York banks, but I would say some of their affiliates and the investment houses, and I do not think you can say much about the evils of that period that I was not myself saying in print repeatedly at that time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. One of the things you advocated, as I remember it, along with other bankers and representatives of bankers, for many years, which was constantly fought by men like Steagall, Busby, and myself, was allowing the national banks to engage in the real-estate mortgage business.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I never favored that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I was under the impression you were one of those who did.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I never favored that. I can show you a bulletin I wrote in 1926 where I went on record as saying commercial banks ought not to take mortgages.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And certainly I want to add this, that the great national banks of New York are the influence which made possible the passage of the law placing the national banks in the real-estate mortgage business, which you have stated this morning was one of the principal causes of the crash.

Mr. ANDERSON. As early as 1926, and before the McFadden bill was passed, I published in this bulletin a protest against the holding of real-estate mortgages in commercial banks, and set up the definite proposition they were not proper things for a commercial bank to hold.

Mr. CROSS. On that point of the major banks and their affiliates, who was the chairman of your board at that time?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Wiggin.

Mr. CROSS. Don't you think those banks were largely responsible at least for the expansion of credit in stocks on the stock exchange? To illustrate, I don't know whether you are familiar with the testimony, but I presume you are, that was brought out in the Senate investigating committee on the exchange, in which Mr. Wiggin was involved, I believe it was in Fox Film at that time, in which they manipulated those stocks. I don't know whether it was Fox Film or Fox Theaters, but they had a dozen of those things, and he was in one of those pools, and for instance, we will say the stock was at 40, then they bid right along 40¼, 40½, 40¾, 41¼, and on and on up. Isn't it also true that the banks in New York, on account of the loans to that stock exchange or the brokers, sapped and drew from all of the small banks throughout the country money which was supposed to be the money of those communities and it was sent to New York to get the high rates of interest as the result of that performance?

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me see what I ought to say there.

Mr. CROSS. Did you agree with Mr. Wiggin during that time?

Mr. ANDERSON. I knew nothing about those transactions.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You may proceed with your statement, Mr. Anderson.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, then, as to the general responsibility for that "bad times" during which things were wrong and during which many normal things became abnormal, it is one of the invariable results that during a period of rising prices and speculative profits, many men go wrong—their fiber cracks.

If you will take any such period in the United States, for instance, the greenback period, you will find scandal and financial crookedness in high places; you know things came up under Grant's regime, and some of you may have seen the article by Professor Dunning in 1912 or 1913 in the Political Science Quarterly, giving an account of a memorandum by President Johnson which was not published until after everybody mentioned was dead, discussing the Alaska purchase.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Let me interrupt you right there to say, if we are going to get off on what took place during the greenback period and periods of that kind, it will be worth while, in order to keep the record evenly balanced, or in other words, to have it retain reasonable proportion, for us to accent the fact that the basis of the banking structure and banking management of this country which produced this collapse took place when the country was on the undisputed gold standard. You can call that a greenback period, but we did not go off of the gold standard until March 1933.

Mr. BUSBY. And I would like to remind you that my memory is that the greatest amount of gold this country ever held was $5,015,000,000, about the middle of September 1931, when you said gold was being rapidly withdrawn from the country, and people were becoming suspicious, or feared, rather, that a fall of the standard of value was setting in, and the call came mostly by France in 1932, which everyone might say was a bluff, and we did not go far below $4,000,000,000 at any time in gold.

Mr. ANDERSON. They took out hundreds of millions twice in a short period, in autumn of 1931 and again in the spring of 1932, two great waves. There is no dispute about the fact, and if you will get the weekly figures of the gold monetary stock in the country for the month of September 1931 to July 1932 you will see what I mean.

Mr. BUSBY. You have reached a point where I want to direct some questions, and I think I will direct them to the collapse of credit rather than the withdrawal of gold as being the cause for the downfall, and that having been due to the unconscionable methods of the larger banking interests in furthering the issuance of worthless bonds and stocks, and underwriting issues on a project that would not stand and which was never calculated to pay dividends; yet the syndicate composed of all of these banks, such as, with all due respect, the one you represent, and the other institutions, the 12 banks that controlled $20,000,000,000 at the time you speak of—I think they were the culprits in the whole set-up. I will direct my examination to them when we get past the point where you have finished dealing with the gold situation and the collapse of this intolerable situation created by them in their underwriting efforts and their bond-floating orgies of worthless issues, which will indicate more reasonably the cause of the collapse, than the withdrawal by France of $3,000,000,000 of gold.

Mr. HANCOCK. Wasn't it generally understood about that same period your recent remarks were addressed to, that the supply of gold in this country was more or less unwieldy, and after this withdrawal there was really an actual feeling of relief on the part of those who were in charge of directing the money affairs of the country?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; we were glad to have the French take that gold. I remember being asked by a Frenchman in my office at the time the Glass-Steagall bill was being passed, which permitted Government securities as collateral for Federal notes, why we were doing it. I said, "The reason is very simple; we have a nervous creditor on the other side of the water, and we want them to take the money home and quit disturbing our money market."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes; I remember at that time I was quoted as having said we had created a condition where France could take her gold and go to hell with it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I didn't use quite that language, although I sympathized with it. I appreciate, too, their fears and the psychology behind it.

Might I say this, Mr. Busby, about your general proposition as to who is to blame? I think very frequently we look for culprits when it would be more profitable to look for causes, and that very frequently objective conditions are far more responsible than individual human beings, even though you can say these individual human beings are doing wrong or making mistakes.

I think, therefore, my best service to the committee would not be in helping you allocate responsibility of individuals, but in pointing out things I do about the kind of economic causes which bring about such a condition.

Now, you take a case like this, a country banker, we will say, loading up his portfolio, or any banker buying bonds in that period, if he bought high-yield Brazilian bonds, we will say, if anybody in New York advised him that was a good investment, I would blame that man.

But on the other hand, how about the man who in good faith bought New York Central bonds, rated in Moody's as triple A in 1929, and then in 1932, when he wanted to turn them into cash, found that they, too, were slaughtered in price? He is caught in a general situation.

I might say, what about the man who takes on a mortgage on the ordinary standards on a farm that is running and produces enough money to pay the taxes and interest and leave a surplus, and then in the general situation later he finds that mortgage no good?

The reason is that too much credit makes bad credit. The thing to do is to control the central market to keep from having too much money around over the needs of trade.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Could you explain at this point how you could expect the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to adopt a policy which you have described, when pressure was being constantly brought on them by the great New York banks who really had their officers appointed to continue to expand credit?

That was thoroughly understood, and even papers like the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and the Chicago Herald Tribune, papers which are well known to be allied in their dealings with the great banking interests, criticized that situation.

What we are trying to do is to get a board set up which will have no interest in anybody except the general public, including, of course, the banks.

Mr. ANDERSON. As to the New York banks, I think it is quite incorrect to say they were pressing for cheap money. My own bank certainly fought it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Don't you remember the controversy about Mitchell going out and throwing $25,000,000 into the market when, as a matter of fact, it was at a time when conservative people were advised there was too much credit in the stock exchange?

Mr. ANDERSON. May I tell you gentlemen, not for the record, what I know about that episode?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Why don't you want it to go in the record? If you don't want it to go in the record, don't tell us about it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, I will not tell the confidential thing I know about it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. At that time, you must remember, the National City Bank was the largest bank in the United States.

Mr. BUSBY. Funds could only be supplied through the New York banks, whether they were for the account of others, for outside banks, or for themselves, could they?

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me express this opinion with reference to the episode in the spring of 1929, when the call rate went suddenly to 20 or 25 percent and Mr. Mitchell made a statement that, the Federal Reserve authorities to the contrary notwithstanding, he had borrowed some money at the Federal Reserve bank to lend at the money post. I believe other banks did the same thing at the same time, and that the Federal Reserve authorities were in sympathy with that.

It is my belief they did not want the thing to run up to 25 percent, and they broke the rate down to 15 or 12, which was still a high rate, and that the episode was simply an action to steady the market and not to make it easy, but to prevent a violent cataclysm.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The people of the country were given to understand the New York banks were going to support the New York stock market and pour their money into it for that purpose.

You say other banks were doing it, and doing it with the cooperation of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. ANDERSON. The thing was not intended to make an easy market; it was not intended to make the stock market go up, but merely to prevent a violent catclysm that very tight money could create. The very same kind of thing was done at the end of the year when interest rates went to 12 percent, and when there was some borrowing, I think, speaking from recollection, by various New York banks to lend at 12 percent to keep the rate from going higher than 12; but that is a high rate.

Mr. BUSBY. If I remember correctly, the New York banks at that time were indulging in the practice of gathering in funds from all over the country from the various sources, for the purpose of lending for the account of others which has no stability at all, which is not backed even by an institution, but by private individuals; and that funds poured into the banks, and in 1929, when the crash came, 56 percent of the money passing through the New York banks to the exchange was from that unstable source for the account of others; that 29 percent of the amount came in from country banks, all kinds of banks, and was being passed out by the New York banks because they were getting a big difference between what they had to pay for funds and what they were getting on the New York exchange.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; the New York banks on money loaned by them for others only got one-half of 1 percent.

Mr. BUSBY. I don't mean the actual account, but I mean funds like your bank account as the correspondent for many other banks has it placed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Here is the process the New York banks were not running around to get that money to lend for the account of others; they did not like it—they were afraid of it and the New York Clearing House made a rule in the course of time—I have forgotten the exact date—limiting the amount that could be done to keep the small people from doing it.

Mr. BUSBY. That was after the crash?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; before the crash. They were so much concerned about it, I know, in the Chase Bank, that we were limiting the amount we ourselves would lend of our own money, knowing that when trouble came these outsiders would get frightened and that a heavy burden would be thrown on the New York banks.

Mr. BUSBY. Which happened.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; which happened. This one thing I want to tell you happened in the Chase Bank in that panic week. At the beginning of that panic week, October 22, 1929, we had loaned of our own money at the money post of the stock exchange, only $225,000. We did not like the situation, and we were lending for the account of others vast sums, not at our instance, but on their instructions, that is, if a customer told us to do a thing, it is our business to do it, and we were lending money for country banks and others, great corporations, private investors, foreign banks, who instructed us to debit their account and lend on call.

I may say further, on that day, October 22, we owed the Federal Reserve bank zero, and we had a great lot of Government securities; we were highly liquid; we had seen trouble coming, and had got ready for it.

In the week that followed, we got calls from these people, they did not wish to telegraph or to write, but they called by phone at the bank and said, "Call our money." We called it, and we loaned ourselves to the extent that we increased loans in that bank week $375,000,000, and for the whole country the loan expansion that week of the banks was $1,200,000,000, so that the Chase Bank did 30 percent of all of the work done that week in saving the situation from collapse.

There is a record where Mr. Wiggin and I worked together in doing that, and I am proud to have helped him get ready for it, and I want it put to his credit.

We expanded to meet the situation, and got it back quietly when the trouble was over. That was a good piece of work done by the New York banks.

The New York Clearing House, as early as 1928, began to take many precautions, began to make inquiries of the position of the banks with respect to liquidity.

You know when Radio was selling at 70 it was taken in the loan envelopes as collateral at only 40, and I went down into the loan department of our bank when this panic started, and the report came that Radio was quoted at 40. One of the clerks looked up at me and said, "It is down to our loan value," and besides that we had 25-percent margin.

That amount of loans was vastly too big, but it was liquidated down from eight billion and a half to under three hundred millions by the middle of 1932.

Mr. BUSBY. That brings us back to a real point in our procedure here. It was not your money base, it was not your gold, it was not the amount of currency in circulation, because in 1929 it was much smaller than it is now; but it is the amount of credit that had been permitted, and, I say, eagerly encouraged by the banking set-up of this country, which had involved the people on promises to do things which it would be impossible for them to do with the change of circumstances. While your bank was increasing from $250,000,000 in round numbers to $350,000,000 in loans in a short time, there was, I will say, twenty billions of shrinkage in stock values which was being absorbed by the unsuspecting public, and your efforts to support the market were commendable, no doubt, but your efforts did not save the people who had gone into this great scheme of things where thousands and thousands of them were wiped out of house and home because of this uncontrolled expansion of credit through bank circulation, and that has continued down to this date so much so that the lending on the New York Stock Exchange bonds and stocks dropped from October 1929, we will say, a high of $136,000,000,000 down to less than $30,000,000,000 at the lowest point we reached in the depression.

Mr. ANDERSON. How could one bank control that?

Mr. BUSBY. I am not saying the bank can do it, but the banks created the condition which got the people into that situation, because we need something on the order this bill provides here to control an agency, and also that this country must have a media of exchange set-up if it is going to carry on and do business, and that is the occasion, as I understand it, for this bill, and for a new foundation being laid whereby the people can be protected in their property rights from the imaginary situation which you say makes even the finest bankers crooked.

Mr. ANDERSON. But not all of them by any means.

Mr. BUSBY. Not all of them, but they are all selfish, and I take it the selfish inclination to get gain is what you mean when you say they do things they ought not to do. Men are men, and big men just know more ways to do these things than the fellow of limited knowledge. The result is when the crack comes it opens up and exposes everything and we find the big ones like Mitchell, Wiggins, and all of them have done these things.

You will remember that Wiggins almost contemptuously replied to some questions I asked him in 1930 because I would approach this subject in which he was held a master. I thought of these same things then, but it took 3 years to realize the mass of the people are to be looked after. And while you have done things, or your banks have done things to the mass which has made our country suffer from the standpoint of hunger and starvation, we want a definite arrangement that can be controlled better for the good of the whole country, and that is why this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON I will agree with the purposes of the bill you have stated, that you want to have control of credit that will prevent undue expansion and prevent improper credit and prevent speculation or excess money and things of that kind, and the question would be where to find that control.

The ideal control, the control that has worked best, has never been Government control, it has been good central bank control.

The central bank should be free to apply the regular rules: the rediscount rate should be above the market so that if there is need for money other banks can go and get it, but they have got to pay for it; and they should employ open-market operations so as to tighten the money market and not make it easy. The central bank should lie back there with the reserves of the country to be used in an emergency. Central bank policy should be designed to protect the quality of the credit.

Had we been able to carry out the purposes of the Federal Reserve Act as originally drawn, we would have had that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. How can you do that when the control of the Federal Reserve System is in the hands of private bankers, who are in the banking business for profit?

Mr. ANDERSON. It would have been very much better if the control of the Federal Reserve System had been in the hands of bankers, because they would have insisted on banking principles.

When the Federal Reserve System was first organized, it did not do a great deal, but followed the conventional orthodox lines; then we got into the war and the Federal Reserve System loyally bent to the fiscal needs of the Treasury and made money, I thought, too cheap at that time; and then, in 1919, after the war was over, went along too far with the Treasury until toward the end of the year, when it asserted itself, with W. P. G. Harding at the head of it——

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. He took cotton from 40 cents down to 7 cents in that year, and he is much loved in some sections of the country; and he took wheat from $2 down to 40 cents.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will put in the record also that the House of Representatives and the Senate investigated that thoroughly, with the exoneration of the Governor from the charges. I refer to Sydney Anderson's joint commission of agricultural inquiry.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. He came into this room and had a chart on the wall there and stood there for 3 hours, and he never answered a single question that we asked him during the entire period, evaded every single question that we asked him during the entire period, and undertook to say that agriculture had not been deflated.

Mr. BUSBY In connection with the point we were on a moment ago, you said you think the situation would have been better handled had the Federal Reserve Bank been more largely in control of the bankers and banker-minded.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes

Mr. BUSBY. Do you regard it as the duty of the Federal Government to furnish a media of exchange to business and the people of the country?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I think it is, as far as the Government establishes the standard of value, controls the coinage and things of that kind, but in the provision of paper money and other media of exchange of a credit character, I think is done best through a banking machinery working rather automatically and adapting the volume of these credit media to the needs of trade and commercial transactions.

Mr. BUSBY. Legal tender is the currency issue of the Government of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't think there ought to be any legal tender except full-weight gold coin.

Mr. BUSBY. Of course, bank checks are not legal tender.

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. BUSBY. Bank checks and checking accounts, which serve for more than nine-tenths of our business transactions, are merely a byproduct of the banks to make profit for the investors in bank stocks—is it not—purely a byproduct, and it is not the objective of the bank to create checking accounts, but they are only incident to a move on the part of the banks to get a profit for the stockholders?

Mr. ANDERSON. They are the thing the bank directs its attention to. The banker is not thinking, as he does his business, of profits to stockholders primarily, but he is thinking of getting the business; here is a good account, I want it.

Mr. BUSBY. That represents profits to him?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. The checking accounts are merely byproducts of his effort to get the business and get a profit; are they not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I won't say byproducts, but they are the product by which he gets a profit.

Mr. BUSBY. They are not a consideration at all, but they are an incident to the methods of the bank getting business and making profits.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would you say that steel rails are an incidental byproduct of a steel mill?

Mr. BUSBY. They are the direct objective of the operation of the mill, while the banker is not interested in bank checks one way or another, except it creates a condition to bring profit into the bank, and that is what I am speaking of.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would say it is no more true of the bank checks than of the steel rails. In the steel mill they are interested in the rails, and in the bank the banker is interested in the deposits of the customers.

Mr. BUSBY. I understand, but I am talking about the media of exchange to be used by business. It is none of the bank's concern to see that the people who do business in our country are supplied with a media of exchange, except as a profit comes to it by the transaction. Isn't that true?

Mr ANDERSON. Yes; and the theory of the thing is that you do it better that way, in the dealings between customers and bankers, the customer not borrowing money unless he needs it, because he has got to pay interest, bank deposit currency not being provided unless somebody will pay for it; then you keep it to what the needs are.

Mr. BUSBY. Now, because of your reputation and eminence as an economist, I would like to ask if you think it is possible in what we call good times, times of rising price levels, for our banking set-up to go along without inflating credit so as to cause these price peaks that ultimately must collapse?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is possible if you get a good vigorous Federal Reserve System which can function without fear, which is not afraid of raising the discount rate, and which is not afraid to tighten credit when there is pressure.

Mr. BUSBY. Where are you going to get that outfit you are talking about?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it is political pressure. The heart of the Federal Reserve System was broken when President Warren Harding put W P. G. Harding off of the Board and put the other man in his place, Crissinger.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Harding had no character and Crissinger had no sense. That is the distinction.

Mr. ANDERSON Please put in the record that I dissent as to Harding's character.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH How about Crissinger?

Mr. ANDERSON. I agree.

Mr. BUSBY. Now, as to the other side of the proposition I presented awhile ago with regard to the banks in rising price times, do you regard it as being possible under our banking set-up, when falling price levels set in, to function and furnish checking accounts as a media of exchange so that business can carry on?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes; but not so that prices can be forced up thereby.

Mr. BUSBY. I am not talking about them being forced up. Isn't it the practice of the banks, they see their security depreciate, for instance, as you spoke of the Radio stock dropping from 72 to 40, to begin to press those who have accounts with them, and that goes on all over the country, so much so that by the time price levels have fallen as much as 15 percent, there is a general drive by the banks to make collections of accounts so as to preserve themselves from their depositors, and that this drive by the banks—and I am not blaming them for it, because, it is the only way they can exist—necessarily creates the intolerable conditions we call depression?

Mr. ANDERSON. A general drive, no. Let's analyze what happens. In a crisis period, and let us take 1920 as a case, where your crisis began in May, June.

Mr. BUSBY. I think that was a home-made crisis by the late Mr. W. P. G. Harding, but you might take the 1929 prices as a natural happening.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, I don't think so, and I would be glad to take that 1920 period as one where the commercial banks acted on the whole very well, and where the process was this, that credit instead of contracting when the price decline began, expanded for several months.

Mr. BUSBY. That was not true in the section where I lived. What happened by and large was that the rediscount banks were called on to make payment to the Federal Reserve of loans they never expected to be called, and that was the condition all through the South. They were notified by the Federal Reserve, "If you make this loan again you will carry it in your own portfolio, because we will not rediscount that type of paper."

The result was that the lumber concerns, the automobile loans, and everything else were put on the black list for rediscount, and consequently in this country, you will find that a billion, eight hundred fifty million cash was squeezed out of circulation in the course of 15 months, and I believe about ten billion of credit. I have checked up on that.

Mr. ANDERSON. You are speaking of what period?

Mr. BUSBY. 1920–21. Instead of expansion of credit, there was a contraction of credit, and the reports and bulletins of the Federal Reserve will disclose that. There was a contraction of currency to probably $2,000,000,000 which was withdrawn and turned in by the Federal Reserve because they would not renew the loans. That brought prices down and brought destruction.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let's take the chronology of it. Your section of the country is what? I should know but I do not recall.

Mr. BUSBY. I am from Mississippi.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is the Dallas bank your bank?

Mr. BUSBY. No; St. Louis is, in the portion of the State where I am located.

Mr. ANDERSON. The general condition of the country would show an expansion for the first 3 or 4 months of that crisis period, down to the late autumn of 1920, although the price decline began earlier in May, but the expanding of credit kept up, not for the purpose of holding prices up, but for the purpose of letting men mobilize their slow assets to meet their quick liabilities.

I will give you an illustration of the credit policy in that period. I remember talking to my old chief, the late A. Barton Hepburn, about what could be done when I was going out to Iowa City to make a speech, as I remember in late November.

He said, "I will tell you what I am doing. I am getting disquieting reports about cattle being shipped out of the Panhandle of Texas and Montana and sold in Kansas City at 2 cents a pound on the hoof. People are cutting up their best herds to pay their debts, selling their she cattle and their lean cattle, and I am going to scurry around and get some money out there," and he said, "I wish you would have that in mind when you make your speech in Iowa City."

This is the speech I made:

"If you have a farmer customer who has corn and wants to hold it for higher prices, and wants to get money from you to hold that corn, tell him no, he had better sell it now; if you have a farmer who has fat cattle that he wants to hold for a better price and wants money from you to hold the cattle, tell him no, don't hold, sell now; but if you have a farmer who has corn and knows how to feed cattle, lend him new money to buy more cattle that are being sent out of the Panhandle of Texas and Montana, and get the corn and the lean cattle together."

There was what I thought was a good banking policy, lend money to a solvent good man and give him time, and lend him enough; if he needs $30,000 don't give him $20,000 but give him $30,000 or nothing. You want to keep agriculture a going concern, keep it going, let him have money for current production; but if a man just wants money to hold a stale position that will crack anyhow, don't give it to him.

Mr. BUSBY. I have taken too much of your time, but these questions have been aimed at this proposition, that I don't believe the banking set-up of this country can function so as to furnish business a dependable media of exchange, but that a more dependable organization ought to be provided.

I mean that first, because the banks will not let a good business condition alone, and they will enhance values by making credit available. They cannot function in falling price times, and they are all operated, as they ought to be, purely for selfish means and gains, and that is the reason they are set up.

Further, I believe that the Government ought not to have to depend, and the people ought not to have to depend, on that kind of a set-up. The experience through which we have gone for 150 years, having spent 40 years in depressions, 20 of which have come up as the result of this set-up, we are now looking for legislation to cure that condition.

That is all I have to say, and I wanted to suggest that, because to keep up the questions I have asked may have been seemingly without point.

Mr. CROSS. Do you think from an economic standpoint we made a wise or an unwise move in going off of the gold standard?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think a very unwise move.

Mr. CROSS. Do you think we made a wise move or an unwise move in reducing the content of the dollar?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it was unfortunate, although I am glad to have a settled figure, and hope it will stay settled.

Mr. CROSS. I thought you said a while ago we had improved wonderfully since we went off of the gold dollar?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no inconsistency in what I said whatever. What I am saying now, the process of coming down was hurtful and unfortunate, but the fixing of a figure instead of leaving it fluctuating was helpful.

Mr. CROSS. Your idea is we should have stayed where we were, sat still in March 1933?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think, if we had saved the gold standard then, which we could have easily done, we would have been far better off today.

Mr. CROSS. What do you think would have happened to the agricultural portion of the Nation? I believe you said a while ago in 1931, if we could get back there, we would be all right.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I said it would be much better. No; I want things back to a very much better situation, of course. And I want to say, in my opinion, the Government of the United States has been in the past very unfair to the American farmer, and has handicapped him very greatly by these high protective tariffs, which have lessened the farmer's foreign market.

Mr. CROSS. Don't you think that has been comparatively small? Of course, I am a Democrat and against the high tariff, but I don't put any great pressure or importance on a tariff that has to do largely with our conditions domestically, rather than a few things that we sell abroad.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I say, I think this Government has treated the farmer unfairly, and I am interested in the improvement of his condition. I think the tariff the most important single factor in the farmer's trouble.

Mr. HANCOCK. I regret very much that I did not hear Mr. Anderson's preliminary statement, but I want to say now that I attach more importance to the question of control of credit as a factor in bringing about a desirable price level than I do to control of currency.

Is there anything in this bill, Mr. Anderson, No. 7157, which looks to the proper control of credit?

Mr. ANDERSON. I find nothing definite. I find in section 4 (c) the powers of the Monetary Authority shall be exercised to such an extent and in such a manner as, in the judgment of the Authority, will best effectuate the declared policy of the act.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. They can conduct open market operations under the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but you do not tell them what to do, and I assume that means probably you cannot agree how to do it; and I do not believe it is possible to do it.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is there any way to effectively control credit other than by manipulation of reserves or the rates fixed?

Mr. ANDERSON. The total volume, you mean?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes; both.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not. You can do some little things at times, but I do not think you can control it. You might say that a bank shall not borrow from the Federal Reserve System to lend for speculation. However, that bank borrows from the Federal Reserve to protect its reserves, and the funds go to another bank, and then that second bank may loan for speculation, and it is not known where it goes.

Mr. HANCOCK. The printed money, including check money and credit money, will run sometimes 10 or 15 or even 20 times the amount of the actual currency?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. What kind of a dollar do we have today?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am hoping that it is a gold dollar of fixed gold content, but I don't know.

Mr. HANCOCK. What is the yardstick, which you could use today in determining the value of our dollar?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the measurement of anything, you use something of the same quality. To measure length, I use something that has length, and to measure value I use something that has value. You can measure money against a particular commodity, you can measure it against foreign currency, you can measure our dollar against gold. And I think, for the purposes in hand, if you are thinking of the dollar as against foreign exchange, it is one question, and if you are thinking of the dollar as against goods, it is another question.

Mr. HANCOCK. I had in mind the dollar value in this country.

Mr. ANDERSON. Goods are a measure of value of money, but a change in the prices of goods does not necessarily indicate a change in the value of money. It might indicate a change in the value of goods. For example, in the Great War time, the rise in prices was not a rise in the price of the value of money, but is rather a rise in the value of goods.

Mr. HANCOCK. To make myself a little clearer, for instance under our present set-up a paper dollar is worth a paper dollar.

Mr. ANDERSON. That wouldn't mean anything to me.

Mr. HANCOCK. An ounce of gold would be worth an ounce of gold.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, it has the same identity, but it does not give you any new information Maybe there is something more in your mind than I am getting.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am just wondering by what unit you would measure the value of our dollar today.

Mr. ANDERSON. I measure it first by gold.

Mr. BUSBY. By weight only?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. Which is not a constant buying force?

Mr. ANDERSON. There are no constant units of value for anything, for neither goods nor gold; they are not constant in value.

Mr. HANCOCK. We have a standard of weight, rather than a standard of value of gold, do we not?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, because the value is the important thing, the value of a particular weight of gold.

Mr. HANCOCK. The only thing that is constant about it is its weight, and not its buying power or value.

Mr. ANDERSON. I agree, and I say there are no constant units of value whatever.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You don't think anything can be done to help the situation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Much can be done yet, and I would like to make some suggestions.

Mr. HANCOCK. Do you believe in the soundness of the so-called automatic compensated index, or statistic dollar?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir.

Mr. HANCOCK. You don't believe in the soundness of the theory that by having an unstable dollar you could have stability in prices?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am strongly convinced that you could not have it—you mean by varying the gold content of the dollar?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The very instability of that would generate forces that would make it impossible to control prices.

Mr. HANCOCK. If you are going to have stability, you have got to have some constant, dependable anchor to tie to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. If you had a system in this country whereby as your price level rose the gold content in the dollar would be lowered, wouldn't you sooner or later have two standards of value, one of the dollar and one of gold?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; you very easily would do that, and have people figuring both ways. You had that, of course, during the greenback period, with one paper dollar and one gold dollar, and they figured both ways, and even used both in exchanges.

Mr. HANCOCK. Don't you believe that debt is the common key today of our monetary confusion and is distracting perhaps the mind of the world? That is the thought I got from an article I read from Garrett recently published in the Saturday Evening Post.

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't know how you mean. You mean the burden of debt has grown very heavy?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes; and I think the people are thinking more about their debts than they are the kind and character of money.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the Government would do well to do more thinking in terms of debts in this situation than in terms of currency. I was proposing last year striking directly at the farmers' debts by Government relief, where, if a man had mortgaged his farm and was in danger of losing his farm, to make efforts to keep the good man and the farm together. I thought Government money would help in that situation and would be justified. I urged, on the other hand, that tampering with currency would bring our money into a situation that it would be difficult for things to work.

Mr. HANCOCK. With all of our discussion of the monetary system, don't you think we have failed miserably to contemplate the reform of debt?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think at this moment we are setting in motion forces that will cause another crop of debtors, and that the debts will mount as never before to increase debts. Debit and credit are on the opposite side of the shield and I am afraid, as I contemplate another period of expanding debts ending in another grand smash worse than 1929, with the same outcry as we had then, for more credit.

Mr. HANCOCK. Do you believe in the quantitative theory of money as influencing the price level?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I think that theory is a very fallacious theory which has led to many financial difficulties and to very much bad legislation.

Mr. HANCOCK. What, in your opinion, is the only sound theory of money?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is a long story. It is in my book, The Value of Money.

Mr. HANCOCK. Do you believe that buying gold at a higher price from time to time will materially increase prices of commodities?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think we have had a striking illustration of how little influence that has had in the very small rise since February of last year, despite the immense depreciation of the dollar where it is down now over 40 percent and commodity prices on that theory should have risen 66 percent, while they have risen less than 20 percent.

Mr. BUSBY. You are operating in two fields. Your dollar is measured in foreign exchange by gold, and your commodity prices are held down, because there is nothing in this country by way of bank credit or currency to represent that cheap dollar. You have no quantity of money to represent it, and quantity has no bearing. That dollar is in relation to foreign exchange, but it is not cheap in relation to commodities here, there being no agency here to represent that cheap dollar in our domestic field. You are operating in two fields, and that is the reason you get two results.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Hancock asked me what I thought of buying gold at high prices, and I was answering that question.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. As a matter of fact, if the price of basic commodities did react exactly with the increased gold prices until it became fairly constant, then the Government could stop buying gold.

The Government or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on behalf of the Government are not buying all of the gold offered, because it has been only a month ago that Canada offered $8,000,000 gold at 32 and we refused to buy it.

Of course, you can cheapen your dollar by buying gold, but when it becomes unsatisfactory you are not taking any more gold than you happen to want. You are cognizant of that fact.

Mr. ANDERSON. I didn't know about the Canadian episode.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You knew we were not taking all of the gold offered at 35?

Mr. ANDERSON. It was supposed to be domestic gold and some little abroad. I must confess it is all very bewildering to me to see gold which used to be one thing become domestic gold, foreign gold, gold for jewelers, and so on.

Mr. HANCOCK. If prices would rise in the same proportion in this country as we cheapen money, we might have more export trade, so there is an advantage in the export trade.

Mr. ANDERSON. This notion of manipulating currency to get export trade, I think, is one of the greatest fallacies ever.

Mr. HANCOCK. Isn't it a fact that when England went off of the standard, that her devaluation only applied to foreign exchange rather than her own money?

Mr. ANDERSON. It applied to her own money. You could not get gold for bank notes in England. Gold in England went up as against bank notes. They had a free gold market there and you could measure it every day.

Mr. HANCOCK. Do you look for an appreciable increase in prices in this country as the result of the present monetary policy?

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe it may come, but I am afraid it will come so slowly you will do some more violent things to the currency in an effort to hasten it.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is there any point to devaluation unless you make more money; and is there any point to making more money unless you get inflation or reflation?

Mr. ANDERSON. We have the potentialities of all the money that anybody can use.

Mr. HANCOCK. You said we had that between 1922 and 1928, didn't you, when you testified before the Senate committee not long ago?

Mr. ANDERSON. We used it, too. In currency circulation you cannot make people use more than they want because they like to use the banks. A merchant doesn't carry his money in a till; he puts it in a bank at night.

Mr. HANCOCK. Nobody has worked out a formula yet which will prevent a banker from swapping a deposit slip for a roll of cash.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but they don't carry more cash in their pockets than they want; they put it in the bank; then, as they need pocket cash, especially on the Fourth of July and on Christmas, they take it out.

Mr. HANCOCK. Do you believe under our present condition, and in the light of the program some of us are able to understand and some are not, that private banking in this country is able to operate at a profit and adequately serve the needs of the consumers of this country?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think there are some things that could be done to get bank credit more effectively used in certain areas. Bankers ought not to be expected to use depositors' money to make long loans to industry. They want the money to be turned over frequently—you can have it 6 months and somebody else must then have it, and then you can have it again.

Mr. HANCOCK. Who are to make the long loans?

Mr. ANDERSON. The long loans are to be made by bonds of the industries sold to investors.

Mr. HANCOCK. You mean capital issues?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; capital issues. Commercial money can be used temporarily in carrying the investment bankers in marketing new issues with the public.

I think the Securities Act, with the purposes of which I sympathize, ought to be changed in certain particulars so as to restore that capital market and get new issues coming again for long-term issues and refunding purposes.

I believe the act is right in calling for stringent information, and I believe it is right in making criminal responsibility for making false statement, and I believe it is right in putting in a civil liability. But in that last connection it has gone too far and put fear into the minds of the people who might issue the securities.

Mr. HANCOCK. In your experience, what percent of long-term loans are paid off at maturity and what percent are renewed?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the commercial banking business in a great city the line of credit to big, strong business, and a very high percentage of them are off of the books once a year, then there are many of them remain a long time.

Mr. HANCOCK. Don't you think the banks might save themselves and their customers a lot of trouble if they would resort to demand operations, instead of renewal upon renewal?

Mr. ANDERSON. Just on that, I remember 30 years ago out in my town there was a man named Newman who came in to borrow money—his credit was good—and when he made the note the banker said, "What date shall I put on it?" and he said, "Make it payable on demand," and that meant Newman would not pay it until he got good and ready.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have enjoyed your statement very much, and I believe that is all I have to ask.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call to your attention that this bill provides for the authority to take over a good many of the functions of the Federal Reserve banks, which I think is unfortunate.

We have a common purpose here. There ought to be a good control of the total of money and credit in the United States. There ought to be a good control of member bank reserves. The question is how to get it, and looking at the experiences we have had and the abuses that have come in the last few years, I reach one conclusion, and on looking back over decades of the history of the central banking in many countries, I still believe the best way is by a good central banking machinery.

Mr. BUSBY. At that point, you and Mr. Hancock awhile ago followed the process of putting money into the bank from the merchant. I am thoroughly convinced that there is no way to avoid using our bank set-up and their check arrangement as our media of exchange in this country, but how are you going to prevent these banks from using the funds that are deposited there by the merchant and the other depositors; how are you going to prevent that bank from sending that money to the Federal Reserve bank and making excess reserves?

Mr. ANDERSON. In no way.

Mr. BUSBY. If it is the policy of the banks, as at the present time, to refuse private loans and create excess reserves which are kept in readiness to exchange for Government bonds, don't you regard that as being a very great weakness in the management of our media of exchange machine, and a destructive thing?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't think it is true that the banks are refusing private loans that are sound loans.

Mr. BUSBY. There is nothing safe, except a first mortgage on the country, which are the Government bonds.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the eagerness with which commercial paper, in my experience, is taken, you see the rate for it quoted 1¼ or 1½, or something like that. The lines of credit open and unused, to the businesses of this country, are enormous.

Mr. BUSBY. How do you account for the shrinkage of more than twenty billions in bank credits and loans, if in these howling times every institution in distress feels it ought to be able to go to the R. F. C. to present a petition for a loan? If the banks are doing what you say, why is the Government receiving such pressing insistence by home owners, by farm-loan organizations, by private institutions, municipalities, and business property owners at the present time for accommodations?

Mr. ANDERSON. You are talking now of mortgage loans, and I say it is not good business, sound banking business for commercial banks to take mortgage loans.

Mr. BUSBY. Doesn't that disclose the weakness in the system we have been talking about, which shows that the banks only feel safe in exchanging the depositors' credit for Government loans?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; you are forgetting commercial loans.

Mr. BUSBY. Let me give an illustration. In this city is the Riggs National Bank with $80,000,000 assets; its last statement showed $71,000,000 of deposits, and $49,500,000 were invested in Government obligations and cash. Where does business come in for any consideration by banks of that caliber throughout the country with that kind of a statement?

Mr. ANDERSON. What people are going to the Riggs and not getting loans? Did you see the statement of Dr. Burgess of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York with reference to the experience of the bank in taking loans that commercial banks were refusing? Here is his experience: They looked over some hundred applications and found 13 out of those that, leaning backward, they could take; and of those 13, 2 went into receivership very soon.

Mr. BUSBY. I realize we have no buying power in the people to whom you have to look when there is a foreclosure, and there is nothing that is safe to the bank.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; many notes are paid, and we are making commercial loans every day. This statement was made to me by a veteran banker recently, and which I think is a very good one, that we are always willing to finance a round trip, but we are not willing to finance a one-way trip.

Mr. BUSBY. I am not blaming the banks now, but it is overinflation of credit that we are after.

Mr. ANDERSON. This bill also carries the provision that the authority can be removed by the President or concurrent resolution of Congress.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. We have no idea of passing such a bill as that. If we bring out a bill, I am sure it will be independent.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why don't you try to make the Federal Reserve System independent? It has a set-up which is bad. You have now 12 banks, and a political board, and you have in the boards of the 12 banks 3 different types of directors, and you have lack of concerted purpose.

Mr. HANCOCK. May I right there ask this question regarding the point Mr. Busby was making. Mr. Busby and I have exchanged views a number of times on the question of the Government absorbing private capital through bond issues.

Would you mind explaining to me just what happens when the banks buy Government issues? The reason I ask that question is this, that I have understood, as, for instance, lately with respect to the $800,000,000 issue, they bought a portion at 2¼ and a portion at 3, and that the banks that bid for those issues actually put out about 5 percent in money, and they accept the bonds, then issue currency for the remainder. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't think so. In that case we would have had an enormous increase in national bank issues and the total of national bank notes, the last time I saw a statement, was around $900,000,000.

Mr. HANCOCK. Suppose your bank should buy a hundred million dollars worth of bonds and you decided at the time, instead of needing the bonds, you wanted currency, you could send those bonds over to the Federal Reserve bank and get currency?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't believe we have more than twenty-five or thirty million of them.

Mr. HANCOCK. What would that million cost?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is a tax on it, and a requirement of 5 percent reserve. I think they figure about one-half of 1 percent.

Mr. HANCOCK. In that case the Government would be paying you interest on the bonds it issues, and through the present system would be extending the bank that gave you the currency the credit with which to do it.

Mr. ANDERSON. That was the original plan at the time the National Bank System was established, to make a market for the bonds and make it profitable for the banks to do that, but today they don't do much of it.

Mr. HANCOCK. Why?

Mr. ANDERSON. The notes will not stay out. If you put them out they keep coming back for redemption, and the country will not absorb a great quantity. That would be an answer, and another is, of course, that this new circulation is only for a short time, anyway.

Mr. HANCOCK. Would you mind expressing an opinion with respect to whether the Government should use its own credit, or continue to lend its credit to private banks?

Mr. ANDERSON. Do you mean whether the Government should borrow, or print greenbacks?

Mr. HANCOCK. No, I don't mean print greenbacks, that is a contentious connotation today, but what would be the objection to the Treasury Department issuing its own bonds and hold them and, then issuing United States notes against them?

Mr. ANDERSON. That currency would constitute a reserve, it would go out of circulation; that is, go out and come back to the bank and be added to an already dangerous excess of reserve deposits.

Mr. HANCOCK. That is your same contention against the use of the funds provided in the stabilization fund?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK. You contend any money used out of that fund will find itself back in the member bank reserves.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, and the proper policy is to use the general money market, funds borrowed from the public and from the banks, and then you do not tend to increase the member bank reserves which are already dangerously large.

Mr. HANCOCK. The point I am trying to get in my head is why as a practical and sound common-sense policy in the public interest should the Government lend its credit to private banks and then buy it back.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, the Government does that only to the extent they issue national bank notes against it. I would be willing to see you take away the privilege of issuing additional national bank notes. I think it would be a mistake to liquidate immediately the outstanding volume, but I would be quite willing to see you pass a law that there shall be no increase in the national-bank notes. This other thing you speak of is a matter of borrowing, and the Government has borrowed this year two vast issues, much more than twice the amount of all national-bank notes outstanding.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is it not possible today for Federal Reserve banks to buy long-term Government bonds, say 4-percent bonds, and then to have a demand for commercial loans equivalent to the amount of those bonds, and to issue its currency against the bonds to take care of the rediscounts, the result being, if those facts are true, and I understand such is done as a matter of practice, that the Federal Reserve bank is drawing interest on the Government bonds, and also receiving the legal rate of interest on the discounts at the same time?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't know whether I have your question there.

Mr. HANCOCK. You can get 100 percent in currency for bonds today, can't you?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I think so—you mean Federal Reserve notes?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes. Suppose a Federal Reserve bank had a hundred million dollars of bonds, they could issue a hundred million dollars of currency?

Mr. ANDERSON. They can't issue currency unless somebody wants it.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am assuming, of course, there is a demand.

Mr. ANDERSON. The demand that comes to the Federal Reserve bank is not for note issues but for deposits.

The Federal Reserve can't put out currency just because it wants to, it is limited by what the people want. There are actually outstanding Federal notes far below what they could issue under the law. The law is one thing and the demand of the people is another thing, and they can't do it without the demand.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. This may have been covered before I came in, but I would like to ask, Mr. Anderson, what is the significance or the cause, other than the profit to the seller, of this unusual amount of gold coming into the country, and what is its effect?

Mr. ANDERSON. The significance of what?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The significance, outside of the profit, of this flow of gold into the country, and what is its effect on banking, and particularly on commodity prices?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am hoping it will subside very soon without a much greater flow of gold. I have been checking carefully what the forces were in the market. Part of it is through covering of short sales of dollars by speculators on the other side while they were covering that position that held the dollar up. Then a further source is some American capital coming home, but that has been very greatly exaggerated, and the total is nothing like what was commonly supposed.

Then, thirdly, foreign money is coming in because they began to have confidence in us, and that was particularly shown by the fact they were buying our bonds as much as our currency.

The people who are the closest to it express the opinion things are going to quiet down very soon.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. In other words, it is a favorable rather than an unfavorable sign?

Mr. ANDERSON. It would indicate a return of confidence, yes, a confidence coming out of the fact the dollar was no longer expected to fluctuate but was expected to be fixed in gold, and that is one of the points I made when I came here, and I ask you, don't spoil that since it has been built up.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The movement of gold into this country is a general sign of increasing confidence in the soundness of the monetary system in this country?

Mr. ANDERSON. Usually it would be, but sometimes it is fear of other countries. And sometimes, like in 1928, 1929, it is because we were having an orgy of specultaion and other countries were sending in money. There were many foreign banks in 1929 sending money here, gigantic orders coming in from Vienna and other centers, to buy stock.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. There is no reason to consider this movement of gold as a preliminary step of foreign nations going entirely off of the gold standard?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I think not.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. It is no reason whatever?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would say not.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. If a new deposit of gold of considerable extent such as in California in 1849, or Nevada in 1860, should be discovered, would it have any marked or appreciable effect on the monetary level and the general stimulation or stabilization of business?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the course of years it would work toward a rise of commodity prices and expanding credit.

If you will look at the history of the United States after we settled the gold standard question in 1896, and the gold standard was saved, our prices began to rise. We gained over a hundred percent in gold, in 3, 4, or 5 years there, and bank credit expanded and commodity prices rose, and the same thing would be the natural expectation from another new gold discovery.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. If you should add a material amount of silver to the base of the monetary structure, would that have the same effect, or not, as an increase in the amount of gold added to the base of our monetary structure?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it would have a very different effect, because it would undermine confidence. The big thing, after all, in determining your volume of media of exchange, aggregate purchasing power and so on, is a man's willingness to use credit, willingness to borrow at the bank, and the bank's willingness to lend, and that goes on smoothly as long as you have confidence in the standard of value and the quality of money.

On the other hand, when doubt comes as to the quality of the money, we get a terrible condition, as we saw in 1931 and 1932.

I should feel that the interjection of silver as a part of the ultimate standard of value would have a distressing effect.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Would it have that effect for the sociological reason it would create doubt in the minds of some people of the stability of the monetary base?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. As a matter of fact, a small boy recently made an adult remark in that regard when he saw the recent movement in silver. He said, "Well, Dad, money won't be so pure, will it?" That question of quality is all-important both to money and credit.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The time is too limited to go into a discussion of this subject now, but at some later date I would like to have an opportunity to present this particular phase in more detail before the committee. The hour is very late, and I would like to ask Mr. Anderson one or two questions, but I would like to ask for 1 day next week for a discussion of this particular phase more fully.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If you will let us know, we will arrange it, with great pleasure.

Dr. Anderson, I want to ask one or two questions. You thought it was a mistake to go off gold in March 1933?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And you think if we were to go back on gold at the same price as it was when we went off gold, it would improve the situation?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am a political realist. There is no use talking about that at all.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You would like to see it done, if it were possible?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it would be a good thing if we could work out a consistent policy. I would not want to jack it right up at once, but if it could be done gradually in a period of 2 or 3 years with a sufficiently careful policy, I think it would be a good thing to do, but I don't propose it, because it is politically impossible. My proposal is to sit where you are, and don't change it any more.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think in one of your bulletins, probably the last one, you thought we should stabilize it at 62½?

Mr. ANDERSON. I used the exchange rate at that time, 65 I think, and I was thinking it would avoid going through what we have just been through.

We have been through a dangerous 2 or 3 weeks. Depressing the dollar suddenly from 64 or 65 to 59.06 meant a great disturbance in the exchange markets, and endangered needlessly the currency position of other countries. I wanted to avoid that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I asked Dr. Tucker the same question, whether he wanted to go back to the valuation prior to March 1933, and he said "No," and he gave as his reason that capital would flow back into this country too rapidly.

Mr. ANDERSON. There would be that tendency, and that is one of the objections to the variation of the gold content.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Suppose this law was passed providing for a monetary authority responsible only to the people, disassociated from any political control, wouldn't that constitute permanent legislation which would restore confidence? Isn't it your subconscious theory that anything which is a departure from what you understand to be the traditional gold standard, however permanent it will be, will not inspire confidence, and it is only by going back to the traditional gold standard that confidence can ever be restored? Isn't that what you have in mind?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, no; it is much more complicated than that, and much more technically involved than that.

I don't think there is a phase of this thing I have not at one time or another considered. I have been working at it for nearly 30 years now.

Might I put in one thoroughly noncontroversial point I think your committee would be sympathetic with? We want to tighten up one of the relics of the war which has made a lot of trouble. When you put the reserve ratio to member banks as low as you did in 1917, 13, 10, and 7 percent for demand deposits, and 3 percent for time deposits, you made possible extraordinarily rapid expansion of bank deposits. When expansion takes the form of time deposits, which it will do when there is an excess, because you get interest that way, you make a very dangerous banking situation.

The original Glass bill proposed last year called for raising the requirements for time deposits to the same level as demand deposits over a 5-year period. That would have forced liquidation of credits, putting pressure on the banks. I proposed as a compromise, to leave the requirements where they are for existing deposits, but provide that for future increases in time deposits in any individual bank, the rate shall be the same as for demand deposits, 7 percent for the country banks, 10 percent for the reserve cities, and 13 percent for the central reserve cities, and get that barrier in before these excess reserves get to be used too vigorously, because whatever the monetary authority, the pressure on whoever is involved will be so great they need protection, and I would like for you to consider that proposition.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You don't think one thing we should do is to try to get into circulation more active money relative to the amount of bank credit which we are using as money, do you?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't see any advantage to that. What does it mean—that instead of drawing a check and mailing it, the housewife will keep the money at home, and then she will go down to the stores one by one and pay her bills with cash; so what is the advantage of that, and why should we have the worry of cash in the home overnight, as the housewife would do, if she had a large amount of money? Moreover, that would be a deflation, in a measure.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You think it is a good thing, do you, to have a condition in this country where it is even theoretically impossible for people to pay their debts?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think no debt ought to be created without a very clear understanding it will be repaid, and when it will be repaid, and how it will be repaid.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. All right, I want to ask you this, about nine-tenths of our circulating medium is bank credit, and one-tenth actual currency, so that if the country became prosperous and all of the debts were paid, where would credit currency be then?

Mr. ANDERSON. If all of the debts were paid there would be new debts created.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is what I contend, you can't pay your debts without creating new corresponding debts, without deflation, can you?

Mr. ANDERSON. This is the way bank credit ought to go, up and down.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I don't know whether you are in a position to answer or not, but what I mean is this. You said a few minutes ago that it ought to be possible to pay all debts, but my contention is under our system, while my debt may be paid promptly, if it is, you have got to assume a corresponding debt in order to prevent deflation of the circulating medium. You have got to keep your credit currency up under our system, in order to prevent deflation.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would not quite agree with the formula, but the general idea is we do not want all debts paid and new ones created; is that what you suggest?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I don't say you don't want debts paid and new ones created. I said under our system you can't pay the debts of the country without creating new ones.

Mr. ANDERSON. You could liquidate a good deal in normal times without creating new debts.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. We have liquidated about $23,000,000,000 of bank credit by bankruptcies, that is what we have done, and the country is in a condition of collapse. We have got twelve or fourteen million people on the streets out of work. The point I am making, under our system there is no way to pay the debts of the country without creating a depression; in other words, if you are not going to have depressions, somebody else is going to assume the debts to keep up the circulating medium.

Mr. ANDERSON. To a certain extent you cover liquidation without bankruptcy.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. What is the necessity of having that situation at all. I do not mean to say we will not always have to make debts, and I believe in interest, and I believe when people borrow money they should pay it back and pay the legitimate hire of it in interest, but what I say is that we ought not to have a monetary system which makes it inevitable under all conditions that the producers of the country must continue in debt in order to prevent a deflation, and that they cannot get out of debt. I don't care how prosperous they get, as soon as they become prosperous our monetary system creates immediately a condition of nonprosperity because of the deflation which accompanies it.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I would not say that. I would say our troubles are so much less that have grown out of money and credit than out of other things. You speak of stability, and I will give you a figure; a gyroscope over one wheel of an automobile does not make for stability, it would make for instability, because the road may rise, and what you want to make stable in the automobile is flexibility, give and take, the whole thing moving and yielding.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Suppose you have a picture such as this one, that is the monetary base and this is the credit structure, all of it is circulating, and the monetary base practically does not vary, and suppose you were to get a prosperous condition in this country, producers became prosperous and they were able to go to the bank and pay up their debts, you would immediately have a deflation which would require the producers of the country to get in debt again. You can have no real prosperity in this country, because as soon as it comes, it immediately creates a deflation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Can you give me any case in history where in a period of prosperity the total borrowings at the banks have gone down and produced deflation? It has never occurred.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is very easy to answer that question, because as soon as prosperity comes that debt burden has got to be assumed by somebody.

Mr. ANDERSON. Nobody does it, though.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Why not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Because men do not borrow for amusement, they borrow because they see a chance to make a profit with the money.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. They borrow because in the last analysis their condition makes it necessary for them to borrow, speaking of the producer who is, of course, the debtor, because of the period of deflation which comes on and enforces borrowing.

If you had some means, and I don't say it must be the compensated dollar, but if we had some means whereby when we became prosperous the debt currency paid off could be replaced by actual money then it would be theoretically possible for all of the debts of the country to be paid and still we would not have deflation.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the plan by which you could avoid that?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I haven't any plan, but I could suggest a plan. As a matter of fact, if the debts of the country were paid and a compensated dollar could be used so that gold certificates could be used by the Government in paying the Government's obligations, then actual money would go into circulation and take the place of the credit money.

Mr. ANDERSON. You get then a tremendous expansion of credit or idle reserves of the bank, which would be unwise. The banks would be buying investments, they would be making mortgage loans again, and one thing and another.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. You can have laws to restrain the banks from using the money of the depositors in that way.

Mr. ANDERSON. You can hardly pass laws to restrain an unwise use of credit that does not at the same time restrain wise and necessary uses of credit. The more you look at a plan of that sort the more difficulties appear. You try to see it all and work out the details, but it is too complicated. The best you can do is to get some good objective conditions and then let the man making the profits work under those conditions, and the way to keep banks from making bad investments is to limit the amount of money they have to work with.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That means nothing more than keeping the producing class under the bondage of debt all of the time, and you cannot have any prosperity if you restrict currency, whether credit currency, or actual currency, and the producing class can only reach the degree of prosperity which is permissible under such conditions.

You have said three or four times it is quality money that is needed. Don't you know in the Middle Ages when they pulled out their pouch and had a little gold, the quality was wonderful, there was no difficulty about the quality, but it was the quantity that kept the people throughout the Middle Ages in the terrible conditions they were in?

I think I have your point with reference to this new money you want to put out to enable the community to get out of debt, the Government to put out this extra currency in paying off the Government's debts. That does not put money into the debtor's hands, paying off the public debt, but into creditor's hands—it goes to the man holding the Government bonds. Their first thought is to put it in the bank, and when the bank gets it their first thought is to put it in the Federal Reserve. I don't think you will find any money-market students who will disagree with that.

I think we should say we are very grateful to you for leaving your work and coming down here and giving us the benefit of your very wide study and experience, and the committee appreciates very much the contribution you have made to the record.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to have the privilege of putting into the record one bulletin called Equilibrium Creates Purchasing Power.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Without objection, it will be put in the record.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I have an amendment to the silver clause on page 3 of this bill which was drawn in consultation with Senator Pitman and Senator WALSH, and I wish to offer it as a substitute for the silver paragraph in the bill, and bring up some witnesses in support of this amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I understood a few moments ago this is the matter you wanted to bring out.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Would it be satisfactory to have next Tuesday at 10:30 a. m. for the time to consider your amendment?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes; that would be satisfactory.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And also to hear your witnesses?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes; that is satisfactory.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Then we will hear your witnesses next Tuesday at 10:30 a. m.

The hearing is now adjourned to Tuesday, February 20, at 10: 30 a. m.

The President's Superhighway Program

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD an editorial from the Belleville (Kans.) Telescope, by A. Q. Miller, dealing with post-war highway programs.

In this editorial Mr. Miller discusses intelligently and forcefully the objections to overemphasis on the proposed superhighways, "interregional highways," I believe the President called them in a message to Congress. It is my belief that Mr. Miller's views are in line with the views of a great majority of the people of the Nation who have made any kind of a study of our highway problems and programs. I recommend the editorial to my colleagues as being worthy of their careful attention.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S SUPERHIGHWAY PROGRAM

(By A. Q. Miller, Sr.)

The President's special message to Congress approving and emphasizing a four-lane superhighway system as a post-war work program, once again has revived the jurisdictional issue between the legislative and executive branches of government—and at the same time has brought sharp reactions from the country.

There is no disagreement throughout the country of the importance of post-war plans to employ labor and materials in doing post-war construction work—and there is no more important work ahead than the construction of highways, which have deteriorated during the past few years. However, the issue which shocked the country was the President's proposal to construct four-lane superhighways, connecting metropolitan cities at an approximate cost of $150,000 a mile, and representing but 1 percent of the total road mileage of the country. As an example of what such a program would be, according to a map submitted in the President's report, Kansas would get one east-west highway and no north-south highway, and there would be no north-south highway west of Des Moines and Kansas City and the Rocky Mountains.

Companion road bills are now pending in Congress (House bill 2426 and Senate bill 971) for a broad and comprehensive road-construction program. These bills are being studied by the Road Committees in both Houses, and doubtless will be approved by both the committees and Congress—and they will provide a real post-war road-construction program, placing superhighways, not at the top, but at the bottom of the program.

Unfortunately the President, in his special message to Congress, picked out section 7 of the bills (the section dealing with super- or inter-regional highways) and placed great stress upon this feature of the bills. A map was issued showing tentative locations of these superhighways and Washington publicity men exploited the grandeur and glories of superhighways between metropolitan cities, where the motorist could drive 75 miles an hour without traffic lights or interruptions. This conception of a post-war road program was so far above the heads of the average taxpayer who lives in the wide-open spaces of the country, and who, as Bill Jeffers once said, "eats in the kitchen," that it brought a quick and resounding response, not only from the public, but also from Members of Congress.

Provisions of the road bills now pending in Congress provide for the appropriation of $1,000,000,000 a year for 3 years, the program to be worked out jointly by the Bureau of Public Roads and the various State highway commissions, on a basis of 75 percent Federal aid and 25 percent State funds. This sounds like a sensible proposal and is in line with the past cooperative plan under which our present Federal, State, and interstate highways have been built. The disturbing element in the President's proposal is his suggestion that $750,000,000 be taken out of the fund annually—three-fourths of the total amount—for the super-highway program. James D. White, Washington publicity man, exploiting the utopian idea, said: "The planners figure it would cost about $750,000,000 a year for a building period which might last 10 to 20 years—the program would make motoring safer and much more fun."

With this kind of publicity coming out of Washington, the impression was clearly created that the President's plan was to supersede or be an alternate plan for the pending road bills. The effect of the White House message has been to awaken new interests throughout the country in a post-war road program. Road associations, chambers of commerce, and individuals have held protest meetings and in resolutions, telegrams, and letters have petitioned Congress to give full consideration to a broad and comprehensive road-construction plan, which will give preference to the present Federal, State, and interstate highway system, as well as farm-to-market roads. Recognizing the fact that in certain eastern metropolitan areas traffic problems exist, which might properly become a part of the road-construction problem, sentiment generally expressed is that superhighways should be subordinated to the completion of the present unfinished system of highways.

As previously stated, it is unfortunate that the President "jumped the gun" while Congress is considering these post-war road bills instead of permitting legislation to take its normal, constitutional course.

Judicial Review of Administrative Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Lawyer Service Letter, published by the New York Bar Association, and reprinted in the Wall Street Journal of March 17, 1944. The article deals with what may become an epoch-making decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Stark et al. against Wickard. On the 28th day of February 1944 the Supreme Court reversed its former position on the right of those who are affected adversely by rulings of Government bureaus and agencies, and by directives, who have hitherto been denied a remedy in the courts unless that remedy was specifically provided in the law. Mr. Justice Frankfurter wrote the dissenting opinion and Mr. Justice Reed wrote the prevailing opinion.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THINKING IT OVER

(By Thomas F. Woodlock)

The Lawyer Service Letter (published by the New York State Bar Association) in its issue of March 1 draws attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which it thinks "probably destined to be a landmark in the field of judicial review of administrative action." The present writer will permit himself the presumption, as a layman, of concurring in this opinion, and in the belief that the reader will also concur invites his attention to the facts as reported by the Letter.

The case (Stark et al. v. Wickard) arose over certain deductions made in favor of "cooperatives" by the market administrator in the Greater Boston area in connection with a settlement fund in the milk producers industry. Certain firms protested that the act did not authorize these payments, and appealed to the courts. The Secretary of Agriculture contended that the act did not permit a court review because it had not specifically authorized it, and that petitioners had no remedy in law for the damages they claimed to have sustained. The case was before the Supreme Court on this point alone. The majority decided that the Department of Agriculture was wrong; Justices Frankfurter and Black dissented. The opinions of both sides are interesting by reason of the importance of the principle involved.

The majority, speaking through Justice Reed, did not touch the question of the power of Congress to grant or deny the right of appeal from administrative decisions. It took the ground that silence of the statute on the point did not constitute a denial of that right. "The authority for a judicial examination of the validity of the Secretary's (Department of Agriculture) action," it said, "is found in the existence of courts and the intent of Congress as deduced from the statutes and precedents as hereinafter considered."

On the courts rests the responsibility of determining the limits of statutory grants of authority to administrative bodies. The powers granted to such bodies may be expanded or contracted at the will of the legislative and executive branches. "But under article III [of the Constitution] Congress established courts to adjudicate cases and controversies as to claims of infringement of individual rights, whether by unlawful action of private persons or by the exertion of unauthorized administrative power." Mr. Justice Reed answered the objections commonly urged against court review of administrative actions, but that part of his opinion is of subordinate importance and interest as being essentially obiter. The essence of the opinion is that the right of court review in such cases is not denied by silence of the statute on the point.

The dissenting opinion, written by Justice Frankfurter challenged this view. Where the text of a statute is silent he characterized "judicial review" as a "mischievous abstraction." He said: "There is no such thing as a common law of judicial review in the Federal courts. * * * In the numerous cases either granting or denying judicial review, grant or denial were reached not by applying some 'natural law' or judicial review, nor on the basis of some general body of doctrines for construing the diverse provisions of the great variety of Federal regulatory statutes. Judicial review when recognized—its scope and its incidence—was derived from the materials furnished by the particular statute in regard to which the opportunity for judicial review was asserted.

"This is the lesson to be drawn from the prior decisions of this Court on judicial review and not any doctrinaire notions of general applicability to statutes based on different schemes of administration and conveying different purposes by Congress in the utilization of administrative and judicial remedies for the enforcement of law. However useful judicial review may be, it is for Congress and not for this Court to decide when it may be used—except when the Constitution commands it. In this case there is no such command."

Down to the words "—except when the Constitution commands it" with the concluding sentence, Justice Frankfurter seems to assert the power of Congress to grant or deny at will the right of appeal from the acts of its administrative agents, but then comes in the "except." Are we to suppose that the Constitution protects only a certain class of individual "rights" leaving others open to public or private violation without remedy? And, if so, who is to determine which rights are which, if not the courts? Are we to suppose that Congress is the final judge of the constitutionality of its own laws? If not, what does Justice Frankfurter mean? To this ignorant layman's ear, his words have an ominous suggestion of the "new despotism" described by Lord Hewart of Bury some 15 years ago. Moreover, such phrases as "mischievous abstractions,'" "doctrinaire notion" and the sneer at "natural law" sound very like a modern "swing" rendering "by ear" of what once was accepted as a noble musical theme. Which is why this layman says "Amen" to the majority.

Votes for Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Kansas City Times of March 17, 1944, correctly, in my judgment, designating the action of the President in conducting a poll of the Governors on the soldier vote bill a political move. I believe the editorial expresses a correct understanding of the situation, and that time will show that the country as a whole has the same view that is expressed concisely in the editorial, which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICS OR THE LAW?

Like other administration tactics on soldier vote legislation, the President's call upon the Governors for an immediate opinion on acceptability of the bill just passed by Congress is a political move. It is designed to build up a possible excuse for veto of the bill and at the same time to put the Governors on the spot, more than one-half of them being Republicans.

Some of the Governors, like Governor Schoeppel, of Kansas, could reply at once because their States have absentee voting laws that would take care of the situation. But others, like Governor Donnell, of Missouri, could make no such immediate reply because the legislatures of their States are yet to act with provisions for absentee voting by men overseas and thousands of miles away from this country. The Missouri Legislature and several others are now in session, while still others are scheduled to meet in forthcoming weeks or months.

Of course, the President knows all this. Yet he calls for an immediate response by wire, stating whether the congressional bill is now acceptable under laws of the several States; or, if not, whether the necessary steps will be taken to make it acceptable before July 15. In other words, what the President wants—right now—is a statement from various Governors guaranteeing what the legislatures of their States are going to do. It is not a question of what the legislatures ought to do. The Governors may have their opinions about that, along with the legislatures.

Some of the Governors and the legislatures might feel that absentee voting and control of elections generally were State functions altogether and that there was no legal or other necessity for conforming with the Federal bill.

But the President wants to know the whole business right now and by wire. He could not reasonably expect to obtain such information from all, or even a majority, of the Governors, within the 10 days he is allowed for passing on the congressional bill himself. But instead of reaching his own decision on that bill he would pass the buck to the Governors and use their replies or the absence of them as the basis for a veto if he should be inclined to that action.

This is in line with the New Deal political maneuvering on soldier votes from the outset. The scheme was to get control of those votes by short-cut and illegal methods, and if that failed then to shout that the servicemen had been deprived of the right to vote. There has been no such purpose behind the bill just passed by Congress and there is no such purpose in the States. The aim has been that the one form of voting, like all the others, should be proper and legal under the Constitution. Does the President want that kind of voting or some other kind?

Views of the Public on the Soldier-Vote Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND E. WILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD three editorials from Indiana newspapers, all of which appear to shed light on the public's view of the soldier-vote situation in this country.

From the Indianapolis News of March 20, 1944, an editorial entitled "That Federal Ballot"; from the Indianapolis Star of March 21, 1944, entitled "Let the States Act"; and a third editorial on the same subject from the South Bend Tribune of March 17, 1944, entitled "Soldier Vote."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THAT FEDERAL BALLOT

Indiana's Republican General Assembly and party organization leaders seem to be worried over whether to enact an armed force personnel vote bill that will validate the Federal ballot provided for in the act recently passed by Congress.

The congressional act would recognize this ballot as valid only if the voter's home State had no provision for absent voting or he could not obtain an absent-voter's ballot from his home State. The Federal ballot would not be good, even under these conditions, of course, unless it complied with the laws of the voter's home State.

Indiana is well able to look after its own voting, as the Constitution and the safety of free government demand. It will see that its people in the armed forces have every opportunity to cast a lawful ballot as if they were at home and free to exercise their rights of citizenship at election time.

In principle, it would be a good thing if Indiana refused to extend any statutory encouragement to the casting of a ballot put out by a New Deal administration. The New Dealers have no conscience whatever when it comes to using public money and official pressure to carry an election. They should not be aided in any conspiracy to seize election control from the States, but the service voter who fails in a good-faith effort to obtain his home-State ballot deserves consideration.

The issue is well put in the question of who would refuse to count the vote of a man who has sent a Federal ballot in from the fighting front.

LET THE STATES ACT

An interesting feature of the Presidential appeal to the Governors of 48 States to find out what their States are prepared or will prepare to do in enabling servicemen to vote is that the replies reveal that State sentiment is pretty much the same as congressional. When Congress declined to accept as a "Federal ballot" his informal slip of paper on which soldiers and others could write in the names of those for whom they would vote, the President accused the lawmakers of "fraud." Now he is getting Nation-wide assurance that the only "fraud" involved is his unconstitutional proposal.

Apparently the Attorney General, or somebody in the administration, may have called the President's attention to the wording of the United States Constitution, which states explicitly what must be on a Federal ballot for the election of Presidents and Vice Presidents and how the responsibility is up to the States to determine the qualifications of their own citizens to vote. Evidently he has been impressed with the possibility that it may be necessary to take the States into consideration.

Governor Schricker was among those who assured the President that this State is anxious to see that the servicemen get a chance to vote, and he will recommend the enactment of any suitable legislation that may be needed. That was superfluous. There has been no doubt about Indiana. The Governor might have told the President, however, that there is not a chance in the world that Indiana will do anything that is in violation of the Constitution. There is no question about Hoosiers being able to vote if the Government will see that the ballots, legal constitutional ballots, get to the men and are returned in time.

Only 6 of the 42 Governors who have replied say their States will accept the Federal ballot he is urging. The answers from 13 States say no legislation is pending or proposed in an attempt to validate the suggested Federal ballot. The plain inference is that those ballots are looked on now as invalid and unconstitutional and would be so viewed in November. They would not be accepted and could not be counted.

The Presidential canvass of sentiment among the Governors of the 48 States should convince him that he was wrong in the first place when he tried to force his Federal ballot onto them. The sensible course, in fact, the only constitutional way, would be to leave the voting to the States, as the basic law of the land provides. Indiana and others may be relied on to give due consideration to their servicemen. The returns from some other States should not be vitiated or questioned because of unconstitutional interference with constitutional procedure.

SOLDIER VOTE

President Roosevelt's request for all State governors' opinions on the so-called soldier voting bill passed to him by Congress suggests that he is trying to create a certain political atmosphere. If he is not familiar with the various States' laws pertaining to voting by members of the military forces, he could easily become so by asking for information that is available in Washington. That information has been widely published. Without great effort he also could become personally familiar with the movements within the various States, including Indiana, to facilitate voting by military service members. Where the Federal voting bill specifically is concerned the President, as Representative CHARLES A. HALLECK of Indiana, points out, once "professed to know just what every State could do and could not do."

Most of the governors receiving the President's request for judgment of the terms of the Federal ballot measure are Republicans. Possibly their responses will be used by him as an excuse for a veto. Repassage over a veto would not be certain, judging by the division of votes in the two Houses of Congress on the measure emerging from the inter-House conference. Whether or not this measure becomes law, the apparent Roosevelt strategy will be to try to convince the armed service members that congressional opponents of the Administration's bob-tailed ballot scheme have "disfranchised" them. By late next summer, of course, the voting laws of the large majority of States will be more favorable for armed service members wishing to vote. They will be able to vote not merely on the presidency, as proposed in practical effect by the Administration strategists, but on State and local offices as well.

Science and a Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article taken from the New York Herald Tribune of Thursday, March 23, written by Waldemar Kaempffert, and published in the Herald Tribune as an advertisement paid for by the International Latex Corporation of my own State.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SCIENCE AND A LASTING PEACE

"(By Waldemar Kaempffert)

"Despite the reluctance of the great powers to yield their ancient sovereignties in the interest of world unity the signs are plain enough that as science and technology sweep on, unification proceeds rapidly.

"It means something that an Englishman, a Frenchman, an American, an Australian are scarcely distinguishable so far as their clothes are concerned. It means something that automobiles are very much alike; that electric lights in millions of homes here and abroad glow in accordance with the same principle. It means something that Hottentots, Chinese, Americans, and Englishmen rock with laughter at the same film or thrill to a symphony short-waved from New York to London. It means something that in all advanced countries people travel in similar trains, steamers, or planes, cook by gas supplied by a gasometer, suck dirt out of carpets by electricity shot from a central station. It means something that mass production and standardization, which are the hallmarks of a developed industrial technology, have been adopted by every industrial nation. At the bottom of all this lies the conviction that science and technology are good in themselves and are worth cultivating for social and economic reasons.

"A WORLD-UNIFYING FORCE

"Clearly, we have in science a world-unifying force that should be systematically and rationally applied. Already there are in the world, perhaps, 250,000 first-class research chemists, biologists, physicists, and engineers. These men and women in normal times meet in international conventions and give freely of their knowledge to the world. No questions are asked about the race, nationality, or creed of these internationalists. We have here the nucleus of an organization that could weld the world psychologically and socially into a unit.

"Science ought to be discussed at the peace table and not just politics, spheres of influence, and economic rights—the kind of science that will really usher in a new order. Science has never had more than half a chance. It has had to develop in the face of frustration, even of downright suppression. Let us then at the peace table organize research on a world-wide scale with the intention of raising all countries to a single high intellectual and economic level, of giving all peoples a common outlook, and of thus preparing them for the acceptance of a single political order. We need experience in thinking and acting together if we are to convince ourselves that more is to be gained by regarding the land, the sea, and the air as a whole than by regions and countries.

"Suppose, therefore, we organize a world scientific commission and suppose that we finance it by contributions from participating nations. One-quarter of 1 percent of pre-war budgets would be enough.

"The commission would first map out what has been accomplished. Gaps in our knowledge would appear. The program of research would be framed to fill them as well as to advance existing knowledge. As the results poured in some of the major disgraces of our scientific record would be expunged.

"It is a disgrace that millions must still groan with arthritis. It is a disgrace that the conquest of cancer is not yet in sight. It is a disgrace that we have only the vaguest notion of what happens when a piece of beefsteak is chewed and digested. Because we know so little of the mechanics of heredity—why we inherit blue eyes or stub noses and some afflictions from our parents—it is a disgrace that we cannot pick out of the American population the 18,000,000 who are themselves mentally sound but who are believed to be the carriers of mental disease that can be passed on. It is a disgrace that millions of chemical compounds remain to be discovered—compounds of immense potentialities in medicine, agriculture, and industry. It is a disgrace that we cannot predict what the weather will be a fortnight hence in Chicago and New York.

"FRUITS OF ORGANIZED RESEARCH

"If we organize research to remove these and many other disgraces, we shall not only improve the lot of mankind, but change world outlook. Enlist the aid of the sociologist to predict the consequences of discovery and invention, so far as that is possible, and it lies within our power to direct social change, to imbue the world with new social purpose, to prepare the world for unit.

"No vast palace of research is necessary. Universities that accept grants under the plan would still conduct research on their own account. So would the great foundations and industries. The Commission would be fully aware of its social function, meaning that the unknown would be penetrated with no thought of profit, yet with the conviction that direct material and intellectual benefits would accrue. The Commission would concern itself not with inventions as such but with the discovery of principles that inventors, engineers, physicians, and farmers could apply.

"Year after year the work would go on. The lagging biological sciences would receive an enormous impetus, and the social scientists and psychologists would be able to make field studies and conduct experiments on a scale unprecedented. We want to accelerate the process of unification that has begun with steamships, radio, airplanes, motion pictures, and engineering.

"SCIENCE AND HUMAN PROGRESS

"The World Scientific Commission must concern itself with the broad pattern of education as well as with the organization and support of research. That pattern must be shot through and through with social purpose. What does relativity mean to me? Why are physicists bombarding atoms? What good will it do when they find out how matter and how the universe is put together? Such questions probe deep into meanings that are rarely revealed in the classroom. Both the social point of view and the scientific approach to any problem must be acquired by the masses of Asia, Europe, and the Americas. It may take decades but the project is worth undertaking.

"Give us international cooperation in science and soon there will be cooperation in other fields. For invariably change in science means social change, so that new discoveries in turn call for cooperation in government to make the most of them. With peace maintained by an international police force and experience in cooperation gained by the international organization of science (the one subject on which we can agree), the world will begin to think of unity not as something utopian, but as something necessary."

As a public service, we present this sound proposal for a lasting peace based on living knowledge.

British Air Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, some of the steamship companies in this country have been urging that the Congress should adopt a policy which would authorize steamship companies to operate air lines.

One of the principal arguments made by our steamship companies is the allegation that British steamship companies will be operating air lines and that, unless our Government takes the step suggested, our steamship companies would suffer a competitive disadvantage.

Aside from the fact that the conclusion does not follow from the premise, the premise itself is incorrect. The British Government has not decided to depart from its chosen instrument policy whereby a single company, as a practical matter, operates all of the British international air service. According to a dispatch appearing in the Wall Street Journal of March 17, 1944, the intention to adhere to the chosen instrument policy has been reiterated by Sir Archibald Sinclair, Secretary of State for Air, Air Ministry. This indicates no intention whatsoever of having steamship-operated air lines under the flag of Great Britain on the great international trade routes.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here the article from the Wall Street Journal.

It follows:

LONDON.—Air Minister Sinclair told the House of Commons last night that some subsidized public corporation, or corporations, would continue to operate the long overseas air routes after the war. The Air Minister said a government instrument, such as British Overseas Airways which now represents British flag air commerce abroad, would have to fly the long routes which couldn't pay on a commercial basis. His statement, made during the civil aviation debate, pointed out that while there is no statutory bar against private interests operating unsubsidized services, the Government or Parliament could hardly be expected to let private operators fly the lucrative routes, such as from New York to London, leaving the Government to fly unprofitable mileage out to India.

Mr. Sinclair said he believed unsubsidized operation of the great routes across Asia, Africa, and the oceans were a long time off. He argued that even a government corporation would meet plenty of competition, requiring wise control. Such control, said the Air Minister, would be made more difficult if the principle of state-owned or controlled monopoly, to which other countries and dominions are committed, were abandoned.

The Air Minister also announced that in addition to converting four types of military aircraft, the Government plans seven new types of civil planes. First, the big Bristol trans-Atlantic pressurized land plane; second, a land plane weighing perhaps 100,000 pounds with a pressurized cabin, for the North Atlantic route via Newfoundland; third, a 70,000-pound pressurized plane for medium-range trunk routes; fourth, a 40,000-pound pressurized 30-passenger plane for European and other short or medium services; fifth, a jet-propelled plane with a speed exceeding all existing craft; sixth, a 14-passenger feeder land plane for the colonies and United Kingdom; seventh, an 8,000-pound plane for feeder or taxi service.

If I Were President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, on Tuesday evening, March 21, I delivered an address on the lecture course at North Park College, Chicago, Ill., which has provoked considerable comment. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, where it may be read by persons interested.

It is said that 96 Senators and 48 Governors secretly ponder the thought, "What I would do if I were President." Do not be alarmed. I am not a candidate. All rules have exceptions. I do not mean to be flippant or disrespectful toward the highest civil office on this earth; but quite to the contrary, I earnestly feel that it would be a good thing for America and the world if every voter this fall should most seriously ask himself that question. I am not trying to dig up more candidates, but I am urging that we do more constructive thinking about this all-important office and more constructive thinking about whom we select to fill it.

There is no office in all the world quite so important to 135,000,000 Americans and the other 2,000,000,000 inhabitants of the earth as is the office of President of the United States. Tonight insofar as I am able, I hope to keep away from the international aspects of the office and deal only with its domestic phases. And while I hope to be pointedly objective, I am not speaking for nor against any political party, neither am I speaking for nor against any candidate.

In the approaching election the people's liberty and the people's freedom will either regain some lost ground or slip a little closer to the apparently inevitable precipice of one-man rule. It would be wrong to say that this Republic stands at the crossroads tonight. It has long since passed the crossroads. It has already traveled too many miles down the wrong road. The choice in November will determine whether we shall keep going down that wrong road or retrace our steps and get back on the right road.

At the outset let me emphasize that there is nothing wrong with our glorious Republic, that an application of more and more democracy will not cure. The founding fathers weighed every danger and made every effort to forestall all hazards when they wrote the great document thenceforth known as the American Constitution. Even though many of its provisions were the result of compromise, Gladstone's classic observation has lost none of its poignancy with the passing of the years that it is "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." Most emphatically there is nothing wrong with our basic law. Our trouble comes from an abandonment of its sacred provisions.

To avoid the possible tyranny of one-man rule the statesmen of 1787 created the trinity of separate executive, judicial, and legislative powers; and they devised a system of unique checks and balances among them. Many powers, too, were reserved to the sovereign States. In a check system, high-handed, arbitrary, and an obstinate attitude on the part of any one of the three branches would by virtue of this division result in stagnation and impotency. But the founding fathers preferred the risk of "popular incompetence to efficient tyranny."

It is difficult for 531 persons making up the Congress to practice extreme obstinacy for very long or for the 9 members of the Supreme Court to do so—but unfortunately it is relatively easy for one man in the office of Chief Executive either to seize the powers of the other coordinate branches or to stop completely the wheels of government. That is the dangerous element in our system. The only insurance that we may take against such a contingency is that the President selected by us be devoted to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, that he possess unusual qualities of leadership and that he be constructively cooperative.

With our country engaged in two major wars and American soldiers fighting on 72 battle fronts, we naturally think of the President as the Commander in Chief. Under the Constitution, the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. However, modern wars are waged by war experts and war technicians, and they are directed by professional warriors and not by civilians, including the President, so in reality the Commander in Chief is a war leader in theory only. Through this orderly arrangement between our civil and military authorities the United States has fought and won its many wars. Long ago we began training carefully selected young men at West Point, Annapolis, and in our numerous war colleges, for the grim task of directing war. Excellent progress in our two current wars is being made because the President has wisely left the making of war to the career men we have trained to fight war. The people themselves determine the war policies of the Nation and the President, as their chosen leader, carries them out. The inspired and eloquent Churchill has stated the American people's war policies perfectly. I quote the Prime Minister:

"You ask, what is our policy? I will say it is to wage war by sea, land, and air, with all our might and with all the strength that God can give us.

"To wage war against a monstrous tyranny, never surpassed in the dark, lamentable catalog of human crime. That is our policy.

"You ask, what is our aim? I can answer in one word. It is victory; victory at all costs; victory in spite of all terror; victory, however long and hard the road may be, for without victory there is no survival.

"I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears, and sweat."

So spoke the mighty Churchill.

Now, may we pass on to the important current political domestic issues. For some time there has been a growing conflict between the Chief Executive and the Congress. Hardly a day passes that the executive department is not bitterly assailed by individual Members of Congress. On the other hand, the President loses no opportunity to assault, not the Members of Congress but the Congress as such as a whole. As a result the President's strength in Congress is shrinking. In a year in which the Presidency itself is at stake, control of Congress is held by the political opponents which he has in both political parties, who are determined to influence the handling of affairs at home and shape America's policies abroad.

All political observers regardless of their political predilections say that in the next election the minority party in the House will become the majority party and that the two political parties will be evenly divided in the Senate. They predict that the President's influence in Congress, already beyond repair, will approach the vanishing point after the November election, should Mr. Roosevelt be reelected. Therefore should the present running row between the Executive and the Congress persist, America will find herself in a war crisis and in a post-war crisis and her Government in a hopeless deadlock.

Only a fool would close his eyes to this impending crisis. It overshadows all of the other political issues of the approaching campaign. Unless the candidates for the Presidency—and all of them—give the people assurance that they can provide dynamic leadership and at the same time cooperate fully with Congress as a coordinate branch of the Government, the voters must reject them in the name of survival. Make no mistake; above all else there must be full cooperation between the Executive, the Congress, and the States, or the United States of America cannot begin to meet her staggering war burdens and her staggering post-war obligations. The consequences of further conflict in government are too awful to contemplate.

In the spirit of unified war effort and to promote speed and efficiency Congress has delegated much authority to the executive department. Congress is an awkward body with extremely heavy burdens outside the realm of passing laws and so, rather than work out the details of legislation pertaining to rapidly changing, complicated, and involved subjects, it has been content to lay down a general principle and leave it to administrative agencies to set up necessary rules and regulations. Good as were its intentions this has proven most unfortunate and has all but changed our democracy from a government by constitutional law into a government by unconstitutional Executive edict.

Executive administrative agencies, ambitious for arbitrary power, have stretched and expanded and enlarged the relatively minor authority delegated to them by Congress into a limitless and vast legislative operation. The office of Attorney General has searched days on end among the acts of Congress for some flimsy pretext upon which to base executive legislative powers. Many administrative agencies have been set up without any specific legislative authority whatsoever. Corporate government agencies have been created which Congress did not authorize and they have assumed the power to obtain funds from sources other than congressional appropriations, thus robbing Congress of its constitutional, traditional, and jealous power over the purse. The President has established, created, abolished, and consolidated countless bureaus without so much as consulting Congress.

A President, if he is to be trusted by the people, should display an honest patience with Congress. If individual Members make mistakes, if some of them quail before the threats of special interest pressure, if at times its leadership appears weak and ineffective, if it hesitates and moves with muddled uncertainty, be saddened but be patient because after all Congress is but a replica of the people. Congress can never rise far above their aspirations and their ability. Congress is not only an actual cross-section of the people, it reflects their moods and their inner selves. Let me make it plain therefore that a President or a bureaucrat or a private citizen who has no faith in the institution of Congress has no faith in the people. If he becomes irked and holds Congress in contempt you may be sure he holds the people in contempt also. A President's attitude toward the institution of Congress is a dead giveaway as to how he feels toward the people.

The founding fathers with their great faith in the people clearly indicated all through the Constitution their determination that the Congress of the United States be the important department of this new Government. Too, they ordained that it be connected closely with the people, and they gave the people a check through biennial congressional elections to modify, change, or approve the policies of Congress. The men who wrote the Constitution made no lawful provision—war or no war, emergency or no emergency—for the Executive to seize the lawmaking and policy-making functions of government.

Ten days ago two very significant things occurred. The Baruch-Hancock report on demobilization and reconversion was filed. About the same time Senator GEORGE introduced a bill on this identical subject in the Senate. The Baruch plan and the George plan were strikingly similar in their approaches. Both recommended about the same procedure and about the same form of organization. The George bill was referred to a standing Senate committee where it is presumed hearings would be arranged and all provisions examined critically by friend and foe in accordance with the best democratic traditions. The ink was hardly dry on the Baruch report before the President began making appointments under it. Here is a program affecting every man, woman, and child in America, and the President brazenly denies the people or their representatives the right to modify it or approve it.

Volumes of Executive orders have been issued by this administration in the past 11 years. Last September the count stood 3,565 Executive orders assuming the force of law against 4,304 laws enacted by Congress. On September 7, 1942, the President delivered an ultimatum to Congress demanding a law that would fix prices, salaries, wages, and profits by the 1st of October, or else! He said, "In the event that the Congress should fail to act, and act adequately, I shall accept the responsibility, and I will act. At the same time that farm prices are stabilized, wages can and will be stabilized also. This I will do." This sounds like Hitler in his best early Sunday morning form. It should be mentioned here that many Congressmen had been trying for a year to stabilize wages and had been prevented from doing so by this very same administration that was now giving them a dead line upon which to act.

Article I, section 1, of the Constitution reads, "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." It does not add to that section "except in time of war." It makes no exception. Article II, section 3, reads, "he (the President) shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Article I, section 1, should be respected by the President and he should faithfully observe Article II, section 3—war or no war, emergency or no emergency. The Constitution makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy in time of war; but it does not give him any additional power or authority over the civilian population.

This administration has disregarded consistently the specific charge of the Constitution to submit all treaties to the Senate for ratification, and it has persistently by-passed Congress in the field of foreign policy. Congress has not the slightest idea what assurances were given to foreign powers at Quebec, Casablanca, Cairo, and Tehran. The Atlantic Charter was never submitted to the Senate for ratification. The Constitution gives only Congress the power to declare war and only Congress the power to make a treaty of peace; and yet, on January 2, 1942, the President entered into the so-called 26-nation agreement pledging this Government "not to make a separate armistice or peace with the enemies." Doubtless the Senate would ratify this treaty overwhelmingly and promptly were it submitted, but it has not been submitted.

Too, the Secretary of State is going far beyond the provisions of the lease-lend statute in requiring lend-lease recipients to make specific post-war tariff and trade agreements. Lend-lease is a war measure pure and simple, and not a club in the hands of the administration to manipulate tariffs or create a United States bank or provide a United Nations stabilization fund, that will obligate the United States to expend vast sums abroad without check and without an accounting.

George Washington in his Farewell Address to his countrymen warned against encroachment and usurpation within the framework of our government.

"The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers, * * * and thus create * * * a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. * * * If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. * * * But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

It is noteworthy that not a single amendment to the Constitution has been submitted to the people since Mr. Roosevelt took office. An excellent prayer for any President would be "Oh Lord, give me the courage to undertake what needs to be changed, the strength to endure what cannot be changed, and the wisdom to know which is which."

As a general rule a veto message couched in dignified language does not antagonize Congress, but to the contrary wins respect for the President in Congress. It is a safeguard against hasty or otherwise objectionable legislation; a protection of the rights of the Executive, the judiciary, and the States from invasion by Congress and, moderately and wisely used, it is a check against the instability of legislation. If the President had the right of partial veto of appropriation bills now enjoyed by many Governors he would and could save the taxpayers billions of dollars by striking out items slipped into appropriation bills by congressional riders and congressional log-rolling.

Presidents Adams, Jefferson, John Quincy Adams, Van Buren, William Henry Harrison, Taylor, Fillmore, and Garfield never vetoed a bill passed by Congress. Washington vetoed 2, Monroe 1, Jackson 9, and Lincoln 3. Theodore Roosevelt 40 and Franklin Roosevelt 613. We have been accused of having a rubber-stamp Congress. Thank God that we do not have a rubber stamp President! In my opinion 99 percent of the bills vetoed by President Roosevelt should have been vetoed.

However, there is a question of propriety involved in his recent subsidy veto. Congress had never approved a general subsidy policy and when it repudiated by an overwhelming vote a general subsidy policy created by Executive order, the President preserved his unlawful legislative order by his veto. The recent veto of a revenue measure was stupid and was accompanied by a message which the President's faithful and loyal friend, Majority Leader Senator BARKLEY, described as a "calculated and deliberate attack upon the integrity of Congress." The Constitution requires that all tax levies must originate in the House of Representatives in order to keep the vital tax power close to the people. Chief Justice Marshall well said: "The power to tax is the power to destroy." Levying taxes is a peculiar power that the founding fathers kept far from the authority of the President. It is not surprising therefore that no other President has ever vetoed a revenue measure. I trust that no President will ever do so again.

Under the prevailing parliamentary forms of government in force in many foreign countries there can be no rift between the executive and the legislative branches. A vote of confidence can be taken promptly by the House of Commons or other similar legislative body in other parliaments with the result that the government either stands or the government falls on the outcome. Thus the people through their representatives are always in control. The advantages of such a system is possible under our Constitution if we had a President willing to apply more and more democracy to relieve the grievous and dangerous crisis facing the United States.

The President can, under the powers specifically granted him, place every function of the Federal Government under one or other of the Cabinet officers and make that Cabinet officer responsible for the operation of his whole department. Secondly, he can require him, since Cabinet officers are under his direction, to appear before the House of Representatives and give an accounting whenever the House desires an accounting. The President can invite the House to take a vote of confidence after such an appearance and if the Cabinet officer fails to receive a vote of confidence his services could be terminated forthwith. Such a simple innovation would bring whatever bureaucrats we have and must have under the complete control of the people. Furthermore, it would bring the Congress and the President into the fullness of mutual confidence so vital to orderly and effective government.

If such a system were in effect today doubtless three and perhaps four Cabinet officers would fall and all the other Cabinet officers would sit up and take notice. The departments would be revitalized, duplication would cease, and jurisdictional quibbling would end. Instead of chaos and confusion, responsibility and order would prevail in Washington. Under such a system an O. P. A. or an O. D. T. or a W. M. C. or a W. P. B. or a W. F. A. or an Economic Stabilizer or a War Labor Board or any other executive agency created with or without law could not persecute the people or kick them around one more time.

I recall that while Hitler and Japan were getting ready for this war a Cabinet officer, having to do with America's defenses, was a helpless invalid and totally incapacitated. How many American lives that cost cannot be estimated. To be soft-hearted is admirable, but soft-headedness should never be tolerated in a chief executive. How long do you think the court-martial trials of General Short and Admiral Kimmel would be postponed if Cabinet officers had to make an accounting to the House of Representatives?

I hope that no President of these United States ever tries to set himself up as a dictator, but if and when he does, his first act will be to obtain, one way or another, a subservient and rubber-stamp Congress, a la Hitler; or, failing in that, he will try to destroy the good name of Congress. Referring to the House of Representatives as the "House of Reprehensibles" would be an excellent beginning. I do not know how many rubber-stamp Congressmen have been appointed Federal judges, nor how many rubber-stamp "lame duck" Congressmen have been appointed to well-paid administrative positions in recent years, but the number is fairly staggering. Encouraging the hope of reward to a Congressman is the most dishonest, corrupt, and dangerous threat to free, representative government conceivable.

Now I want to talk to you about the evil of concentrating power in Washington.

The Governor of one of our great States in his inaugural address gave the people a timely warning against the concentration of government at Washington. I quote:

"There is a present dangerous tendency to forget a fundamental of American democracy—the tendency to encourage consolidation of power at the top of a governmental structure alien to our system and more closely akin to a dictatorship or the central committee of a Communist regime. We have met difficulties before this and have solved them in accordance with the basic theories of representative democracy. Let us not at this time pursue the easy road of centralization of authority, lest some day we discover too late that our liberties have disappeared."

Later the same Governor, in a radio address, said:

"It was clear to the framers of our Constitution * * * that any administration attempting to make all laws for the whole Nation * * * would inevitably result at some future time in a dissolution of the Union itself.

"The doctrine of regulation and legislation by master minds has been too glaringly apparent in Washington during the last 10 years. * * * To bring about government by oligarchy masquerading as democracy, it is fundamentally essential that practically all authority and control be centralized in our National Government."

Perhaps you would never guess that the author of that admonition was Franklin D. Roosevelt when he was Governor of New York.

The trend, or more correctly speaking, the stampede toward centralized government in this Nation is a cause for grave concern and genuine alarm, and a hundredfold greater now than when Governor Roosevelt pointed it out as a dangerous tendency some years ago. It was a tendency then; it is a stampede now. Always in history as the processes of concentration of government have progressed, the freedom and liberty of the people have diminished; conversely, as government has been decentralized, liberty has gained. The Habeas Corpus Act, the Magna Carta, the Petition of Rights, and our own Declaration of Independence, were all instruments to decentralize government; in their wake came liberty and freedom. The growth of bureaucratic and concentrated government in the United States already has marked the decline of liberty. If that decline is to be halted, the people, the Congress, and the States, must be aroused from their lethargy and resist as they resisted King George III.

The people must realize that this is a fight to the finish between concentrated power and democratic government. The first line of defense in this fight is the preservation of the sovereignty of the State and the local units of government. One hundred and fifty years ago 13 bankrupt and weak but independent and sovereign States, in order to pool their onerous task of maintaining an army, a navy, and a common bureau to carry on relations with foreign powers and to bring about better unity, comity, and intercourse among themselves, established a federation to be known as the United States of America. These States created a Federal Government to do a few things requiring a united approach, the Federal Government to act as their agent; but now this agent, grown haughty with good credit, threatens to become their master. Already in this battle the former sovereign States have gone back almost to their original status of Federal territories.

We are an impatient people; we want things the easy way, the fast way, and to Hades with the consequences. We would rather live on borrowed money than earned money. We feel that the States are old-fashioned and provincial, and narrow and obsolete, so we acquire what we want with borrowed Federal money instead of through State taxes, and we imagine that that is progress. Many States have constitutions prohibiting the floating of debts, and all States use sparingly of their credit, largely because they are close to the people; so we charge them with being hopelessly backward, and we take up our abode in a fool's paradise of easy-credit money. While in this dazed and self-hypnotized condition of drunken exultation we fall easy victims to "federalitis," and before we can say Jack Robinson the bureaucrats have us tied hand and foot. We fell for their bribes of easy money, and now we are their vassals. It will be quite a shock when we discover that the bribe they used so successfully on us was our own credit and that we will have to pay it all back with a terrible burden of interest added thereto.

I do not subscribe to the fantastic theory that the huge public debt under which American taxpayers will groan for a century is a matter of small concern on the slaphappy pretext that "we owe us." It is true that the people of the United States do have the largest liquid assets of all history, but it is also true that the Federal Treasury itself is bankrupt and that the good credit of the United States must not be abused further. As soon as the war is over, we will have ten to twenty million unemployed workers in the United States unless a way be found by the people with money, encouraged by a government without money, to put that vast store of private idle capital to work.

Shrewd American capitalists are busy promoting an international police force to be supported by the American taxpayers to protect American investments all over the world. Such a scheme will promote the flight of American capital away from the United States to distant shores to exploit cheap labor, and seize the world markets and escape American taxes. If that happens, vital American jobs will be gone and the "we owe us" theorists will discover that both "we" and "us" will hold the sack at the snipe hunt. Any policy of internationalism that destroys American jobs must be rejected with a vengeance. America does not want "freedom from work." Tonight I want to make it crystal clear to the American capitalists that that is not what we are fighting this war for. America must have nothing to do with any brand of internationalism, however attractively attired, that does not mean more American jobs. Jobs are as vital to our people as is oxygen to life.

Perhaps the country needs a good 5-cent cigar. Since I do not smoke, I would not know; but I do know that America needs an exodus out of Washington. We should let the world know too that Santa Claus has migrated back to his old home near the North Pole and that he is going to remain there. The United States has had 32 Presidents. One of them in his occupancy in the White House has spent far more than twice as much money as all the other 31 Presidents together have spent, and may I whisper that practically all of it was borrowed money, too. That is not an enviable record. That is a rotten record. We must go to a balanced Budget the moment the war is over even if it means grass growing in every street in Washington, D. C. Unless we do so, not only will the Treasury be bankrupt but our credit will be destroyed also.

The greatest tragedy of American political history was the President's decision 4 years ago to seek a third term. His first term will ever be known as the term of great social and economic progress. In 1932 America had sunk to the lowest ebb of hopelessness and despair. Capitalism and the free-enterprise system had failed miserably. Government, bewildered and punch-drunk with the cross-currents of uncertainty, stood helpless while conditions went rapidly from bad to worse. In the economic world, the cruel law of "survival of the fittest" was relentlessly taking its deadly toll. Into that dismal picture came Franklin Delano Roosevelt breathing confidence and displaying bold, decisive action. He demonstrated that the Nation could be restored by putting the common man back on a job and the little businessman back in the black.

At the end of his first term he was looked upon as the great liberal leader who had saved his country by helping his countrymen discover how to save themselves. He was re-elected triumphantly. Only two small States by a scant margin failed to give him their electoral vote. Thus he came within a stone's throw of equaling Washington's singular and unique record of winning the electoral vote from every State.

Nearly every President has what is known as a "kitchen cabinet" or "palace guard" of trusted and confidential unofficial advisers. Accordingly, a small group of ambitious men, heretofore unknown, who had attached themselves to President Roosevelt, saw visions of a complete political, social, and economic revolution. They dinned into his ears that the 1936 vote was a mandate from the people to proceed along the path of social reform at a greater tempo. During the 1936 campaign I know from first-hand personal knowledge that the President never abandoned for one moment his firm determination to fulfill his 1932 pledge to balance the Budget. His better judgment told him to consolidate the social gains of his first term before attempting the conquest of new worlds. However, when he started to carry out this program, the slight economic recession of 1937 frightened him and he fell the victim to the constant chant of the "palace guard." He threw caution and his good resolves to the wind and began to organize an ill-conceived crusade to revolutionize society and the American economic system.

The Supreme Court had gotten into an ugly mood and through narrow interpretations was childishly declaring every act of Congress unconstitutional. The "palace guard" decreed that the Court be put in its place and brought forth the weird Supreme Court packing plan. Congress, with a better appreciation for American traditions and a better realization that time would shortly remove the recalcitrants from the Supreme Court bench, rebelled and refused to burn down the barn to destroy a few very temporary obstructionists. The President was furious at Congress. His "palace guard" countered with a high-handed attempted purge of all opposing Congressmen. In the election of 1938 the President, garbed in fighting armor, undertook to destroy every Congressman and Senator of his own party who had dared even in small degree to vote against his program. The result was a rebuff by the people such as no President had before suffered. One lone enemy Democratic Congressman in the city of New York was defeated with the help of the city machine. All Senators and all other Congressmen marked for slaughter were re-elected by tremendous majorities.

The President did not take this defeat gracefully. He was determined to have vengeance. His program of retaliation called for class to be pitted against class. Disunity, hatred, and bitterness became the order of the day. The "palace guard" chanted the theory of indispensability. Political observers said the President was all washed up politically, and the President demanded vindication. War broke out in Europe; and the President, who had long been an internationalist, saw in it a challenge and an opportunity. The unfortunate resolve to seek a third term was born.

Dulled by an overdose of "political spoils," it was easy to put over the third-term nomination blitzkrieg on the fat, lazy, and impotent Democratic Party. Unfortunately, too, the Republican Party had sunk to a low ebb. It had neither program, purpose, nor leadership. For 8 years it had been wandering all over the lot bewildered and punch drunk with a "me, too" grin on its face. In its dazed dotage it was easy for the Wall Street barefoot boy from Indiana, registered in New York as a Democrat and a Tammanyite, to stampede the Republican Convention. Republicans everywhere blush a deep crimson over it now, but Wendell Willkie, with all his faults, did breathe life back into the G. O. P. elephant, and there is a fighting Republican Party once more in every county north of the Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. Roosevelt's first term will ever be known as the "term of daring." His second term, starting out friendly and triumphantly, seemed destined to equal Monroe's "era of good feeling" but wound up in the gutter in an "era of bad feeling." His third term must be known as the term of "appeasement." It launched the 1940 campaign by appeasing the internationalists with the appointment of two old line Republicans as Secretaries of Navy and War. It appeased the nationalists by assuring them "again and again and again" that no mother's son would "be sent to fight in a foreign war." It appeased Japan by selling her all the war material she could pay for. It appeased China, who was fighting against Japan at that very moment for her life, with money and credit. After the election it appeased Britain by going to war on her side and it has been appeasing everyone everywhere ever since with lend-lease at a cost to the American taxpayers of billions. It appeased Russia by junking the Atlantic Charter. It appeased John L. Lewis and his miners, and A. F. Whitney of the Railroad Brotherhoods, with an increased wage at the back door of the White House, after scornfully turning them down at the front door amid a blare of trumpets.

Now a fourth term is accepted as a matter of course by the once traditionally independent Democratic Party. One-man control has reduced it to hopeless impotency. It no longer has the inclination nor the will to resist those who would rape it. The Democratic Party is no longer democratic. One man will name its candidate for President, its candidate for Vice President, and write its platform, just as was done in 1940. If it materializes, history will name the fourth term the "term of frustration."

While regrettable, of course, it would be a relatively small matter in human events if Mr. Roosevelt alone were to go down to defeat, but history must record that he dragged down with him the great liberal movement which he himself launched and the great Democratic Party which he himself revitalized. Had he passed up the third term, the liberal movement of the thirties, created by him, would have swept on to continued triumphant service. He forgot that Andrew Jackson and the other great Presidents reached the zenith of their power and influence after they were freed from the impediments of public office.

The strongest argument against a long continuation in the office of President is that it is the President's duty to appoint all Federal judges. It is perfectly natural for any President to appoint men vigorously supporting his ideological concepts. Mr. Roosevelt's earlier unhappy experience with the Supreme Court has made him especially sensitive on that point, and his court appointees reflect his predilections and the unorthodox political views of his "palace guard." In a short time every Federal judge the country over will have been appointed from one school of political thought, a school that is decidedly in the minority in this country. Since the Constitution is "what the courts say it is," too many appointments by one man are not wholesome.

Perhaps after Mr. Roosevelt's unhappy and unfortunate experience with more than two terms no future President will ever again be tempted to violate the no-third-term precedent laid down by Washington and observed by all American Presidents for 150 years. However, all of us who love this Republic and want to perpetuate it would feel safer if the Constitution restricted the Presidency to one term of 6 years. That is plenty long enough for one "palace guard" to rule the roost. America is not a one-man country.

Disunity among a people is a terrible thing. Too much satisfaction with things as they are is disastrous also, but reform and progress do not ride the wings of hate and bitterness. Political observers and historians will tell you that fascism, communism and other forms of tyrannical totalitarianism came into power throughout continental Europe on the heels of disunity, class conflict, and an absence of coordinated economic tranquillity. Any President who promotes disunity is playing with matches in a powder factory. The all-important spirit of cooperation, patience, and good will, cannot be overemphasized. Racial conflicts, labor and management strife, and manifestations of class hatreds, are bad omens and danger signals which should put us on guard that tyranny is just around the corner.

America must have a President who has a crystal-clear conception and a crystal-clear understanding of what makes America great. The basis for our progress is the power and dignity of freemen with the will to shape their own destinies by their own self-reliant efforts. America has achieved greatness down that road and can add to that greatness through that formula alone. Rights of freemen and their fitness to be freemen can only be determined by their ability to practice self-reliance and by their assumption of the responsibilities of freemen. Representative Government and a free economy can be preserved only by self-reliant and responsible individuals. America's President must believe in the people, in their wisdom, their judgment, and in their right of self-determination. It is his job to help develop an alert and informed public understanding and a spirit of voluntary cooperation that is based upon the religious and philosophical conception of the dignity and supremacy of the individual.

The President of the United States is more than a political officeholder; he is the chosen leader of 135,000,000 Americans. Within the framework of our system of representative democracy and free enterprise, he must lead his people forward to the new magnificent and exciting frontiers constantly being unfolded by science and invention which will enable them to produce a greater volume of better goods and distribute them at lower prices to more people. God has willed that without freedom there can be no development of the human soul and without cooperation there can be no social progress. Out of unity will come a stronger, finer, greater, better stabilized America.

In 7½ months, we, the people of the United States, will select a President for the most perilous period of our history. We must select a man who believes in a republican form of government, who is opposed to the concentration of power in Washington, and who hates despotism with all his heart. We must select a man who believes in the institution of Congress and especially who believes that we should have a people's House of Representatives. We must select a man who believes this Nation should be governed by written laws enacted by Congress and not by Executive orders issued by bureaucrats. We must select a man who believes in a sound fiscal policy and who fears public debt as he would the black plague. We must select a man who believes in the free enterprise system and who understands that our prosperity and happiness depend upon free men, a free agriculture, and an abundance of private jobs.

We need a President in the approaching crisis with the dignity, devotion, and poise of Washington, the creative instinct of Jefferson, the cooperative spirit of Monroe, the fire of Jackson, the humility and God-fearing piety of Lincoln, the courage and the honesty of Cleveland, the dynamic leadership of Theodore Roosevelt, the sense of humor of Taft, the learning of Wilson, the commonsense of Coolidge, and the daring of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In 1944, the decisive year of American history, may God, in His infinite wisdom, give us such a man.

Address by Senator Danaher at Republican Founders' Day Anniversary Celebration, Omaha, Nebr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 24 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on March 7 the State of Nebraska celebrated the seventy-seventh anniversary of the admission of Nebraska into the Union, and exercises were held at Omaha under the auspices of the Republican Founders' Day Anniversary Committee. The committee in charge invited as speaker for the occasion the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], and Nebraska Republicans looked forward with great interest to his appearance, the more particularly since he is ranking Republican member of our Senate Committee on the Judiciary. We had an overflow meeting of enthusiastic Republicans who came from all over the State to take part in the celebration. It was an inspiration to note the enthusiasm with which the Senator's remarks were received, and, accordingly, for the information of the Senate and readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD, the speech delivered by the Senator from Connecticut.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, nowhere but home could I have found a warmer welcome than has been extended to me tonight by the citizens of the great Cornhusker State of Nebraska. Coming to you as I do from the tiny State of Connecticut, I reciprocate in full measure as I address you at this celebration of Republican founders' day, for we have always looked with fond approbation upon the magnificent efforts of your founders and pioneers, and I extend heartiest congratulations upon your 77 years as a State.

Among your earliest settlers were many families from my own State. Perhaps your greeting instinctively reflects a link between that past and the present, for as I enter your State I cannot be unmindful of references of my great-grandmother to her son, John Malone, who emigrated to Nebraska nearly 100 years ago. "Uncle John," as we boys referred to him, remained only a few years in Nebraska. Perhaps he liked the open spaces. Maybe he thought Pawnees were too easy; perhaps he preferred the Cheyennes and Sioux. Anyhow, he later moved to Kansas whose 84,000 square miles gave him a little broader opportunity to rear a family whose descendants have fulfilled an honorable role in the development of your neighboring prairie State. He was typical of thousands, intrepid, industrious, stalwart; to your founders a grateful Nation owes an eternal debt. Truly they were "pioneer souls that blaze their paths where highways never ran." Surely they proved themselves friends to man.

Nor are you without such people now. I see them in the persons of Senator HUGH BUTLER who most ably serves with me on major committees in the Senate, and of Senator KENNETH WHERRY who, after only 1 year, has been selected by his colleagues to be the Republican minority whip. Stanch and true Republicans, they suggest the pioneers of earlier days in their forthright and uncompromising opposition to the forces which would destroy our institutions. Nebraska has ever sent great sons to the Congress of the United States, and it is the source of great satisfaction to me to find that the splendid men you have sent to the House of Representatives are all Republicans. It required action by the Congress to override a veto of President Andrew Johnson to get Nebraska into the Union back there in 1867; you need have no fears that your Republican congressional delegation now in Congress will fail to keep Nebraska's place intact. You can scan the Constitution of the United States without finding the word "Democrat"—but the act of Congress admitting Nebraska to the Union expressly found that the people had adopted in Nebraska a form of government which is republican. With your twice elected Dwight Griswold as Governor, let's keep Nebraska Republican.

THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE AND THE SUPREME COURT

The Constitution of the United States provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government and shall protect each of them against invasion. * * *" Clearly, the founding fathers had in mind an invasion by a hostile force. They thought they had already amply protected the States against an "invasion" by insidious forces from within. It did not occur to them that the day might come when the people could so far succumb to the opiate of a central government as to become its vassals. The founding fathers, in adopting a Constitution which provided for the separation of powers, clearly expected that the people themselves would see to it that the guaranty of a republican form of government would be maintained. It did not cross their minds that one day the people of the Nation would continue in office a President who would appoint some 70 percent of the judges of the Federal courts, who would appoint seven of the nine Justices of the United States Supreme Court, and who if continued for a fourth term would possibly have the appointment of successors to the two remaining Republican Justices. As final arbiter between the people and their government, the Supreme Court of the United States has ever been thought by our citizenry to be inviolate. Yet recently members of that court have themselves charged other members of the court with violating precedent and formulating through what should be judicial opinion, their own notions of what the law should be. Indeed, within the past few months after an expensive and protracted trial, that Court found itself unable to function in deciding upon the rights of a litigant when four Justices were bound to declare themselves disqualified, because while members of the Executive branch of the Government, they had exercised official connection with the case in question.

The institution we know as our Supreme Court, which is a veritable treasure house of our most precious rights, should be preserved intact and safeguarded against domination by the Executive or any other interposing force. Yet, under our Constitution the Chief Executive must make nominations to that Court when occasion requires, and with a Senate filled with partisans of the President, confirmation of the appointees would be inevitable. Only through the people themselves in their power of selection of the Chief Executive can they have a voice at the source of the appointing power. There are those who say that Mr. Roosevelt intends to run for a fourth term as President. It is the right, in my judgment, it is the duty, of the American people to say him nay. The Republican Party can perform no greater service to the American people than to point out the dangers inherent in a situation where any President, no matter who he is, may have and exercise the power of appointment to our Judiciary of partisans of known political beliefs, chosen all too frequently as a reward for subservient following of the dictates of the Chief Executive while holding some political office under his aegis.

PLACING RESPONSIBILITY FOR EXTENSIONS OF EXECUTIVE POWER

In another field there is to be found additional evidence of the constant effort to exalt the Executive, and that is through control of the legislative branch of your Government. You know that down through the 1930's the control of the Congress was overwhelmingly vested in the administration. Blind zealots and coattail riders filled both Halls of Congress. They did not have unanimous control, to be sure. For example, when I ran for the Senate in 1938 there were still 15 Republicans among its 96 Members. There were still a few of what might be called real Democrats, as distinguished from out-and-out administration supporters. But the fact remains that the administration overwhelmingly dominated not only the Senate and the House, but every committee in both branches of Congress. Many of the legislative acts of which you are now feeling the consequences became law over that period. Even now we have only 37 Republicans in the Senate. Consequently, every committee is organized by those who bear the label Democrat. The Democrats, therefore, through their organization have controlled and still guide the course of legislation. There are people right from this State who have written to me saying "Why doesn't the Congress do something?"

In fastening responsibility where it belongs, you should know that the Democrats have what they call a steering committee. That committee, without Republican representation, decides what bill is to come up for a vote and when it will be acted upon. It makes no difference how meritorious some other measure may be. It makes no difference how necessary you and I might think the legislation is. If the Democratic steering committee does not wish to permit a given measure to come up in the Senate for a vote, it will not be voted upon. In the 5 years I have spent in the Senate there has never been a single bill introduced by a Republican, and having national economic impact, which has been permitted to become law. Not one! Meanwhile, over the past 11 years, bill after bill was passed by the administration forces which created one new agency after another, and bureau after bureau. To these there was given the power to make regulations having the force and effect of law. There was ushered in the era of government by directive. There was developed the interesting technique by which the populace as a whole at the same time was not permitted to feel the impact of a given directive or regulation. If you were in the securities business, you might feel the effect of a certain order, but the overwhelming plurality of the public felt no occasion for concern.

If you were a banker, you might find yourself in competition with dozens of Federal lending agencies, but for everyone so situated, there were a thousand people to whom the situation made no difference. If you were a farmer, the orders and regulations and directives intended for you caused no worries to the city dweller. Thus gradually, insidiously, a little bit here and a little bit there, controls were gradually extended over any and every field in which the Federal power could be asserted. As long as people thought that this creeping collectivism was intended to suppress monopoly and big business, that was all right with them. Now, when they finally wake up to the fact that they are included, they cry "Why doesn't Congress do something?" Well, on November 7, 1944, the people are going to have their chance, perhaps their last real chance, to elect a people's Congress.

LAW MAKING THROUGH BUREAUCRACY

"What has all this to do with your earlier reference to the courts?" you might ask. I am trying to show you how there has been developed the technique by which the controls of government have been established over the American people. Don't you see first you have a President with a purpose. Next you have a subservient Congress which will enact legislation in the form in which he wants it. Buried down in that legislation creating these bureaus and these agencies will be a clause which gives to them the power to make the rules and regulations, but in addition they will so interweave such legislative language as to give finality to the rules or the regulations or the orders the agencies may promulgate. In some instances they have actually inserted language which would forbid appeals to the courts, and deny access by American citizens to the courts of their own country to test their rights. In most instances, however, where the courts have become indoctrinated with the virus of absolutism, administrative finality is achieved through the court. It isn't even a year since one circuit court of appeals said:

"Numerous recent decisions of the Supreme Court leave no room for doubt but that the prerogative of an appellate court in reviewing a factual situation found by the Labor Board or any other administrative agency is of such limited nature as to have no practical value * * *.

"Moreover, many questions heretofore regarded as legal, or at least mixed questions of law and fact, subject to review, have been by judicial fiat shunted into the factual category so as to further limit the function of a reviewing court.

"So in the instant case, as in many others, any logic or reasoning which might otherwise appeal to our sense of fairness and justice, must be ignored in view of the extremely narrow limits of our authority as delineated by the Supreme Court."

HOW IT'S DONE

"How can it be?" you ask. Because of the nature of the controls of the administration, because of the scope of the controls, because of the purpose of the Chief Executive. I saw one administration supporter come to the floor of the Senate 3 years ago with the names of 57 Senators attached to a resolution. The Senator had heard the President make a speech in which the President seemed to the public, as well as to that Senator to come out in favor of a certain proposition, so the Senator made a 5-hour speech in favor of his resolution. That evening the administration spokesman took that Senator to the political woodshed, and the next day he withdrew the resolution for which he had argued so fervently. Thereupon, Senator Norris offered the original resolution, which the administration still opposed, and the Senator who first introduced it and spoke 5 hours in favor of it, voted against it. It was many months before the gentleman made another speech. When the second war powers bill came to the Senate over 2 years ago, a Republican, Senator BROOKS, of Illinois, offered an amendment to permit men in the armed forces the franking privilege for their mail and the amendment received overwhelming support. An administration Senator notwithstanding offered his own amendment as a substitute, and although it accomplished identically the same thing as Senator BROOKS had in mind, it would never do to permit Senator BROOKS, a Republican, to receive public notice for so desirable a result. The administration substitute became the law.

Let's trace this technique a little further. Telling the public that a piece of legislation has an apparently laudable objective to enlist public support while actually the bill contains a very great deal of which the public is told nothing, is only part of the plan. Every department, every agency, every bureau, from top to bottom, for more than 11 years, has been filled with policymakers who have been appointed by the Executive. These people all have a common ultimate purpose in mind, they all know why they are there. If they don't go along, they go out. Ask Chester Davis, he lasted 4 months. Let a bill be introduced, by a Republican if you wish, for present purposes. (It is conceivable that at least once in a while even a Republican possesses sufficient temerity in view of the record, to introduce a measure which is in the public interest.) The bill will be referred first to a committee, controlled by the administration forces. By the committee it will be referred to the department involved. If the department should think well of it, may it so advise the committee? Perish the thought. It must clear through the Bureau of the Budget. Who is in it? You don't know. Is its complement responsible to your Congress? Not at all. These people are part of the executive agency, and they pass on the bill.

THE BUREAU OF THE BUDGET

How does such a situation come about? Because a supine Congress in the days of President Roosevelt's overwhelming domination gave him the power to act. Then he issues an Executive order, indeed he has promulgated nearly 4,000 Executive orders over the period of his incumbency. But let me emphasize my reference to this Bureau of the Budget which I can best do by quoting section 1 of a Bureau directive to the heads of executive departments and establishments, and reading:

"1. There shall be submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, before submission to the Congress, or any committee or member thereof, two copies of each recommendation or report concerning proposed or pending legislation requested from or advanced by any department or establishment, or any officer thereof. The submitting department or establishment will then be advised by the Bureau of the Budget as to the relationship of the legislation, or of the report or recommendation thereon, to the program of the President; when such recommendation or report is thereafter submitted to the Congress, or to a committee or member thereof, it shall include a statement of the advice so received from the Bureau of the Budget."

I looked at three bills on the Senate Calendar recently, and I wish to read to you the concluding sentence from the reports which were filed by each of three great departments in your Government:

"The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there would be no objection to the submission of this recommendation.

"Sincerely yours,

"FRANK KNOX."

"The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

"Sincerely yours,

"HENRY L. STIMSON,
"Secretary of War."

"I have been informed by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

"Sincerely yours,

"FRANCIS BIDDLE,
"Attorney General."

It makes no difference how many lawyers there are in the Department of Justice. It didn't make any difference whether Henry L. Stimson is or is not competent as Secretary of War. They had to send their reports to the Bureau of the Budget!

Now, let's take the other side of it:

"The Bureau of the Budget has advised me 'that the enactment of the proposed legislation, either in its present form or if amended as suggested in your proposed report, would not be in accord with the program of the President.'

"Sincerely yours,

"H. L. ICKES,
"Secretary of the Interior."

THE "PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM"

The bill "would not be in accord with the program of the President." Would it pass? It couldn't even come up for a vote unless the Democratic steering committee so decided. If you find your daily concerns being controlled from Washington, there's how it's done. The orders which affect your lives so intimately must be in accord with the program of the President.

It is all planned, in fact the President told you, "We planned it that way." Step by step—it can't be said too often—there is being evolved the centralization of control over the American people and their affairs to the point where the people of Nebraska, who in 1867 were assured protection by the United States of their republican form of government, may well ask today, "Where is the program of the President taking us?"

In January 1936 the Chief Executive caused his puppet Congress to adjourn from its noonday meeting until 9 o'clock at night. Then having commanded the radio time of the country he delivered to you his speech on the state of the Nation, intended by the Constitution for the Congress. He told you that "it goes without saying that to create such an economic constitutional order more than a single legislative enactment was called for." He said:

"We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington. * * * We have built up new instruments of public power. * * * In the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy such power would provide shackles for the liberties of the people. * * * I recommend to Congress that we advance, and that we do not retreat."

Shackles for the liberties of our people? You can see them, you can feel them all about you. Over the intervening years, ladies and gentlemen, the Congress and the President did "advance."

SIGNS OF POPULAR AWAKENING

Gradually our people are awakening to a realization of what it all means. A few of us ran for the Senate as Republicans in 1938 and were elected. A few more joined us in 1940, including your own Senator BUTLER. Then in 1942 came the nine, including your Senator WHERRY. Although those bearing the label "Democrat" still preponderated, and organized and controlled both Houses of the Congress, the President was by no means satisfied, for this Congress gave signs of restoring to the people a voice in their Government, and that would never do. There followed a series of efforts to discredit the Congress. From various of the hundreds of propaganda writers on the administration staff there came public statements, speeches, slurs, all designed to weaken in the minds of the people the influence of their own elected representatives. The President himself, in press conferences, radio speeches, and messages, continued the barrage.

Two months ago he charged the Congress with fraud, notwithstanding in the vote on the measure in question the Democrats in the Senate divided, 24 to 25. He strikes at all who run counter to the "program of the President." He seeks to defeat all those who assert their own proper place in the Congress as the policy-making body of our Government. But all prior efforts paled into insignificance compared to his veto message with reference to the 1944 tax bill. With fresh impetus he attacked the entire Congress in his efforts to bring upon that body the ire of the American people. He would seek above all a return in 1945 to that type of Representative and Senator who will do his unquestioned bidding. Who are in the "palace guard" who advise the President thus to strike for absolutism in our Government? You don't know and I don't know. Whoever they are, however deep-seated their "passion for anonymity," their purpose can no longer be doubted. The collectivist state which they would impose upon us you may have if you wish. The subversion of our constitutional processes can be yours, if you wish. The destruction of our most cherished institutions, a patriarchal government which would make you wards of the state, you can have. Control over your daily lives, over the education of your children, what work you perform, when you will perform it, under what terms and conditions, all these and more you may leave to people back of desks down in Washington if you choose. But, as for me, I want "to stand up and be counted"—I am for Congress—and the people.

SOME CONTRASTS

Nebraska's founders in the days of the Territory drew inspiration from the Nation's great. None phrased the issues more aptly than Daniel Webster, whose fight for constitutional government was their constant guide, and Webster even surpassed himself when he declared:

"Good intentions will always be pleaded for every assumption of (executive) power; but they cannot justify it, even if we were sure that they existed. It is hardly too strong to say that the Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intentions, real or pretended. When bad intentions are boldly avowed, the people will promptly take care of themselves. On the other hand, they will always be asked why they should resist or question that exercise of power which is so fair in its object, so plausible and patriotic in appearance, and which has the public good alone confessedly in view. * * * It may be very possible that good intentions do really sometimes exist when constitutional restraints are disregarded. There are men in all ages who mean to exercise power usefully; but they mean to exercise it. They mean to govern well; but they mean to govern. They promise to be kind masters; but they mean to master * * *."

In the past 11 years how often we could have repeated those moving words.

The American people, like a bird fascinated by a serpent, sat by while the coils were tightening around them. This government by bureaus had been gradually increasing its hold. Suddenly stirring, our citizens partially slipped away in 1942 from the grasp of autocracy. The facts, like Webster's "bad intentions" had become more widely recognized. The people were discovering that their last best hope was their Congress, and they rose in their latent might and undertook to elude that major force which is the Washington which would hold them fast. They wished to be freed from a government by directive and to return to a government of laws. They wished our policy to be formulated by their representatives according to standards prescribed in legislative acts; in short they saw that they needed government of law and not of men.

As Republicans, we were perhaps the more aware than other citizens of what had been happening to all of us, in that we had never quite surrendered in the first place. We shared the belief that the public should be protected against fraud while we protested against the limitations upon lawful business which would render stagnant the pools of investment opportunity and eventuate in government operation of business. We favored necessary price controls as a weapon against inflation arising in part from the dislocations caused by war, but we protested against bureaucratic destruction of the profit system. We favored the elevation of the living standards of the American family through collective bargaining but we protested against a strait jacket for the American workman. We favored legitimate and necessary taxation but protested against efforts to utilize the tax laws to bring about for the individual and for business a state of dependency upon the Central Government with its inevitable controls. We favored reasonable measures for social security but protested against making the entire populace the wards of a central state. We believe that the individual as a member of our common society enjoys rights and must perform correlative duties. But we deny that philosophy of government which would make the individual a creature of the state, and we know as a part of this great American society, that our rights and our reciprocal duties can find their greatest expansion to our greatest good through a government achieved through constitutional means.

THE EXECUTIVE IN THE INTERNATIONAL FIELD

Just as you have witnessed the development of the Executive order and the directive on the domestic front, so you see the administration proceeding through executive agreements in the international field. Policies have been formulated and commitments have been entered into without reference to the Congress, without submitting the essential facts to the people's representatives; indeed, certain courses have been followed in derogation of the will of Congress and executive spokesmen have refused to testify before your Congressional committees. The President has proceeded on the theory that he is the sole organ to represent the American people in the field of external relations. It may well be, for all you know, that the tax dollars of the American people should be spent for the construction of an oil pipe line across Arabia, but your Congress is not even consulted. It may well be that we should undertake commitments to defend that pipe line against all possible interference or attack, from whatever source, and that annually every American boy physically and mentally fit should be put into the Army or the Navy for that purpose. But no such policy has been developed by your Congress. The President has not asked your Senate Committee on Foreign Relations even to meet with him for more than 10 long years. I mention such things because I believe that the American people, through their Congress, should have a voice in all such matters of policy. Denied the facts, not consulted, the American people, through their Congress, may refuse that support borne of widespread understanding without which unauthorized excursions in the foreign field will be doomed to failure.

As Republicans, as citizens of this great Republic who love our country, our course is clear. First, we must win the war and must work unrelentingly with all who share with us the common purpose to defeat our enemies. There is no more poignant cry in all American than when will our boys come home?

Second. We must strive in every way within our power to set our own house in order that we may preserve whatever will be left of our fiscal structure and our economic resources, to the end that they may be reorganized for successful adjustment to the conditions of the post-war world.

Third. Like the founders of Nebraska we must learn to live within our means. We must know that happiness for all our people can come only from trimming our suit to the cloth. We must recognize that government has no funds of its own, that it produces nothing, that a dollar given to a man who has none is a dollar taken from a man who has worked and earned and saved the dollar in the first place.

Fourth. There must be a reawakened realization that our rights in society, whether domestic or international, must be established in an orderly way through rationalization. We must assert and believe that if a central state can be said to confer rights, the state can take them away and we will be at its mercy.

Fifth. And finally, in God's good time, and we may pray that will be soon, there will be peace, a peace I hope, with justice which takes account of man's inherent sovereignty and his ineffable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Through collaboration with other nations? Yes. With due regard for the constitutional processes and the purposes of our own Government? Above all, yes.

A resurgence of the American people in November 1944 is the clearly indicated remedy for the ailments of our body politic. Only through the ballot can we exercise that franchise to express our will. No more priceless right exists than the right of the American citizen to vote. Through the Republican Party the citizen will find the best possible medium through which to insure victory in war, happiness in peace, the preservation of constitutional government, and collaboration in the post-war period with the desolated and ravaged peoples of the world. And as Republicans, as Americans, let us guarantee to all of our States, as was promised to the founders of Nebraska by Congress just 77 years ago, a republican form of government.

The Farmer and O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks the radio talk by Hon. Chester Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator, and Howard H. Williamson, O. P. A. farm adviser, delivered over the radio Tuesday night.

The address follows:

Mr. BOWLES. For some time I've been anxious to talk to you about the relationship between our farmers and O. P. A. price controls. Right now's a good time to do it because Howard Williamson, our O. P. A. farm adviser, is just back from a trip all across the country talking to farmers about their problems.

Howard is here on the program with me right now and in a few minutes I will ask him some questions.

But first of all I'd like to remind all of you that the problems which our farmers have faced in the past belong to all of us. The economic distress which so many of our farmers faced after the last war simply must not be repeated. Our country can never be wholly prosperous and economically secure after the war unless all of us are secure—our farmers as well as our businessmen and city workers.

Our farmers have always worked hard to provide us with our food. They deserve a good price for their efforts—not only now under war conditions, but permanently—as an essential part of our peacetime economy.

Today, under our O. P. A. price controls, our American farmers are breaking all records for food production. And today, under O. P. A. price controls, the Department of Agriculture tells me that the average farm income, after all expenses, is also at an all-time high—about 282 percent over the 1935–39 average. Remember, please, I didn't say all farmers. I said the average farmer, lumping together our hog growers, cattle raisers, poultry growers, corn, wheat, cotton, and vegetable farmers. Some farmers are, of course, doing less well than the average.

Our farmers have a very definite stake in effective price control as a protection of the balance between what they get for their crops and what they have to pay out.

They have an equally great stake in O. P. A. price controls as a protection against the same cruel collapse of their farm prices which followed the last war. For the dangers of deflation after the war are just as great as the dangers of inflation during the war.

The collapse in prices after World War No. 1 hit our American farmers harder than any other group. The depression which, for the rest of us, lasted 2 or 3 years, lasted 20 long years for our farmers. It is our job in the O. P. A. to help prevent any repetition of that after this war. And we at O. P. A. sincerely view our present price controls—and our subsidies—as the surest possible safeguard against such a post-war farm collapse.

Now, some farmers have been critical of O. P. A. Some of this criticism has been our own fault.

For some time we have been working closely with every kind of business through over 300 industry advisory committees. But when I came to the O. P. A. in Washington last summer, we had no such give-and-take relationship with farmers on price regulations affecting them.

To correct this—to develop a closer understanding between the O. P. A. and all kinds of farmers in all parts of the country—I called in Howard H. Williamson from Texas, last November, and appointed him as my farm adviser. Howard had been director of extension services for the Texas A. & M. College. He had done this extension work ever since he was graduated from there 32 years ago—in addition to running his own farm.

We had many long talks together, and Howard agreed with me that something should be done to bring the farmers and the O. P. A. closer together. His idea was to bring this about through farm advisory committees working closely with our various O. P. A. district offices. I agreed, and for the past several weeks Howard has been on a trip through the country helping to get these committees organized and our plan under way. He got back to Washington only 2 days ago.

He's here with me now to give a report on how the plan is working out and what the farmers think of it.

First, Howard, I think it's important that people know you're a real farmer and not just somebody with a lot of theories about farming in general. Tell us about that farm of yours down in Texas.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, if farming makes a farmer, I am one. I started out rather young, traveling south down cotton rows with my hands wrapped around the north end of a hoe handle. At present, I operate on a few hundred acres on Bedias Creek in Grimes County, Tex.—principally livestock farming and some feed growing. My little bunch of livestock consists of white-faced cattle, Angora goats, sheep, and this past year, some hogs. In the past I have engaged in cotton growing and have had some little experience in poultry and dairy business. I am what would be classed in my section as a small farmer but you don't have to be a very big farmer to know what farm problems are, especially during the war period when there are shortages of farm labor, farm machinery, and an abundance of regulations which, of course, can't be avoided in times like the present.

Mr. BOWLES. Tell me, how did you get along with your farm operations last year?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Pretty well, with the exception of my venture into the hog business. That was my 1943 mistake. I got caught like hundreds of others—more hogs than feed. My feed gave out and my acorns washed away. I am now trying to get my hogs finished with high-priced grain so as to get the floor price. I am not sure I will make it, but I will confess it was my own idea in the first place. I understand Judge Marvin Jones, Food Administrator, is recommending some reduction in the 1944 pig crop. I think, for one, I will give him my full cooperation unless I can produce more feed than I did last year.

Mr. BOWLES. You have just made a trip through the country, talking to farmers and farm leaders first hand. What territory did you cover, Howard?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I attended a State-wide meeting of farmers in Rhode Island and conferences in the Southwest, Middle West, and the Pacific coast. At Dallas, I attended a six-State conference of leading farmers, representatives of farm organizations, and others interested in agriculture. This conference was called and conducted under the leadership of Mr. Maxwell McCullough, regional administrator, region V. It was a very fine conference.

Mr. BOWLES. What are some of the things you found farmers and farm leaders thinking about?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, as you know, Mr. Bowles, farmers never hesitate to give expression to their thinking. They are courteous but frank. I did not keep a penciled memorandum of comments, but I can give you a general interpretation of some of their thinking as I understood them. First of all, they want price stabilization and rationing to succeed, and they want to help all they can. They don't like regulations any better than anyone else; neither do they like war and the many other things we have to do in war periods. Their attitude in general is that we have a tough war to win, and it is going to take sacrifice and hard fighting. They want to get on with the job and do what is necessary but not wear themselves down doing unnecessary things.

Mr. BOWLES. What about suggestions. Do they have any for O. P. A.?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes. The group of farmers and farm leaders from the six States that met in Dallas recommended to the 13 district O. P. A. directors that they arrange for a conference of farmers and farm leaders in their respective districts and give consideration to the creation of a district agricultural advisory committee. This committee would work with the district O. P. A. director on general farm problems affected by O. P. A. Such committees have already been created in several of the O. P. A. districts in various other sections of the country.

Mr. BOWLES. Did they have any suggestions for immediate consideration?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Not in a formal way, but they certainly hinted at several. One was that we should do everything possible to eliminate unnecessary delays in getting out rules and regulations and that they be well in advance of the season's needs. Of course, they understand it takes some time to go through with procedures in getting rules and regulations prepared and released, but they want us to make it as speedy as possible. Another thing about which they were very polite was in the suggestion that, in the preparation of regulations, and so forth, they be put in such language or at least explained in a way that people other than lawyers can understand them. They appreciate the fact that rules and regulations must stand up from a legal point of view, but it helps when the laymen can understand them and their application. They are also interested in knowing to what extent producers participate in conferences, when considerations are given to price ceilings, and regulations dealing with raw or processed farm products.

Mr. BOWLES. They are absolutely correct on all counts. You know—and we want farm people to know—that we are striving to do everything possible to prevent delays and keep programs and regulations simplified. Also, it is O. P. A.'s policy to have producer representatives on all industry councils in which farm products are involved. But now—how do the farmers feel about price control, Howard?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well—I think the experience of one farmer out West pretty well answers that question Mr. Bowles. He has about 2,000 steers, which means he uses several hundred bushels of corn a day to feed them.

A while back the rumor got started that the ceiling on corn was going up 10 cents—so right away the flow of corn stopped right in its tracks in the hope of the higher price for it. And meantime, this fellow's steers went into a tailspin. That was only a rumor, mind you, so you can imagine what would happen if there was an official report that price ceilings would go off everything tomorrow. As that Missouri farmer put it to me the other day, "We farmers not only want prices fixed—we want prices to stay fixed so we can know where we stand."

That seems to be the general attitude of the farmers I have been talking with on this trip. They want price control, and they want to help all they can to keep it.

Mr. BOWLES. Our farm problem as we look ahead is to hold good prices for farmers after the war. And to insure that we musn't let our price levels go any higher now or we'll get in trouble later. Unless we hold the general level of prices where they are, we'll have to face another farm depression.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Most people who were in the farming game 25 years ago remember the seriousness of that post-war depression. And today farmers well understand that, in general, agriculture is in a relatively better position than it has been in the past century, and they are, of course, interested in its staying that way.

Mr. BOWLES. Keeping it that way is one important objective of the price stabilization program today. That is why we at O. P. A. are anxious to work as closely as possible with farmers.

How many farm committees have you got organized so far?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am not planning to personally organize any. Washington is too far from farm people. However, I am suggesting, with a little urge to it, that the eight regional O. P. A. administrators promote through their district O. P. A. administrative set-up, district conferences as recommended by the farmers' group in Dallas, with the view of creating, where needed, a district advisory committee. The farmers and farm leaders and the district O. P. A. director in each district know the best approach and means of working together. To keep our O. P. A. programs geared to the problems of the farm, there must be good understanding on our part of the wartime problems farmers are encountering. And at the same time, farmers need to know some of the problems that you, Mr. Bowles, and your O. P. A. associates encounter in administering such a gigantic program of price stabilization and rationing for 130,000,000 people.

Mr. BOWLES. Well, as I told you last fall, Howard, we want and need the benefit of the thinking and counsel of farm people on those phases of our O. P. A. program that relate to farming. It is extremely important that we exchange suggestions and counsel in a well thought out and organized manner. And I believe your plan for local farm advisory committees throughout the country is the answer. In that way, the O. P. A. and the farmers can work together, closely and constantly as a team.

The job of controlling prices is a big one. As I have said before, it cannot be done wholly for any group by us at O. P. A. in Washington. It must be done by all groups in all communities. Only through understanding and cooperation can we succeed in our vital fight against skyrocketing prices now—and the deflation which would inevitably follow after the war.

Thank you, Howard, for your comments and observations. And I would like to take this means of congratulating the many millions of farm men and women and the farm youth of America on the great food production job you are doing. You have, and are now doing, a big and important war job with many handicaps. O. P. A. wants to be as helpful as possible.

And now, good-bye to you all until next week.

Our Greatest National Asset

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. R. POAGE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, over National Broadcasting Co. stations, Friday, March 10, 1944:

One of the greatest contributions that this Nation has been able to make to our fighting allies has been food. Without the food that we were able to furnish, gallant old England might not have survived during the dark days when she stood practically alone between civilization and organized destruction.

A short while ago a Russian general who fought in the Battle of Stalingrad told me that but for the food and supplies American made available for the heroic Red Army, the advance could not have been carried out as it was.

Without our rich soils that food could not have been produced.

The capital stock of a nation is its soil resources. No business can stand a continuing drain on its capital; likewise no nation can endure long excessive drains on its capital resources.

We were able to furnish this food because we had a vast, new country, rich in natural wealth.

What are soil resources? They are food and clothing locked up in nature's warehouse against the time when man, through his efforts, takes them out. Our great soil resources in this country have enabled us to develop a great race of people. History shows that the character and strength of a nation goes up and down with its soil.

In our fast development of this new country we have not always been careful in the preservation of our soil, and much of this valuable God-given birthright has been permitted to wash or blow away. We have cut down our timber on the watersheds and hillsides; and the rains have descended, and the floods have come and beat upon the soil, carrying it into the branches and streams and on to the sea where it is lost forever. There are only a few inches of top soil on which we must depend not only now but so long as we remain a nation. Man's destiny is linked to the soil. From it he came and to it he must return. From it he must draw his sustenance.

We stand aghast before the spectacle of destruction in so much of the war-weary world today—the devastated fields and gutted homes, the ruins of great cities now rubble and ashes and bones. But all this wreckage, even in the scorched-earth areas, can be rebuilt with time and work. North Africa is already able to produce most of its food demands. Well-directed efforts can restore production in the stricken areas. I do not minimize the destruction; but restoration can be rapid.

I am here concerned with an even greater destruction, of our own fields, not by the Nazi or the Jap, but a destruction of which we ourselves have been guilty, with our eyes open, our own hands stained with the dust and mud of our eroded soil.

According to H. H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Conservation Service, we have ruined more land in less time than any other nation in history.

More than 50,000,000 acres of land in the United States, once cultivated, no longer produce crops. That is nearly as much as our entire wheat acreage last year. And the best topsoil has been washed away from an additional crop acreage twice as large as that. Fortunately, we are learning of this danger before it is too late.

Today our Mississippi Valley—and I mean by that the whole great area between the Alleghenies and the Rockies—is the greatest potential food-producing area in the world. Properly used and preserved it can, for centuries to come, not only supply abundance for our own people but can help supply others with its products and bring back in trade additional goods for us to use and enjoy.

This great valley is full of abundance and plenty. We have the opportunity to use these resources fully and yet preserve them—or to use them fully and waste them. There is always a conservation use and wasteful use. In the past we have exploited our good earth with a prodigal disregard of its real value to our enduring life as a nation. We have sent the export crops down to the sea in ships and the soil down to the sea in mud. When the Mississippi overflowed at its mouth, we built levees. We tried to reverse nature, and when nature rebelled, as she always does, against such treatment, we built higher levees. We wasted both soil and water. Instead of using the water to our advantage, we tried to get it into the sea as fast as we could.

We have now learned that the wise way is to go back up where the water falls as rain and work with Nature instead of against her; to utilize water at the source and thus treat it as a blessing instead of a curse. Whatever system will retain that water and soil is worth any national effort, however great. Out in the dry country not a gallon of water should be permitted to reach the sea. All should be used on the land. In other areas where it is abundant, it can be channeled and utilized for power, for additional wealth.

After the war our available manpower will eagerly turn from destruction in war to construction in peace; our engineering and technical genius and skills will turn from their prodigious feats throughout the jungles and deserts of the world in making war, to the constructive challenge that awaits them here.

It is not for me here to spell out the technical blueprint of how this may be done. We have, fortunately, in this country those who have proven in this war that they are able to carry out any task, however big the job may be. Once made aware of the challenge, the genius of America will meet it without any specific directions from me.

We now know better than any other people have ever known how to conserve our soil resources. Great progress has been made. The Congress, with farsighted vision, has established a Soil-Conservation Service and made provisions for carrying out an extended program of preserving our greatest natural source of wealth. Millions of acres have been scientifically protected and are now producing an average of 20 percent more than they did before.

But I am told that about 90 percent of the conservation job lies ahead.

Just what is there to be done? How many men and how many years will it take to do it? What will it cost? Fortunately these questions have been anticipated and studied by the Soil Conservation Service. A Nation-wide survey has already been completed showing how much land needs treatment and where.

Here is some of the work that should be done. We need to build 6,000,000 miles of terraces across sloping land on 95,000,000 acres, to control water and protect the soil.

We need to drain about 30,000,000 acres of some of our richest land, which is too wet for full production.

We need to build thousands of stock ponds for better livestock production, particularly in the West.

We need to improve our farm irrigation and water use on 12,000,000 acres in our drier regions.

We need to plant soil-building and erosion-resistant crops on thousands of mutilated fields.

There is other soil-conservation work to be done by the farmers themselves and their neighbors. For example, 120,000,000 acres of our farm land needs to be plowed on the contour. There is a need for strip cropping on 90,000,000 acres and for improvements of about 110,000,000 acres of pasture. There are 40,000,000 acres of unfavorable land now in cultivation that should be planted to grass, legumes, and trees as quickly as possible.

Fortunately farmers have become so conscious in recent years of the importance of soil conservation to their prosperity and security that they have already developed much of the machinery necessary to carry out this work. Seven years ago farmers organized their first soil-conservation district. This enabled the farmers in that district to work together in a common effort to safeguard the land in that district. It worked so well that today there are nearly 1,000 of these soil-conservation districts. These include about two and one-half million farms and ranches that cover more than 500,000,000 acres. In other words, the people themselves on the land are already actively on the job, so that what I have suggested is no new scheme.

With victory in war we can look forward to an era of peace.

We can, if we will, look forward as confidently to ultimate success in our efforts to prevent the loss of our natural resources. What will that success bring?

Let us use our great Mississippi Valley as an example of what we might expect in our other great watersheds on both coasts. I believe it is not too much to visualize a system of effective control over our soil and water resources.

This would include using the rainfall on the plains and hillsides where it falls, instead of letting it run off in waste.

It would include the many additional soil-conservation districts that will then be joined in this common effort.

It would include an automatic form of natural crop insurance against drought; water stored in the soil during wet seasons would be available for crops in dry seasons.

It would include large dams on the rivers and thousands of small dams on tributary streams and in pastures and fields, to give us flood control.

It would include electric power generated at the dams and flowing out over the productive countryside to the millions of farm homes that need it.

It would include protecting these dams against destructive silt, to insure our hydroelectric power—increasingly important in the years ahead as we view our diminishing supplies of coal and oil reserves.

It would also include a decentralized industrial development so that the raw materials would be close to the heart of the business community.

It would include a suitable network of highways and railroads and air lines as a natural part in this development.

It would include millions of farm homes made more secure against the future.

It would mean our ability to survive, for regardless of what we do, what plans we make, or what genius we may possess, our Nation must perish unless we take care of the soil.

The soil of our country is our heritage. If wisely used its value, its strength, and its productivity are ageless. In peace or in war no nation can afford to waste its substance. The children of the future have a stake in this—our greatest source of national security.

Bills for Servicemen and Servicewomen of World War No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 23, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the last few days there has been considerable attention given by the press to a bill reported out by the Senate Finance Committee, S. 1767, commonly known as the G. I. bill of rights, or the American Legion bill, which was introduced on March 13, 1944. This bill is a companion measure to H. R. 4357, introduced March 8, 1944, in the House by Congressman RANKIN. It purports to provide all the necessary legislation to cushion the returning servicemen and servicewomen and provide ways and means for their rehabilitation and reentrance into peacetime pursuits for which they are best qualified.

I should like to call to the attention of the Congress the fact that on September 14, 1943, I introduced a measure, H. R. 3200, known as the Demobilization and Surplus War Property Act.

The American Legion bill provides certain hospitalization features for returning servicemen. My bill does not include this particular provision because existing laws already cover this subject and any enlargements or expansions can appropriately be made through amendments to existing law. However, I have no objection to this provision.

My bill provides for the establishment of social-security credits to veterans for the period of their wartime service and does this on a basis of equitable consideration not otherwise provided for in any other legislation which I have reviewed.

In addition, my bill makes mandatory the employment of disabled veterans. Under the terms of H. R. 3200, at least 1 percent of the personnel employed by any firm working more than 100 persons must consist of disabled war veterans. I do not believe that the importance of this provision from a social and economic viewpoint can be discounted. In my view, no measure which purports to provide for returning servicemen in an adequate fashion should be without a clause of this type. H. R. 3200 provides a special fund of adequate size for the use by veterans under the terms of the Bankhead-Jones Act. I am happy to note that S. 1767 also includes a provision of this type.

S. 1767 provides for low-interest loans to veterans up to $1,000 for the purchase of homes, farms and business properties. I commend this provision, although I respectfully call attention to the fact that the agency designated for the servicing of these loans is one which would conflict with others already established for a similar purpose. Smaller War Plants Corporation is set up to aid small business establishments. It would be my recommendation that Smaller War Plants Corporation be designated as administrator of these funds in preference to the Department of Commerce, which is named for that purpose in S. 1767. The experience of Smaller War Plants Corporation and its present duties in this connection would qualify it for this task and would avoid duplication of effort by another agency and effect a considerable saving in administrative costs to the Government.

Otherwise, these two measures contain almost identical provisions for the rehabilitation and educational training of veterans after their discharge from the services except for two very important provisions which are included in my bill, but which are not to be found in the American Legion bill.

In my bill, for example, I provide for an increased redemption value of War bonds in the hands of servicemen when used for the purchase of Government-owned surpluses and farms for their own use. War bonds purchased at least 3 months prior to the termination of the war are automatically increased in redemption and maturity value when used for the purpose of purchasing surpluses or farms under the terms of my bill. H. R. 3200 provides a prior claim by veterans upon certain Government-owned surplus goods, tools, and equipment which veterans might use in the establishment or conduct of their own small business ventures.

As is well known to many of the Members, this surplus-property question has been covered much more adequately and with full protection to servicemen in another bill which I introduced a few days ago, H. R. 4420, at the unanimous request of the members of the House Small Business Committee. H. R. 4420 adequately provides for returning servicemen in the disposal of surplus goods.

For the above reasons, I respectfully direct the attention of the Congress to the fact that the American Legion bill, although containing many excellent features should be amended in some particulars and this statement is inserted for the purpose of suggesting certain improvements but not in opposition to the measure. H. R. 3200 contains a number of absolutely essential provisions, none of which are to be found in S. 1767 and the companion bill, H. R. 4357, to provide for the proper demobilization and rehabilitation of veterans at the end of hostilities.

Following is a break-down of the features contained in S. 1767, the American Legion bill:

S. 1767 AND H. R. 4357—SERVICEMEN'S AID ACT OF 1944

AID BY VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

First. Veterans' Administration classified as essential war agency.

Second. Administrator and Federal Hospitalization Board authorized to utilize existing Army and Navy hospitals by agreement and construct new facilities with appropriation of $500,000,000.

Third. Mutual agreement provision for exchange of hospital and domiciliary facilities between Army, Navy, and Veterans' Administration; transfer of commissioned and enlisted personnel to Veterans' Administration by agreement with Army and Navy up to 6 months after end of war.

Fourth. Veterans' Administration authority to place personnel in Army and Navy installations for advisory service and disability claims adjudication.

Fifth. Precludes discharge from service without receipt of final pay or because of disability until all claims filed with Veterans' Administration, unless claims waived.

Sixth. Statements signed by veteran in reference to service disabilities to be disregarded in adjudication of claims.

AID BY VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

First. Accredited Veterans' Administration representatives authorized to function in service installations handling veteran discharge or release under regulations promulgated jointly by Army, Navy, and Veterans' Administration.

REVIEWING AUTHORITY

First. Persons dishonorably discharged, resigning under prejudice, ineligible for veterans' rating and benefits—with exception of National Service Life Insurance—unless judged insane.

Second. Establishment of separate Army and Navy Boards—five members each—for review of dismissal and discharge, except in case of court martial; rulings subject to final approval of Secretaries of Navy and War.

EDUCATION OF VETERANS

Veterans' regulations 1 (a) as amended by Public Law 16, June 24, 1943, further amended by adding part VIII, as follows:

First. Honorably discharged veterans eligible for training under this part who served after September 16, 1940, for 6 months, or less by reason of service-incurred disability.

Second. Appointment by President of Director of Servicemen's Education and Training; authority to utilize facilities of Federal and State educational and vocational agencies.

Third. Establishment of Advisory Council to Administrator consisting of Secretaries of War, Navy, and Agriculture, Federal Security Administrator, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, chairman, Commissioner of Education and eight public members appointed by President (Compensation: Travel expenses and $15 per diem).

Fourth. Eligible veterans to choose educational institution.

Fifth. Training for 1 year or equivalent in part-time training, beginning not later than 2 years from discharge or termination of war and extending not beyond 7 years from termination of war.

Sixth. Provision for 3 years continuous additional training upon satisfactory completion of first year but not to exceed length of active service, exclusive of 6 months' qualifying service or specialized training while in service.

Seventh. Federal payment to training institution up to $500 per year—not including board, lodging, or other living expenses.

Eighth. Subsistence allowance to trainee of $50 per month and dependency allowance of $25 for veterans receiving full-time training. Part-time trainees' compensation to be adjusted by Administrator.

Ninth. Administrator to arrange for educational and vocational guidance.

Tenth. Annual report to Congress by Administrator.

Eleventh. Governors to designate legally constituted State training facilities; if none, Board created to designate other qualified institutions.

Twelfth. Applicable to States, Territories, and possessions.

Thirteenth. Training facilities to include college- or State-supervised apprenticeships.

Fourteenth. Subsistence allowance to persons receiving benefits under part VII not to exceed additional pension payable under part VII.

Fifteenth. State training institutions or apprenticeship agencies not subject to Federal direction.

Sixteenth. Amendment to Public Law 16, section 3, to provide use of appropriation for Veterans' Administration and additional appropriation to implement part VII amended and part VIII.

Seventeenth. Return of training equipment by trainee upon unsatisfactory performance.

Eighteenth. Substitution of September 16, 1940 for December 6 and December 7, 1941, in Public Law 16.

LOANS FOR PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

First. Honorably discharged veteran eligible for loan by Administrator of Veterans' Affairs who has 90 days' service—or less because of service-incurred disability—subsequent to September 16, 1940, except when released by own request—unless having foreign service.

Second. Limits aggregate loans under title to $1,000, noninterest bearing after first year, 3-percent compounded annually thereafter, secured by lien subject only to lien covering balance of purchase or construction costs.

Third. Repayment subject to terms prescribed jointly by Administrator and approving agency.

Fourth. Loans for home subject to approval of agency designated by Administrator as to ability of veteran to pay and subject to cost appraisal by agency.

Fifth. Loans for home repairs, indebtedness—taxes, and so forth—also subject to same approval agency.

Sixth. No first mortgage shall be ineligible for insurance under N. H. A. by reason of this loan or secondary lien upon property involved securing such loan.

Seventh. Loans for farm lands, buildings, livestock, equipment, repairs, subject to approval of Secretary of Agriculture.

Eighth. Person eligible for farm loan, subject to approval of Secretary of Agriculture, also eligible for benefits under Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act.

Ninth. Loan for purchase of business property or equipment subject to approval of Secretary of Commerce.

Tenth. Repayment of loans subject to terms prescribed by administrator and approving agency.

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

First. Establish Veterans' Placement Service Board—within U. S. E. S.—consisting of Administrator of Veterans' Affairs chairman, Director of National Selective Service System, Administrator of Federal Security Agency; policies carried out by chairman through executive secretary—Chief of Veterans' Employment Service; records of Veterans' Personnel Division, N. S. S. S., and Veterans' Employment Service available to board.

Second. U. S. E. S. to assign to States and Territories a veteran as veterans' employment representative, attached to public employment service in States; administratively responsible to board for implementing veterans' placement policies.

Third. State employment service employees assignable by board to duties of veterans' employment representative.

Fourth. Federal agencies' information available to board.

Fifth. Funds to State employment services under act of June 6, 1933, to be withheld unless registered given employment preference.

Sixth. Cost of administration of title to be special item in budget of U. S. E. S.; during current fiscal year operating funds to come from W. M. C. budget.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES FOR UNEMPLOYED VETERANS

First. Eligibility: Serving after September 16, 1940, honorably discharged, after or in 52-weeks period prior to enactment of act—except release by request unless having foreign service; must reside in United States at time of claim; earned for week less than allowance under this title, plus $3; registered and available for work.

Second. Payments for each week of unemployment up to 52 weeks which begins after effective date of act and within 24 months' period after final payment of mustering-out pay but not following any first 4 consecutive weeks following payment of mustering-out pay, increased pension under part VII or subsistence under part VIII.

Third. Disqualifications: Leaving work without good cause or discharged for misconduct, refusal to accept suitable work—defined—does not attend training courses without good cause, participation in labor disputes.

Fourth. Penalties: Allowance up to 5 weeks for disqualification or 9 weeks in case of successive disqualifications.

AMOUNT OF ALLOWANCE AND PAYMENTS

First. Fifteen dollars weekly plus $5 for one dependent, $8 for two dependents, $10 for three or more, less wages received for that week in excess of $3.

Second. Veteran entitled to 8 weeks of allowance for each month of service—or fraction of month.

Third. Dependent—defined—must not have earned $5 or more in week.

Fourth. Other Federal or State benefits—unemployment or disability compensation or noncontributory benefit—to be deducted from allowance—except pension compensation or retired pay from Veterans' Administration.

ADMINISTRATION

First. Administrator to utilize existing Federal and State facilites; power to delegate administrative authority.

Second. Social Security Board to reimburse State agencies for their administrative expense.

Third. Claimant entitled to hearing and appeal to Administrator.

MISCELLANEOUS

First. Subpena and aid of court in administration of act.

Second. Claimant shall report change of status.

Third. Penalty for fraud under act up to $1,000 fine, imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

Following is a digest of the provisions of H. R. 3200, introduced by me on September 14, 1943:

H. R. 3200—DEMOBILIZATION AND SURPLUS WAR PROPERTY ACT

SPECIAL AID REGARDING REHABILITATION, READJUSTMENT, AND REEMPLOYMENT OF ARMED FORCES

First. Authority for appropriation for expenditure by Administrator of Veterans' Affairs such funds necessary to provide such special aid and counsel.

Second. To honorably discharged veterans serving after December 6, 1941.

REHABILITATION AND TRAINING

Amendment of part VII of Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a) as follows:

First. Honorable discharged veterans eligible for vocational training—serving after December 6, 1941—prescribed by Administrator of Veterans Affairs.

Second. Vocational rehabilitation to disabled veterans—serving after December 6, 1941—as prescribed by Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

Third. Training course limited to 4 years and shall not extend beyond 6 years after termination of war.

Fourth. Administrator may employ personnel and experts necessary in administration to provide training.

Fifth. Utilize and extend existing Veterans' Administration facilities.

Sixth. Utilize facilities of other Government agencies and facilities maintained by joint Federal and State contribution.

Seventh. Contract with public or private institutions to provide additional training facilities.

Eighth. Administrator to prescribe payment of training allowances to trainees not entitled to pensions.

Ninth. Each trainee receiving pension in amount less than rate for total and temporary disability—including amount for dependents—to receive increase to equal such rates, deducting amount earned in training, if any.

Tenth. Benefits for injury incurred or aggravated in training same as if incurred in service.

Eleventh. Administrator authorized to use Federal and State employment agencies for placing trainees.

Twelfth. Appropriation of $500,000 for revolving fund providing emergency loans up to $100 to persons commencing training.

PURCHASE OF FARMS BY MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

First. Amendment of Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act to include individuals serving in armed forces after December 6, 1941, honorably discharged.

Second. Appropriation of $100,000,000 for each fiscal year prior to termination of war to carry out above.

Third. Appropriation of $1,000,000,000 for fiscal year beginning first after termination and for each succeeding 4 years.

Fourth. Increase in redemption and maturity value of War bonds of 10 percent to be used as part payment on farms purchased under this title. Must be purchased 3 months' prior to end of war.

EMPLOYMENT OF DISABLED VETERANS

First. Every employer having 100 or more employees shall employ for each 100 or major fraction 1 veteran serving after December 6, 1941, who has disability incurred or aggravated during service for which pension is payable under laws of Veterans' Administration.

Second. To provide special aid and counsel regarding readjustment, rehabilitation, and reemployment of veterans serving after December 6, 1941, Administrator authorized to spend such sums as may be necessary; authority for appropriation.

Third. Administrator authorized to use Federal and State employment agencies for placing trainees.

CONTINUATION OF SERVICE PAY

First. Every honorably discharged or released veteran serving in present war, upon request shall receive 3 months' furlough.

Second. Shall receive during such furlough pay and allowances received immediately prior to such period, with maximum of $100 per month.

Third. Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942 in effect during furlough period.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS

Amendment to Social Security Act to provide payment of unemployment compensation—effective July 1, 1944—to individuals (a) serving in armed forces after December 7, 1941; (b) honorably discharged or released from active duty; (c) registers with U. S. E. S. and State employment service.

First. For period of not less than 26 weeks following expiration of furlough, unless securing employment.

Amendment to section 1603 (a) of Internal Revenue Code on same basis as above.

Effect: After furlough, entitled to unemployment insurance up to 26 weeks; if still unemployed, to receive unemployment compensation payable within framework of system within State in which he resides.

SURPLUS WAR PROPERTY

First. President to appoint, with consent of Senate, Custodian of Surplus War Property.

Second. Property declared surplus by any agency to be transferred to Custodian.

Third. Board of directors of Smaller War Plants Corporation to conduct survey with view of disposing of such surplus so as to encourage establishment of businesses by veterans, other individuals, and to strengthen existing small business.

Fourth. Custodian authorized to extend credit in purchase of such surpluses, interest at not more than 3½ percent.

Fifth. War bonds—purchased at least 3 months prior to termination of war—increased in maturity and redemption value by 10 percent in purchase of surplus property.

SERVICE CREDIT FOR OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE BENEFITS

First. Honorably discharged or released veteran serving after December 6, 1941, granted credit on Social Security payments on basis of $1,700 annual salary.

Second. Applicable for each day in active service occurring after September 30, 1940 and prior to 3 months after termination.

Third. To anyone in land or naval forces of United States, including Coast Guard, W. A. C., Women's Reserve of Naval Reserve, Women's Reserve of Coast Guard Reserve, Marine Corps Women's Reserve.

Watch for Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BUTLER B. HARE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous-consent leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including therein an editorial found in the Independent of Anderson, S. C., March 23, 1944. It is as follows:

WATCH FOR PROPAGANDA

Students of German warfare and tactics are warning the Allies that the new Nazi propaganda barrage is due to start shortly.

There is already working here in the United States a very insidious organization called the Peace Now Movement.

This outfit has been criticized severely on all sides, but it continues to function, crying aloud for a negotiated peace.

Unquestionably, it is a Hitler-loving group and may be paid by the Germans.

Collier's has a special writer who insists that the greatest campaign of lies, false rumors, and half-truths is planned with the opening of the western invasion.

This propaganda will be for the purpose of creating disunity among the United Nations.

There will be stories of a revolution in Germany.

There will be atrocity tales.

Hitler will be reported ready to sue for peace.

There will be yarns about secret Nazi weapons designed to cripple our soldiers, make them die horribly.

Americans will be told that the British are permitting the Yankees to do all the fighting.

There will be attempts—further attempts—to make the Allies suspicious of Russia.

And hundreds of other impossible stories, cleverly phrased, which will be aimed at creating distrust among the Allies.

These lies are going to be difficult to assimilate, but if the public is sufficiently forewarned, it can be understood.

There will be plenty of renegade Americans to play into the hands of the Germans in this campaign.

There are always some who in order to get into the limelight will take notice of these stories and help the Nazis.

Some will join in just to be critical.

Others will want a negotiated peace.

The public is therefore warned not to believe these stories until they are confirmed by military authorities, and duly printed in the newspapers.

Believe only official reports—not rumors, not lies, not half truths dressed up to look like facts.

The barrage will soon start—it is time now to begin doubting anything that comes out of Germany or any neutral country.

This will be the greatest problem American citizen civilians have to face.

So prepare for it.

Demobilization of the Armed Forces After the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important tasks confronting our Nation is to arrange for the orderly demobilization of our military forces after the war. Frequently, someone suggests that the millions of men and women in the Army and Navy be retained in the services when the armistice comes until jobs can be found for them. I am afraid that too little consideration has been given the desires of the men and women themselves. I doubt if the families of servicemen will support such a program.

Recently a soldier who comes from my district wrote a letter to the editor of the Stars and Stripes in comment on a suggestion by Major General Hershey which, I believe, clearly sets forth the viewpoint of the average serviceman toward plans for keeping him in the Army after the fighting has ceased. If any legislation is needed to carry out demobilization plans, I think it would be well to bear in mind the statements which are contained in this letter. The letter follows:

TO THE EDITOR OF STARS AND STRIPES:

I don't know whether it is insubordinate to express disagreement with the views put forth by a general; I hope not. Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Director of Selective Service, was quoted in the January 18 edition of Stars and Stripes as saying, "Soldiers and sailors should be kept in uniform until jobs await them." I disagree, respectfully, but most emphatically.

If a law embodying the viewpoint expressed by General Hershey should be passed it would be a terrific blow to our morale in the armed forces. Practically all of us realize that this war must be fought until Germany and Japan are completely crushed. We know that nazi-ism and fascism must be destroyed if our democratic way of life is to be saved. But recognition of that fact does not lessen our desire to be home again. Among the important factors in keeping our morale high is the knowledge that the quicker the war is ended the quicker we return to civilian life. Under the present law we are in the armed forces for the duration, plus 6 months. We are all looking forward to that duration, for personal as well at patriotic reasons. To change the law at this stage would be a cruel blow to all our hopes and dreams for the future

Viewed from any angle the idea is utterly indefensible. In a democracy such as ours, the Army and Navy have only one reason for existing, to defend our country against its enemies. When this war is ended we shall require a standing army of only a fraction the size of the 11,000,000-man Army which we shall have on hand. There may or may not be jobs available in civilian life for all the rest. Whether there is will depend upon the intelligence with which our Government planned the reconversion of industry to peacetime production. But in any case, the problem of full-time employment is not a military problem; it is an economic question. To compel men to remain in the Army, merely, because jobs are not immediately available is a rank injustice. The men admittedly would not be needed for military service. Yet they would be denied the right to resume civilian life. Service in the Army under these conditions would be just another form of relief. And I feel certain that the vast majority of servicemen, if they had to depend upon the Government for temporary assistance, would much prefer to receive that aid as civilians, rather than remain in the "army of unemployed soldiers."

Compulsory military service for an indefinite period of time is regimentation. It is an ugly trend. Hitler used similar tactics to solve his unemployment problem. Ours is a free country. We can all do and say just about what we please. We want it to remain that way. Let us avoid any measures which endanger our American way of life.

Engle Answers Critics on Tule Lake Investigation

REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the Nevada City Nugget, a paper published in my district, on March 13, 1944, carried a front-page article in which it charged that the inability of our Government to secure a further exchange of prisoners with Japan is a direct result of the investigation of the riots of the Japanese at the Tule Lake camp, and urge that as a ground for my defeat and the election of my opponent in the coming election.

My conclusions with reference to the W. R. A. handling of the Tule Lake camp have been concurred in by every official investigation which has been made, including that made by the committee of our own California State Senate.

The refusal of the Japanese Government to exchange prisoners was based upon the fact that their people here had rioted claiming to have been mistreated. Our finding was that the W. R. A. by coddling and inefficiency in the camp had encouraged power-seeking and disloyal Japanese to defy civil authority and riot on the most trivial and unreasonable of grounds. The Japanese Government can find nothing in our charges against the W. R. A. which will support the claim that their nationals were mistreated—in fact we claim that the W. R. A. has provided for these Japanese in some instances beyond the requirements of fair treatment and on a scale not enjoyed by our own people.

The basic fact is that the riots, themselves widely publicized, had occurred. Thereafter, a "do nothing" policy which the article seems to suggest, would only have aggravated the evil. The best way to clean up bureaucratic inefficiency is to bring it to the light and try to correct it. Anything less would have been a failure in my duty to the people I represent.

It's Official: Monterey Is World's Leading Fishing Port

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call to the attention of the Members of this House and to the country as a whole the fact that this past year, the city of Monterey, Calif., became the leading fishing port in the entire United States. The extra effort made by the fishermen of that area increased production 16 percent over the preceding season, and constitutes, it seems to me, one of the most outstanding contributions to food production that has yet come to the attention of the American people. Those of us from this part of the country have long realized the tremendous effort that has been expended in this phase of the food-production program, and we have long suspected that Monterey had become the leading port of the Nation in this connection. The recent announcement of the Fish and Wildlife Service has confirmed this belief, and I include here as part of my remarks the Associated Press dispatch in which this is stated.

This announcement is additional justification for the survey of the Monterey Bay area, authorized in the river and harbor omnibus bill which passed the House earlier this week. I am convinced that this port will not only remain the leading fishing port in the Nation, but in years to come will develop into one of the great commercial ports of the country as well. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors deserves our sincere thanks for including Monterey Bay as one of the sites where the Army engineers are authorized to make preliminary explorations.

IT'S OFFICIAL: MONTEREY IS WORLD'S LEADING FISHING PORT

WASHINGTON, March 18.—The catch of America's No. 1 commercial fish, the pilchard, fell off to 486,816 tons in the 1943–44 season, which ended this month, compared with 501,114 tons in 1942–43, the Fish and Wildlife Service reported.

For Monterey, Calif., however, the season was all to the good. That town, the announcement said, became the leading fishing port in the country in terms of the weight of fish landed there, and was the leading port of the world with the possible exception of some of the Japanese ports.

UP 16 PERCENT

Monterey produced about 212,500 tons of pilchards, sometimes called California sardines. This was an increase of 16 percent over the preceding season. San Francisco increased its catch 9 percent, but Southern California, mainly San Pedro and San Diego, had a 33-percent decline.

The Los Angeles area, including San Pedro, was displaced as the Nation's No. 1 fishing port by Monterey. San Francisco, which in past years has led the rest, has been in third place for the last two seasons.

SHORTAGES CUT PACK

The over-all reduction in the pilchard industry, the Fish and Wildlife Service said, was partly due to lack of vessels and partly to a shortage of cannery workers. Though the goal set for pilchard canning was 4,500,000 standard cases, only 3,149,889 cases were produced. A large amount of pilchards are reduced to meal and oil and both these uses increased in 1943–44, 76,032 tons of meal being produced against 71,828 in the previous season, and with the oil production increasing from 12,508,958 gallons to 14,304,253 gallons.

Washington and Oregon have growing pilchard fisheries. These States landed 13,400 tons as compared with 500 tons in the season before.

No Time for Timidity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CALVIN D. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

NO TIME FOR TIMIDITY

Republicans in the Senate have just completed a reorganization of their party machinery, designed to furnish the aggressive leadership that the voters have a right to expect if they are to support Republican candidates this fall. While this reorganization looks forward to the party's control of the Senate after the election, its benefits will not be deferred until that time.

House Republicans have been working on a party program of legislation, a labor that Republican Senators have also undertaken. The fruits of this planning cannot be expected in this Congress, however, since the initiation of legislation is normally the function of the majority party. Until November the most useful work that the present minority can do is to correct the mistakes of the administration and uncover its abuses of power.

In this endeavor the House Republicans have many stout privates in the ranks, but their generalship has been, to say the least, unimaginative. SHAFER, HOFFMAN, and ENGEL of Michigan, HALLECK of Indiana, MILLER of Missouri, BUSBEY, MASON, SUMNER, and VURSELL of Illinois, and other Representatives, particularly those from the Midwest, have been fighting valiantly to expose and end the maladministration of the new dealers. Unfortunately, they have had to fight more often than not as individuals, not as members of a team.

There was undoubtedly a time when good political strategy dictated that the Republican minority hold back and let the burden of criticism fall on the conservative Democrats. That strategy cannot be continued indefinitely. Its usefulness has already passed.

Timidity has ceased to be a virtue. If the Republican Party expects the Nation to entrust it with leadership in the present crucial state of our affairs, it must show its willingness to lead. If the Republicans in the House cannot bolster their present leadership, they must find more vigorous and courageous captains.

The Forest Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, there is a real job to perform during this emergency in the protection of our forests, range, crop, industrial, and military facilities in the entire country. The State and fire protective associations are budgeted to about the full extent of their financial capacity at present and it appears that there never was a time when they had to depend more upon the help of the Central Government. I feel, therefore, that the Congress should give every possible consideration to a fire budget, both in and outside the national forest lands so that these areas will be given the ultimate protection possible.

During the fiscal year 1943 total expenditures for State and private land protection under the Clarke-McNary act were $142,200 for Montana. Of this amount, private owners paid $97,200; the State, $14,200, and the Federal Government, $34,100. Federal funds available to the Forest Service proved to be adequate. We can anticipate increased needs for protection this coming year, however. Snowfall is light this winter and 1944 may be dry. Slash is accumulating and is becoming a fire hazard. There is a decrease in the quantity and quality of manpower available to cope with the fire menace. We will unquestionably need to train an increasing number of citizen volunteers to stand on call for emergency duty.

As you know, with war needs so acute there has been a decided impetus given to the lumber situation in this country. There has been a ready sale for most any kind of tree that will make lumber. What this may mean to the future of the Nation's lumber industry is difficult to forecast but if the lumber trade becomes accustomed to using secondary species we may discover this will have a beneficial effect on sustaining post-war employment. New developments also offer possibilities, especially in the field of plywoods, pulp, and other wood products.

In the matter of fires in the national forests you will recall that last year was a comparatively easy fire season, especially in the areas outside of the South. But it might be well to keep in mind that the weather has been exceptionally dry since last June and while we were lucky last year the prospects for increased danger from fire are many times greater at the present time. Out in Montana we have had no snow to speak of up to date, our winter wheat is being blown away, and the conditions for an acute fire season are all in the making. It is imperative, I feel, that this situation should not be overlooked but that every possible attempt to cope with it through making the necessary appropriations and getting together as competent a fire-fighting personnel as possible should be made.

The value of parachute fire fighters in combating fires in the back country was again demonstrated. Sixty civilian public-service men who volunteered for this work, as well as several others, were given special training. A new type nonoscillating parachute was developed and patented by Frank Derry, Forest Service parachute trainer in the northern region, and gave excellent results in actual use.

In the range areas, war demands for beef, mutton, and wool have stimulated added interest among stockmen in problems of range management. A majority of them are in fairly general agreement with the Forest Service on management plans for getting a better distribution of cattle through salting and development of more watering places, building of fences to get a more even use of forage, and seasonal distribution of stock on spring and summer ranges. But the extreme variations in forage yield on any given range due to rainfall conditions results in considerable discussion as to the degree of stocking. However, conservative stocking meets with majority approval.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert a portion of a letter sent me by a friend in the Forest Service in whom I have the greatest confidence. I am sure that the House will find it of interest in helping them understand the problems confronting the Service in the intermountain region:

We have had a much more successful year than appeared possible last spring. Our September and October drouth prolonged a fire season which otherwise was easier than normal. The dry fall offered a real chance for bad fires. We had quite a few fires but we flew good trained crews rapidly to the place of need. We caught most of them while small. We used manpower in 1943 almost entirely made up of 16- and 17-year-old city boys who could not be useful on the farm without work experience and training, plus Italian internees who up to that time were remaining idle behind the fence at the Fort. We also used quite a few women.

The training and recruitment of these heterogeneous workers was made possible only because Congress did provide the money ahead of time. Your help in this was greatly appreciated. As a result of the kind of program made possible, we have the smallest bill for actual fire-fighting and emergency measures in our history. If the high wartime costs are at least in part discounted we have the smallest over-all cost in over 20 years. Small-fire-protection costs used to be accompanied by heavy fire damage. But this year our damage also is near an all-time low. True we were lucky and favored by an easier than average season but even so the costs and losses in many easier years were much higher.

It might be well to emphasize that the national forests during the past year have contributed greatly to our national needs for timber and livestock production. The Forest Service has collaborated actively with the War Production Board and other agencies in facilitating and stimulating the forest productions for war. Forest Service research has played a notable part in more efficient uses of wood, in increasing the yield of naval stores, and in the more efficient use of the western range for food production. All these activities have proved themselves indispensable in the war effort and will, of course, be continued to the best of the Forest Service's ability.

This additional load and responsibility has had to be carried, however, according to the Chief of the Forest Service "with constantly decreasing and shifting manpower. Activities not of first priority were so eliminated or reduced to a maintenance basis that personnel could be reassigned or released. By June 30, 1943, some 1,250 year-long personnel were in military furlough, as were an approximately equal number of temporary and seasonal employees on whom the Forest Service had relied for important services in the past."

Getting back to forest-fire protection, I should like to quote from the Report of the Chief of the Forest Service for last year:

Many factors necessitated more intensive forest-fire protection during the past year. Among these were the need to prevent diversion of men from war industries and farming to forest-fire fighting; the importance of uninterrupted operation and protection of power plants, transmission lines, railroads, industrial plants, and other facilities in forested areas; the need to avoid smoky atmosphere which might handicap defense against submarines, lower the efficiency of the aircraft-warning service, and interfere with air travel and pilot training; military installations and the presence of large numbers of soldiers in and near forested areas; and the threat of sabotage. Two instances of enemy incendiary bombing occurred in the forests of western Oregon. Fortunately neither resulted in serious fires.

One other thing that we should not lose site of is the fine work which has been done on the emergency rubber project which the Forest Service took over in 1942. This project has been responsible for the development of native sources of natural rubber, especially guayule, but including also Russian dandelion and golden rod. While this project has not as yet been able to develop much in the way of a supply of rubber which is so necessary for the war effort, it has at least started the foundation of a domestic supply which can, I believe, in time be grown to such proportions as to make us self-sufficient in rubber and not dependent on the Far East and other areas.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the Forest Service is one of the few agencies on which the Government during the war period has practiced such rigid economy. At the present time it has neither the money nor the men available as in ordinary years to fight fires or to carry on necessary research. The Forest Service could make a fine showing if it had the necessary appropriations to which it is entitled. However, what it lacks in money it tries to make up in the devotion of the men and women who comprise its personnel. They believe in their work and they are doing everything in their power to keep alive the policies and the procedures which have made the Forest Service the recognized protective agency that it is at the present time. Furthermore, we know that in the different parts of the country wherein the Forest Service has taken root it has achieved the cooperation of thousands of devoted citizens who realize the usefulness and worthwhileness of the Forest Service program, not only for today but for the years to come as well.

Senator Johnson Breaks Away

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald:

SENATOR JOHNSON BREAKS AWAY

Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON, Democrat from Colorado, delivered a dramatic speech night before last at North Park College, Chicago. Senator JOHNSON, hitherto a rather quiet and little publicized Member of the Senate, in this speech broke loudly and definitely with the Roosevelt administration.

JOHNSON was born at Scandia, Kans., January 1, 1884, got through high school at Lincoln, Nebr., and began his working life as a railroad laborer, being successively a telegrapher, train dispatcher, homesteader, and manager of a farmers' cooperative association.

He served four terms in the Colorado Legislature 1923–31, was Lieutenant Governor of Colorado 1931–33, and Governor 1933–37. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1936, and reelected in 1942.

This Chicago speech of his seems so significant that we quote liberally from it:

"History will name the fourth term, if it ever materializes, as 'the term of defeat and frustration.'

"The greatest tragedy of American political history was the President's decision 4 years ago to seek a third term—the term of appeasement.

"It (the New Deal) launched the 1940 campaign by appeasing the internationalists with the appointment of two old-line Republicans (Frank Knox and H. L. Stimson) as Secretaries, respectively, of the Navy and War. It appeased the nationalists by assuring them 'again and again' that no mother's son would be sent to fight in a foreign war."

The New Deal, continued Senator JOHNSON, appeased Japan prior to Pearl Harbor by selling Japan all the war goods it could pay for.

"It appeased China with money and credit and, after the election, appeased Great Britain by going to war. It has been appeasing everyone everywhere ever since, with lend-lease, at a cost to the American taxpayers of billions.

"It appeased Russia by junking the Atlantic Charter. It appeased John L. Lewis, the railroad brotherhoods, at the back door of the White House, after scornfully running them down at the front door with the beating of drums."

"One-man control" of the Democratic Party, said Senator JOHNSON, has reduced that party from power and greatness to hopeless impotence. He added that it would be "a relatively small matter in human events if Mr. Roosevelt were to go down to defeat." What alarms JOHNSON, he says, is that Mr. Roosevelt "has dragged down wih him the great liberal movement which he himself launched, and the great Democratic Party which he himself revitalized."

"In the approaching election, the people's liberty and the people's freedom will either regain some lost ground or slip a little closer to the apparently inevitable precipice of one-man rule.

"It would be wrong to say that this Republic stands at the crossroads tonight. It has long since passed the crossroads. It has already traveled too many miles down the wrong road. The choice in November will determine whether we shall keep going down that wrong road or retrace our steps and get back on the right road.

"Should the present running row between the Executive and the Congress persist, America will find herself in a war crisis and a post-war crisis, and her Government in a hopeless deadlock."

About Presidential candidates, Johnson said that unless they "—and all of them—give the people assurance that they can provide dynamic leadership and at the same time cooperate fully with Congress as a coordinate branch of the Government, the voters must reject them in the name of survival. The consequences of further conflict in the Government are too awful to contemplate."

And about Mr. Roosevelt's fondness for fanning up class hatreds, JOHNSON made these pregnant remarks:

"Any President who promotes disunity is playing with matches in a powder factory. The all-important spirit of cooperation, patience, and good will cannot be overemphasized. Racial conflicts, labor and management strife, and manifestations of class hatreds, are bad omens and danger signals which should put us on guard that tyranny is just around the corner."

Altogether a remarkable speech, and a significant breakaway.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on March 18, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, a few days ago I received one of the most interesting letters I have read during my 5 years in Congress. It was written by one I had not previously realized was a friend. The letter referred to the recent attempt on the part of a few political enemies of mine to discredit the Hall Furlough Club movement.

"Why is it, Mr. HALL," the writer asks, "that you, as Representative of the overwhelming majority of Americans in this section, have to submit to such insults, such innuendoes, and vicious insinuations at the hands of under-cover persons who could not possibly aspire to any public office? Do not these men realize that in questioning your motives and holding you up to ridicule they are slapping the Americans who elected you directly in the face?

"I was mad clean through," my friend continued, "when the women interested in the Hall Furlough Clubs were smeared as a political group. Isn't this a free country? Haven't those women the right to call their club by whatever name they wish? It seems to me an outrage that anybody who professes to be an America would dare be so hypocritical or to raise his voice against such a wonderful idea as the Rall Furlough Clubs."

Well, I was so pleased with this lady's reaction that I sat right down and answered her.

"Dear madam," I began, "you are absolutely right in calling those few persons hypocrites who have tried to smear the patriotic women of the Hall Furlough Clubs. But, of course, you can understand their objective. They were trying to scare the women out of the clubs. As usual, however, they missed fire. Their small-time plot collapsed. They got fooled. Not only did they fail to scare the women out of the Hall Furlough Clubs but they likewise failed to silence the people's demand for passage of the Hall furlough bill. So the whole scheme was a boomerang to them."

I noticed the newspapers played up the formation of what they called a rival club. The Hall Furlough Clubs are not interested in rivalry. What they want to see, they tell me, is legislation passed that is beneficial to the servicemen. They want to help the soldier. They don't care how many other clubs with different names are started if they too are helping the soldiers.

But they want the rival club or clubs, whoever they are, to be sure their motive in organizing is for service and not for allowing themselves to be used as a springboard from which to hurl vicious aspersions and mudballs at me which the men behind the scenes make for them.

"Do not be surprised," I continued in my answer, "that my enemies have resorted to these below-the-belt methods. They have always done this. Yes, of course, they are slapping the people of my district in the face when they try to belittle their elected Representative. But it is all a part of their plan to rob the people of their right to make their own laws by destroying, through deadly propaganda, the people's faith in those they elect and to transfer the people's power to a select and appointed few who will govern the country as their whims and fancies dictate."

The women of the Hall Furlough Clubs won their greatest battle last week when they resisted these insults and refused to be scared.

All of which is best summed by a verse from De Montford which runs:

"Think'st thou there are no serpents in the world
But those who slide along the grassy sod
And sting the luckless foot that presses there?
There are who in the path of social life
Do bask their spotted skins in fortune's sun
And sting the soul."

Air-Line Highway From Memphis, Tenn., to Houston, Tex.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

MARCH 22, 1944.

Hon. THOMAS H. MCDONALD,
Bureau of Public Roads,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMMISSIONER MCDONALD: We, the undersigned, are all Members of the House of Representatives and are interested in obtaining the development of an air-line highway from Memphis, Tenn., to Houston, Tex. This highway should proceed in a southwesterly direction from Memphis, Tenn., diagonally through the southern part of Arkansas, northwest part of Louisiana, and southeastern part of Texas, by way of Pine Bluff, Ark., and Shreveport, La.

Such a highway, when completed, will fill a real need in the Southwest and will bear a very heavy load of traffic, some of it moving from the northeastern part of the United States to our neighbor to the south—Mexico.

In your post-war plans, we are asking that the construction and development of such a road be included as a super-highway and an artery of commerce.

Iowa War Chest Makes Splendid Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, the Iowa War Chest, Inc., affiliated with the National War Fund, has completed a remarkable campaign for funds. It raised a gross of $2,525,244, which amount was only exceeded in two other States. I include as part of my remarks the following letter received from the secretary of Iowa War Chest, Inc., which gives a full résumé of the fine work accomplished by this organization:

IOWA WAR CHEST, INC.,
Des Moines, Iowa, March 21, 1944.

Congressman CHARLES HOEVEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HOEVEN: The Iowa War Chest was organized last May to conduct the money-raising campaigns for the national war fund in Iowa. The national war fund raises money for 17 agencies approved by the President's War Relief Board. U. S. O. is the recipient of approximately 50 percent of the money raised.

I thought you might be interested in learning first hand the results of the Iowa campaign.

Iowa's quota to national war fund was $2,127,500. To this was added $41,435 for administrative expenses from May 1, 1943, to September 30, 1944. Then a 4.8-percent safety factor was added to the original amount, giving Iowa a campaign quota of $2,272,779.

Iowa was organized on a congressional-district basis, with a vice president and two executive committeemen from each district; then each county was organized. If the local county had a local campaign organization that was used for other purposes that organization was used as it was not the purpose of the Iowa War Chest to interrupt existing county organizations that have proved themselves.

Iowa was organized from the top clear down to the local township and school district. When the campaign was completed, Iowa raised a gross of $2,525,244. There were only two States in the Union that did better than Iowa—namely, North Dakota and Oregon.

Of the $41,435 that was set up for administrative costs, $17,955.02 remains on deposit at the Iowa Des Moines National Bank & Trust Co. as of March 13; thus, Iowa campaign expenses were less than 2 percent of the gross amount of money raised.

The success of the Iowa campaign can be directly attributed to the excellent leadership found in each county, plus the willingness of a multitude of volunteer workers to call upon their friends and neighbors for a generous cash gift. It was gratifying to know how willing the people of Iowa were to give to such a worthy cause.

I am just passing this information on to you as I thought it would help keep you advised as to the events happening in Iowa that are directly connected with war programs.

With kind regards,
Very truly yours,
ROBERT H. CALDWELL,
Executive Secretary.

Water Hyacinth Menace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES DOMENGEAUX
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss a matter which is of much concern to my section of the country and perhaps to other areas.

I refer to the obstruction of waterways as the result of water hyacinths. This has been a steadily growing problem in Louisiana, which State has such a wide expanse of navigable streams, bayous, and canals.

While considerable has been done by the Federal Government to relieve the situation, there remains a great menace to navigation. It becomes increasingly difficult to carry on operations of lumber concerns, oil development, and other industries requiring the use of these streams. Hundreds of fishermen, trappers and others are dependent upon waterway transportation for their livelihood.

I have frequently called attention to the difficulty created by these water hyacinths and particularly their hindrance to commercial development. I greatly appreciate the aid the Government has extended, but I feel that the problem is so extensive it should be given special consideration in any post-war planning.

South Louisiana, and especially the Third Congressional District which I have the honor of representing, contains a virtual network of streams which serve a vital role in the economic and social life of our citizens. These streams are used to the fullest possible extent and are necessary to the maintenance and welfare of many communities. Funds to eliminate the hyacinths are justified from many angles, and, in fact, I know of no comparable expenditure that could add more to the prosperity, happiness, and general good of the large area involved.

The office of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department points out that Federal funds authorized for this work have provided for the extermination or removal of the hyacinth plants from the navigable waters of Louisiana insofar as they are or may become an obstruction to navigation. The first removal operations in 1900 were carried out by a mechanical crushing plant. In 1902 the use of chemicals was authorized and from that year until 1936 the hyacinths were controlled by spraying with a solution of arsenic and soda, by hand removal, and by booms. The use of chemicals has been abandoned and removal by hand reduced to a minimum. In recent years the methods of control have been by means of crushing plant, power-operated conveyors, and booms.

The Army engineers stress that the numerous waterways in eight parishes, or counties, comprising my congressional district, are a source of widespread hyacinth infestation. Under ordinary circumstances the greater portion of the hyacinth removal activities in Louisiana has been centered in that area, with preventative maintenance carried on in the feeder areas during the winter to reduce the quantity of vegetation which otherwise might find its way to the main streams during the peak of the hyacinth growing season. During the present emergency it has been necessary to schedule removal operations providing first for the destruction of growths detrimental to commerce and navigation using the main channels, with work in the feeder areas materially reduced.

I was recently assured by the Chief of Engineers that upon exhaustion of funds remaining available to the district engineer for hyacinth work in Louisiana, an additional allotment of money appropriated for river and harbor maintenance would be made for the continuance of necessary hyacinth removal operations in the principal navigable streams in order to insure the free movement of traffic of importance to the war effort.

We all realize that war conditions and needs make it necessary to curtail many projects developed during peacetime and postpone expansion of others. As great as the problem may be, the natural limitation of funds and manpower serves to render impracticable any attempt to reach a generally satisfactory solution at this time. However, the restricting of operations means that there will be that much more work to be done after the war in clearing up these streams and keeping them in satisfactory condition. Expenditure of funds for that purpose is a most wise investment with far-reaching returns.

I have always been greatly interested in waterway development and see untold possibilities for utilization of the waterways of south Louisiana. This, in turn, will mean much as a contributing factor in continued development of the Nation's waterway system as a whole.

I vigorously urge that in our post-war plans ample provision be made for solving the water-hyacinth problem through a survey of the needs and the carrying out of a general program. Whatever the cost, I am certain it will be small compared to the benefits that will follow. This is a matter in the best interests of navigation, health, commercial development and the happiness and contentment of our citizens.

Greek Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, March 25 is Greek Independence Day. On this auspicious occasion, let us pause for a moment to reflect upon the contributions of that geographically small but spiritually great country to civilization.

The very idea of democracy was born in ancient Greece. And in the words of Aristotle, all who live with the Greek culture are Greeks. Thus, nowadays in this great democracy of ours, we might consider ourselves the cultural brothers of Greece. The ideal of freedom has never been extinguished in the minds of the Greek people. In ancient times, they fought against the Persians who threatened their physical existence as well as the great culture of Greece. The people of Greece were the first to rise against the tyranny of the Holy Roman Empire. In 1821 people from every phase of Greek life; goat herders, peasants, scholars, sailors, rose at the signal of Archbishop Germanos from the monastary of Patras. From Greece the desire for freedom spread throughout Europe, arousing the spark of revolt through the length and breadth of the continent. It even spread to the Western Hemisphere where the colonies of the Spanish Empire, grasping at the idea of freedom, freed themselves from the Spanish yoke.

For years the people of Greece, undaunted and ever hopeful, struggled to gain their independence. Finally, in 1830, almost 10 years since they had started the fight, the Turks were finally driven out of Greece. During this period the great powers of the world did not stand idly by and watch the struggle. Our country, Mr. Speaker, can point with pride to the role we played in helping the Greeks gain their independence. Daniel Webster supported the cause of Greek freedom, as did Henry Clay and others. Our President, James Monroe, sent words of encouragement and physical aid to the heroic people of Greece.

England shared in aiding the Greek people. An English admiral helped defeat the Turkish fleet in one of the decisive battles of the war.

Today the Greek people are again fighting for their freedom. They were attacked in 1940 by Mussolini and his Fascist henchmen, but the Antartes of Greece were able to withstand the onslaughts of the inglorious Italian Army. Finally, after 6 months in which the Greek soldiers had pushed the Fascist legions back into Albania, Hitler had to come to the assistance of his ally. Even the German Wehrmacht, which had already rolled through Poland and Czechoslovakia, was stopped for 6 weeks by that tiny band of valiant Greeks. This 6 weeks that the Greeks held out was 6 weeks for the British to fortify the Suez Canal and the Mediterranean sea lanes to defend the Near East. It meant that the Russians had 6 more weeks of peace in which to produce food, manufacture munitions, and arm her people for the coming struggle against the Nazis.

The Greek soldiers knew that eventually the German armies would overrun their beloved country but like another group of men, those heroic defenders of Bataan, they knew that every minute they held out was precious. And today, with German soldiers tramping through their land, the people of Greece have still not given up the struggle for freedom. They fight on through their underground movements. Despite Nazi terriorism, starvation, and exploitation, they have not lost hope. When an American flyer was forced down over Greece, Greek guerrillas picked him up and hid him from the Germans. The Greek people allowed their homes and villages to be burned rather than turn the American soldier over to the Germans. They helped the American flyer to escape and through him sent a message to the American people; a message of their hope in the future, a prayer for the liberation of their country.

Here in America, Americans who have emigrated from Greece are engaged in the great war effort that our country is making. Tomorrow, on the anniversary of Greek independence, these Greek Americans will purchase extra War bonds to aid in maintaining American independence. This is the type of people that helped make this country the great country it is. Let us work and strive to reconstitute the Greek nation, as well as all the other countries that Hitler has engulfed, so that they may rise again as free and independent nations with all the rights and privileges they so richly deserve.

A Soldier's Poem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FADJO CRAVENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD I include a poem sent by M. T. Emberson, an American soldier in the South Pacific, to Mr. Max Hampton, editor of the Booneville Democrat, published in Booneville, Logan County, Ark., and which poem appeared in the March 16, 1944, issue of that paper. The poem is as follows:

Sitting on my G. I. bed,
My G. I. hat upon my head,
My G. I. pants, my G. I. shoes
Everything free, nothing to lose.
G. I. razor, G. I. comb,
G. I. wish that I was home.
They issue everything we need,
Paper to write on, books to read.
They issue food to make you grow,
G. I. wish I had a furlough.
Your belt, your shoes,
Your G. I. tie,
Everything free, nothing to buy.
You eat your food on G. I. plates,
Buy your needs at G. I. rates.
G. I. this and G. I. that,
G. I. haircut and G. I. hat.
Everything here is Government Issue,
G. I. sure am not going to miss you.

Wanted: A Simplified Tax Form—Tax Simplification Necessary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, history records that taxes have been a fertile source of rebellions throughout the ages. In fact, the slogan, "Taxation without representation is tyranny" was one of the battle cries of the American Revolution that separated the Colonies from England.

Today we are confronted with a tax problem and rebellion that would make the "Boston tea party" take on the proportions of a Sunday picnic in comparison.

About 50,000,000 Americans have been required to file income-tax returns this month. Ten millions of these taxpayers will be seeing a tax form for the first time in their lives. Most all of them will condemn the complexity of the forms to be filled out.

It is plainly up to this Congress to consolidate and simplify the present tax laws; and to insist that the Treasury Department prepare income-tax forms which can be easily understood by every taxpayer. This should be a first order of business. Last January I introduced a bill in this Congress, known as House Resolution 220, which, if passed, would provide the machinery for the simplification of our present tax tangle. Since that time I have often contacted the staff and members on the House Committee on Ways and Means and offered numerous suggestions designed to aid them in their efforts to bring forth a tax simplification measure.

A few of my suggestions, some of them received from taxpayers of Minnesota, are as follows:

First. Combine the normal tax, surtax, and Victory tax into one simple computation, providing for an adjustment in exemptions and deductions so that the total taxes collected will remain approximately the same as long as the need for high taxes continues to exist. Very few people object to paying their full share of taxes.

Second. Eliminate the requirement that individuals earnings $5,000 or less file an income-tax return by the simple expediency of tailoring their withholding tax to fit their financial status. The employer and employee can jointly determine the amount of salary or wages to be withheld for taxes.

If the taxpayer feels that too much has been withheld, he may, at his own desire, file a return and apply for a refund. It is believed that 30,000,000 taxpayers may be relieved of the harrowing task of preparing and filing an income-tax return if this or a similar plan becomes law.

Third. At present the law requires that tax payments be made quarterly. I believe and propose that tax payments should be made no oftener than twice a year.

Dozens of letters have come to my office from constituents who rebel against the complexity of the tax forms. I think that their views and sentiments should be heard, so that we, the duly elected Representatives of the people will increase and intensify our efforts to bring about these much needed tax reforms. Following are a few paragraphs from letters received from tax experts, farmers, bankers, and others:

I am sure you know that the common man in your district is not objecting to pay what he owes—but he is just about driven to distraction in an effort to find out what that amount may be.

Only last month when it became necessary for our farmers to make an income-tax estimate by December 15, I assisted a great many of them who came to me, and I want you to know that not one ever as much as batted an eye when the amount of payment which was required was disclosed, and many—yes, many—did not even want to take some of the deductions that were available to them.

I notice Congress is going to try to simplify the law, and that is certainly very much needed. Along that line I want to make a few concrete suggestions:

First, people are not complaining so much about the rate or amount of the tax. They all realize we are in war and will have to pay, but they do object to the complicated nature of the law.

Second, the estimating provision or declaration of income in the so-called pay-as-you-go plan is bad. Why should people be compelled to guess at their income. I just heard it announced over the radio that several millions of people will be entitled to refunds for over-payments of taxes which they have made. In plain words the Government has extorted money from the people to which it is not entitled. Further, according to the radio announcement these people will probably have to wait until fall before they get their money back. It should be quite evident to Members of Congress and to the Revenue and Treasury Departments that people cannot guess at their incomes. And then if they guess wrong they are to be penalized with a fine.

Third, this can be avoided, without any hardship to the Government. All that is required is to require semiannual income tax returns, and payment of the tax due on the income actually earned and received. This returns and the tax could be required as of say, July 1 and December 31 of each year. This would be much better than our present "guessing" declaration of income.

Why can't Congress pass an income-tax bill that people can understand, and don't have to go through a Turkish bath while making it out. Do away with the surtax, normal tax, and Victory tax and combine them all into one tax. The people are willing to pay, because they realize this war must be paid for. Do away with the earned income credit and all forgiveness features. A law could be made whereby the person on a salary would have no report to make as his withholding taxes would take care of that.

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fourteenth Judicial District Bar Association of Minnesota, in conference assembled at Crookston, Minn., this 12th day of February 1944, That such laws be passed, regulations provided for their operation, and instructions issued, as to simplify the making of income-tax returns, and enable the average layman, required to make such returns and pay such tax, to understand the laws pertaining to the same, and make out his return with reasonable facility, and at the same time not reduce the amounts of income to be derived from that source by the Treasury Department of the Federal Government.

The present Federal income-tax report blank is so complicated and confusing that it is irritating the tax-paying public, and taking far too much time that should be used otherwise. The people expect and insist that Congress nullify the present form, and cause to be formulated, a simple, understandable, and just method or system. When experts need to attend meeting for the study of the return blanks, and then disagree; when our local bankers and attorneys are confused; when our commercial teachers have Federal agents call to help them complete their blank; then it becomes evident that a new, simple, clear-cut system is needed.

Why not have a simple statement showing the amount of income and the amount of outgo—the difference, less deductions, to be the basis on which to compute the tax.

I was glad to notice in the paper the other day, that you and others are trying to get Congress to simplify the income-tax reports. If you were out among your constituents you would hear plenty of complaining and headaches.

It is about the worst set-up anyone could conceive of, and I do not believe that even the parties that figured out this complicated income-tax report understood it themselves. I am sure that a lot of Federal agents do not.

Following is an editorial from the Red Lake Falls Gazette, dated January 6, 1944, which sums up the sentiment of the people in my district very well:

Representative CARLSON of Kansas, member of the Ways and Means Committee, calls the present Federal revenue statutes "a hodge-podge of language that cannot be correctly and definitely interpreted by a Philadelphia lawyer." He proposes to simplify procedure whereby most income taxes would be automatically deducted from wages and salaries, this making it unnecessary for millions of people to file any income-tax returns at all. Whatever the process, Congress should lose no time in simplifying the returns. Even the employees of the Internal Revenue Department are befogged by the provisions of the law. In place of making it as hard as possible for citizens to comply with the law, Congress should make it easy.

Mr. Speaker, all of us are glad that the members of the House Ways and Means Committee have assured us that they have now prepared a tax simplification bill, which the House will consider and act on in the very near future.

This will be a great relief to the American taxpayers and we compliment the members of the committee for their diligent and excellent work on this serious problem.

The Republican Party and Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSE P. WOLCOTT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address made by me over the Columbia network from the studios of WTOP, Washington, March 21, 1944:

Last Tuesday evening over this network, the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN charged that the Republican Party is the party of inflation. In order to justify this conclusion, one must find that the Republican Party is opposed to sound money; is opposed to a sound fiscal policy, and is opposed to price control. Mr. PATMAN erroneously bases his conclusion on the charge, which is far from borne out by the facts, that the Republican Party is opposed to price control. I do not presume to speak for the Republican Party but I am a Republican and am daily consulting with other Republicans in Congress in respect to party aims and policies so I believe that I can make the statement, without fear of successful contradition, that the Republican Party is heartily in favor of the extension of price controls. When Mr. Leon Henderson, the first Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, was testifying before the House Banking and Currency Committee, we were discussing whether price controls alone could stop inflation.

While some of us disagreed with the manner in which price controls were administered under Mr. Henderson, we all gave him credit for having a broad, basic knowledge of economics. I asked Mr. Henderson, "You are of the opinion that the control of prices alone will not prevent inflation?" He answered, "Yes, sir; I am of the firm opinion that the control of prices alone will not do that (that is prevent inflation) and that there must be taken into account the fiscal and monetary policies." "It seems to me that (price control) is one of the main legs of this particular body, that is fiscal control, monetary control, and price control." So I think not only Mr. Henderson is of the opinion that price control alone will not prevent inflation but the majority of sound thinking economists treat this subject as if it were a three-legged stool. In order to successfully prevent inflation, we must have effective price control, we must have a sound money policy and we must have a sound fiscal policy.

No one has yet successfully charged the Republican Party with advocating unsound money policies. As a matter of fact, it will be recalled that on many occasions during the past years when Republicans have unsuccessfully fought the attempts of this administration to depreciate the value of our money they have been charged with being too conservative. When the Republicans have opposed what is commonly known as printing-press money they have been charged with being too sound. Likewise no one has ever successfully charged that the Republican Party has ever favored loose and unsound fiscal policies. When the Republicans were urging a balanced Budget; when they were opposing unnecessary expenditures by the Federal Government for projects of doubtful value; when they were warning that the creation of a disproportionately large national debt might result in economic chaos; when they were insisting that nonmilitary expenditures be cut to the bone, they surely were not reflecting the attitude of people who believed in a reckless fiscal policy which would result in inflation. No; I think any clear-thinking, unbiased person will agree that the monetary and fiscal policies of the Republican Party have been sound.

Now, then, let us look at the third leg of this three-legged stool—price control. Mr. PATMAN says in his speech, and I know that he is sincere in this: "In fact, the vitality of our democratic processes is based upon opposing viewpoints, and genuine partisan discussion is an important safeguard to the proper democratic decision." He does not think, however, that there should be any opposing viewpoints in time of war. He believes that everyone should follow blindly the leadership of the individual, or oligarchy of individuals, who are now managing our civilian as well as our war economy. That approach spells unity only to the many who would continue unsound fiscal and monetary policies. It is the kind of unity which, if indulged in to excess, might destroy the principles and ideals of government for which our men are fighting all over the world and might result in losing the war at home after our armed forces have won it on the battle fronts abroad.

We Republicans are very much in favor of continuing price controls as an essential part of anti-inflation machinery. Unless the Price Control Act is continued, there will be no control over any prices, rents, wages, or salaries, starting at 12 o'clock on the night of June 30. The Republicans have been so concerned by this fact that we have insisted that committee hearings be held immediately so there would be no doubt about legislation being enacted before the dead line. Surely Mr. PATMAN presents a rather peculiar paradox when he erroneously charges in one breath that the Republicans are opposed to price contro' and in the next breath complains of Republican insistence on early action on legislation to continue the Office of Price Administration. In order to do the subject full justice, the committees of Congress should have started work on price controls weeks ago.

Speaking for myself, and for many Republicans with whom I have discussed the matter, it is our purpose to continue price-control legislation with all of the powers and authority which are necessary to control prices. It is quite generally admitted that the administration of price control is not without fault, in fact, Mr. PATMAN in his radio speech last week not only admits this but says he fully appreciates the irritations which have been caused, going on to say that "mistakes have been made—many of them." What we seek to do in price control is to continue the authority to control prices, but believing that many of these mistakes and faults and irritations have emanated from the attempts of O. P. A. and other administration henchmen to control business, agriculture, labor, and industry, in addition to the control of prices, we seek to clarify the language of the law sufficiently so that even the administrators of the act will understand that it has been and will continue to be the intent of Congress that the powers contained in the Price Control Act shall be used to control prices and for nothing else.

We gave the President the power to stabilize prices, rents, wages, and salaries. We gave him the authority to make adjustments in maximum prices to correct gross inequities. He seeks to use this authority to control business, agriculture, labor, and industry. Attempts have been made to use this power to socialize business, agriculture, labor, and industry clearly in defiance of Congressional intent. Last March the Congress had to step in and take from the President some of the authority which he arrogated to himself to set ceilings on wages and salaries, contrary to the standards set up in the act. He claimed to have authority under the act and did arbitrarily set a ceiling on maximum net salaries and wages below those which were guaranteed by Congress. The issue was not the amount which he decreed but was whether or not he should assume to have authority to amend an act passed by Congress. If he had had the authority to limit wages and salaries below that of the standards set by Congress, then it follows that he could have limited wages to as low as a thousand dollars or less per year. Had he been permitted to exercise this assumed authority, he could have effectuated the socialization of labor and industry. The thought was that the American workingman should have protection against this socialistic tendency—against this usurpation of power, and for that reason, the Congress found it necessary to repeal that part of the Price Control Act under which the President claimed to have this authority.

We all have in our files numerous evidence that the power which we have delegated to the President to control prices has been misused. Hundred of thousands of small businesses are not operating today because of the misuse of administrative authority or the arrogation of undelegated powers. Thousands of properties are now nonproductive because of mismanagement and misuse of these powers and authority. It was never intended by Congress that the powers contained in the Price Control Act would be used to enforce disciplinary action taken for the apparently reckless purpose of driving business, labor, and industry into economic oblivion, the natural consequence of satisfying someone's fancy in respect to untried, uncertain, and unsound social and economic policies.

We Republicans seek to continue the machinery essential to control prices but we seek to give the American businessman, the American laboring man, the American farmer, and industrialist at least an opportunity to review his grievances before he is "blacked out" of the economic and social picture. The Office of Price Administration is a law and a court unto itself. The only questions which can be reviewed by any aggrieved person are those involving the constitutionality of the act and whether the Administrator acted within the law in setting a maximum price or a maximum wage, and then only in a special Emergency Court of Appeals set up under the act. All other courts, State and Federal, are expressly denied jurisdiction. There is no opportunity for any effectual review of any of the orders or regulations of the O. P. A. in the constitutionally created courts of the United States or the courts of the several States. Many of the evils in the administration of price controls can be removed if the people are given an opportunity to review their grievances in their regularly constituted courts.

At the proper time, I shall introduce amendments to create a board of administrative review within the Price Control Administration, which, in addition to consulting with the Administrator, will have jurisdiction to amend, modify, or set aside any regulation or order which, upon review, appears to be not in keeping with the public interest or which does not appear to be fair or in keeping with sound business practices and which might result in bankruptcy or other hardship. This board will be authorized to sit and conduct hearings anywhere in the United States, either as a board, by subcommittee, or by commissioner, thus obviating the necessity of expensive trips to Washington by litigants from distant points.

The proposal provides for expeditious action in lieu of the present dilatory method of review which sometimes results in months intervening between the filing of the petition for redress and final decision. I shall also offer an amendment granting the right of recourse to the Federal courts for persons and concerns claiming injury by the unfair operation of the price-control program. This procedure shall be the same as that provided for in the case of any other agency of the Government. This will not interfere in any manner with the control of prices; in fact it should induce cooperation, because we shall be assured of fair and impartial enforcement.

Amendments will also be offered clarifying certain provisions of the act, including the authority to correct gross inequities so as to more clearly indicate the intent of Congress that the powers granted in the Price Control Act shall be used only for the purpose of controlling prices.

Amendments will also be offered, which, in effect, will outlaw consumer food subsidies. No law which Congress has ever passed has ever authorized the payment of consumer subsidies. Their use does not keep prices down nor can prices be stabilized by such use of the taxpayers' money. Consumer subsidies have nothing to do with the effectual control of food prices and make price control much more difficult because they are in themselves inflationary.

In summary, we shall insist upon removing the causes of inflation which we agree to be unsound monetary and loose fiscal policies. We shall insist upon a continuance of price control and a courageous and fair administration of the act. We shall insist upon these powers being used to control prices and shall attempt to prevent the use of these powers to socialize labor, agriculture, and business. In short, our program will result in the orderly control of prices under and in compliance with the American Constitution and not in spite of it.

Address of Hon. Richard M. Kleberg of Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 24, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] before the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers Association:

Mr. President, distinguished visitors, fellow members of the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers Association, ladies and gentlemen, I was much interested in the talk that preceded mine, because of the fact that way back there, in a small way, I had something to do with setting up the great organization known as the National Livestock and Meat Board. Ideas began to congeal and take form, and finally one day, after these ideas had been partly whipped together, a meeting was held of cowmen and feeders, and butchers, delicatessen men, hotel men, packers, and everybody else that was interested, in Kansas City. I happened at that time to be honored with being president of this association, and its representative at that meeting, at which the National Livestock and Meat Board was organized, and to hear Mr. Pollock talk this morning concerning the path that has been followed, and the progress that has been made by our representatives in the distribution of the by-products of what this association produces, has been indeed a revelation.

I would like to make this comment, having been one of the members who has tasted this synthetic steak up here, that it might be taken in a sort of a double-barreled sense. I am not so sure that Joe Montague agrees with me on this proposition. We both tasted it, and I think we both like another product that Anheuser-Busch makes better than we do this one [laughter and applause], and another phase of it is that due to the peculiarly large amount of salt which is put into this product, and in view of the fact that indubitably it will be dispensed at places where another product, made by Anheuser-Busch, is served, I believe that it will result in an increased sale of the latter and more likable of the two products [laughter and applause]. It will make you thirsty.

I don't want to be too serious this morning, but we have come a long way in these United States under a system represented by those Star-Spangled Banners that you see in this room. A long time ago, before what that flag stands for came into being, some words were written by the guttering light of a candle on a drum head, where a ragged, tattered, cold and hungry army, following a matchless leader, was about to embark on the march at Valley Forge, where an army wide trail of blood was left by patriots who gave us what we have today. Those words were, "These are the days that try men's souls," and veritably, my friends, those days are here again. Tinkering and error, two of the major frailities of humanity, has brought this condition upon us. Men learn, apparently, but to forget, and then learn all over again, and it is because we forget to remember as a Nation that we are confronted with the days we have today.

We are confronted with high concern for the ravaging confusion which envelopes this great Nation during the period of its greatest trials, and the period of its incomparable responsibility. Never before in the history of the world, as it is reflected in the chronology of human events, has any people shouldered the responsibility which the people of the United States shoulder today. This responsibility is no longer confined to the limits of our own fair land, but this responsibility covers the entire world. Every thoughtful Christian person in that world, wherever he or she is to be found, is looking toward us for the final solution and the final day when the drums of war will beat no more and men will live in peace again. [Applause.]

We Americans, yes, and some of those Americans, Texans, have been far too careless in permitting the inculcation of foreign ideologies and isms which have crept into this great system of ours. This laxity has brought the ravaging enemy confusion into our midst.

Attainment in the midst of confusion, my friends, is the most difficult of all objectives. In speaking to you today, I am cognizant of the fact that the most priceless thing we have in being able to discharge the obligations incident to our responsibility is the public confidence of the people of this Nation. I hope that by no word I utter I may shake your confidence, but may I rather arouse your determination to a rededication to that way of life we know as the American way of life, and the mile posts and the markers which have brought us thus far. We have reached a point where our common God has seen fit to place upon our shoulders the responsibilities of this hour.

Off the record here, please.

Since the days of our national nativity as the land of the free and the home of the brave, we Americans have functioned in this country with freedom of opportunity and the responsibility of the individual citizen for his own use of that opportunity without direction from cubby holes and great governmental centers. We assumed the responsibility at the time of the creation of the Government of the United States to support it. Never, in our glorious past, have we ever agreed that it was incumbent upon the Government of the United States to support us, or that we should be it wards, or the wards of any other group of men or any other man.

On last November 2d from the floor of the House of Representatives I called the attention of the Congress and the Nation to a certain book. This book was written by a man high up in the policy-making branch of our Government. He and certain other Harvard and Tufts professors collaborated in this work. The name of this book was, An Economic Program for American Democracy. Woven throughout the pages of this opus was a theme to the effect that American business is incompetent to chart its own future, that American business and the American people here depend upon the Federal Government for their salvation.

The author of this book was Dr. Richard V. Gilbert, at present Chief Economist of the Office of Price Administration in Washington. I disagree with the theory and theme of this book in toto. The American economic system which has brought us thus far is based on an entirely different set of principles. These principles were born of man's reason and the acceptance of certain great and inalienable truths upon which American rights are founded. The primary objective of our system of government was liberty under God and law as counter-distinguished to servitude under man and men. The economic principles generally speaking are expressed in freedom of enterprise and individual initiative. Our function under these develop creative and inventive genius and virile confidence in ourselves and our fellows and, may I add, our Government. It is, indeed, a far cry from this set of ideals once accomplished and in working order to the ideals proposed by the work I just referred to. Tragically, to a large measure, these latter have supplanted the former within our glorious system.

In passing, at this juncture, so we won't get too serious, I am going to plagiarize on an unknown author. I am going to read you a little thing here that I think will probably strike a happy chord. The title of this is "The Head of Division of Revision":

"As head of the Division of Provision for Revision,
Was a man of prompt decision—Morton Quirk.
Ph. D. in Calisthentics, P. D. Q. on Pathogenics,
He had just the proper background for the work.

From the pastoral aroma of Aloma, Oklahoma,
With a pittance of a salary in hand,
His acceptance had been whetted, even aided and abetted,
By emolument that netted some five grand;

So, with energy extatic, this fanatic left his attic,
And arrived in Washington, D. C.,
Where with verve and vim and vigor, he went hunting
For the nigger
In the woodpile of the W. P. B.

After months of patient process, Morton's spicular proboscis
Had unearthed a reprehensible hiatus,
In reply by Blair and Blair to his thirteenth questionnaire,
In connection with their inventory status.

They had written—'Your directive when effective was defective
In its ultimate objective—and what's more,
Neolithic hieroglyphic is, to us, much more specific
Than the drivel you keep on dumping at our door.'

This sacrilege discovered, Morton fainted—but recovered
Sufficiently to write, 'We are convinced
That sabotage is camouflage behind perverted persiflage—
Expect me on the twenty-second inst.'

But first he sent a checker, then he sent a checker's checker—
Still nothing was disclosed as being wrong,
So a checker's checker came to check the checker's checker,
And the process was laborious and long.

Then followed a procession of the follow-up profession
Through the records of the firm of Blair and Blair.
From breakfast until supper some new super follow-upper Tore his hair because of Morton's questionnaire.

* * * * *

The file is closed, completed, and our hero, undefeated,
Carries on in some department as before;
And victory is in sight of—not because of, but in spite of—Doctor Morton's mighty efforts in the war."

Now, as a matter of fact, when you get right down to the brass tacks of the situation that confronts us in this country, it is a pretty good idea to look back just briefly, because by looking back briefly we can see forward at least more clearly than we can if we follow the quick energetic process followed by Morton Quirk.

It is an interesting thing to note that the thing that we call democracy is a thing most peculiar in its entirety. I repeat that the thing we call democracy is peculiar to this soil and to this land. It came from the soil; it is agrarian in origin, and not urban. Looking back a little all you have to do is to remember that it was from a little band of men from the soil, all but two of them men of the soil, that assembled in grim determination, and it was from this little band that the shot which was heard around the world was fired. Don't forget that. The doctrine of the divinity of kings, and the doctrines which sprung from the facile and distorted principles of theorists like Marx, and which bring along their present-day by-products, nazi-ism and fascism, are urban in origin. They sprang from great centers of population, and not from the soil. Here almost within sound of my voice, on the fields at San Jacinto, Texas was born. In this room are men within the sound of my voice whose kinsmen, whose grandfathers, as did mine, served with Sam Houston when Texas was born at San Jacinto. Let us not forget. Particularly let us not forget to remember that the agreed-upon basis of our rules of the game, the Texas rules of the game, under the Republic of Texas, were more than document to us, and we should never forget it. By forgetting we slip into the lethargic acceptance which transfers our Government, which came out of the people, into a government which is over the people. A government which renders us other than supporters of the Government, and converts us into serfs and wards of the Government That is simple, and let us not forget. [Applause.]

And when you go into the amazing declarations, true in fact, that were made on this floor yesterday, from this rostrum, by my two loved friends, your Presidents, Claude McCan, and Joe Montague, it is astounding, and may I for a moment—and you remember those remarks—attempt to boil the thing down in the forum of American reason, let us say at a temperature of 325 degrees, so it won't be half baked [laughter], and face the facts gathered all of the way through.

Let us look at the subsidy program that is in effect today, and cook it for just a minute in our minds. What these men didn't tell you yesterday was the final proof of the pudding. They gave you the components of it. They commented on the fact that there was a great shortage of beef in sight. They gave you the picture that went to make up that shortage. I know it, and you know it, so I won't repeat it, but these are two things they didn't tell you.

They didn' tell you that this subsidy program was argued for and put into effect as a weapon to be used against inflation. The reason given for their fear, and when I say "their", I refer to those who insist upon the subsidy program, was that we had too big a pile of money to spend on too short a pile of consumer goods, of which meat is a part.

If we cut what we are cooking in our minds open, we can find out whether it is done or not. The facts are that the product is raw. This roll-back in the subsidy program, put into effect by directive not law, and administered by regulations with the force and effect of law not passed by your Representatives in the Congress is candidly to my way of thinking an unsavory dish. It is neither food nor fiber. It was forced upon us as a panacea to prevent inflation and this is what it does. By its own test, it has shortened the supply of meat which is a part of the pile of consumer goods and by paying part of the consumer's bill, it leaves the consumer a greater pile of money to spend. Does that make sense? Mr. Pollock just told us that one of the best ways to conserve beef was to cook it over a not too hot fire. He told us that a roast cooked at 500 degrees lost about twice as much in weight and more in volume and quality than if cooked at 325 degrees. Even if we can't furnish chuck-wagon cooks with thermometers, God has taught cowboys this truth.

As an American, when you add up the effects of this subsidy program and the way it was born and must be administered, you can see its fallacy and its insincerity together with the patent untruth as to its stated objectives. Our birthright under a Government which rises out of the people is worth more than the $6.32 per head that we are offered by a proposal which converts our Government into one over the people. I say the price is too damned cheap.

Now, I have been one of you fellows for a long time. I was born that way. I was subjected to the influence and infection of what might be termed higher education quite a while ago, in a great institution which was mentioned today, the University of Texas, and at another institution which I claim just as much as my alma mater, even though I did not attend it, but because I have talked to the learned men there so much, and have visited there so much, and I read the reports and all of the little bulletins which have come out from the A. & M. College, I feel like I belong to that great institution too. At the University of Texas, where I went to school for 5 years, I studied law. Then I went back for another year and majored in constitutional law. One who majors in constitutional law is charged, at least, with a knowledge of the origin of the Constitution, the reasons for it, and the inimitable benefits which we, as Americans, know we have under it. To see that document ignored right at its outset is not in accord with my way of thinking. Article 1 says, and I quote: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

What does that word "all" mean? Does it leave anything out? And when you consider that this subsidy program is going to mean that it can, and will, and only can and will, be administered by and under directives and regulations with the force and effect of law, which are not written by your Representatives in the Congress, but are written by a bunch of Morton Quirks, that you don't know, and don't give a damn to know, what would you, as a Member of Congress, under oath to uphold and defend the Constitution, do if you had the respect for it and loved your country, and your land, but, oppose a proposal of that sort?

And then let's go further, where men who are found in violation—American citizens—of these regulations and directives, find themselves confronted with trial before a court not created according to constitutional means, a court not created according to law which the Congress passed creating the O. P. A., and a court which is dominated by the O. P. A.; where you have judge, jury, and all in one outfit, ignoring your right to a trial by jury, and all of the other constitutional rights under which we grew to the point where we can still at least be proud when they ask us where we are from and we can say we are Americans. That ought to mean something. But we won't be Americans in the sense that makes us proud unless we stop this foolishness; unless we get back to where we know how to walk along the tried and beaten paths which have brought us to the point where Almighty God Himself would select us as the bearers of world responsibility in this never before equalled war. [Applause.]

One of the greatest students of psychology as it effects men and peoples, one who probably devoted himself with a truer adherence to the rules of science than anyone in this field of research, wrote following his review and study of the British people, as follows: "The English have acquired in a high degree the three fundamental bases of the soul of a people; common sentiments, common interests, and common beliefs." He then went on to say that this safeguards a nation. Once its members find an instinctive agreement on all great questions, it is guarded against becoming prey to serious and destructive dissension.

Had we not become careless, had we not forgotten to remember briefly the postulates upon which our Government and system are based, there would be neither point or danger in the American people becoming involved in dissensions on issues of this sort. Certainly we would have long ago junked the Constitution, we would have long ago amended it into a shape and fashion completely foreign to that which it has today. Within that instrument itself it provides for ways and means for its amendment, but there can be no dissension between Americans on the point that certainly an elected representative of the people is charged at least with the responsibility of forever standing on guard against the destruction of the rights of those whom he represents by the violation and destruction of the Constitution by means other than those provided for its change or amendment.

What I rebelled against, and what I believe every American in accord with what the flag stands for rebels against, is the constant effort to pervert our Government by subterfuge, and by all kinds of misstatements and false promises. I am convinced that I am right in that. Whenever we reach a point in this land where there is only one man—and I am going to speak plain now—who can save us, or steer this great ship of state at any one given period, we have indeed exposed a great Achilles heel, which should be guarded, to say the least, as the greatest of military secrets in this hour of peril. [Applause.]

Speaking on this issue for the first time in public, I am going to mention a man's name. You will never find it in a past utterance of mine—I always referred to him as the President of the United States. Knowing that this association is nonpolitical, I am using this statement only as a means of emphasizing a point I desire to make before you today. Speaking of Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt not as President, but as a potential candidate for reelection, may I pray that his wisdom and his patriotism will prevent him from taking such a step.

May I say to you in all frankness that I can't help but feel alarmed by some of the statements of both of the head men in the executive branch of our Government in this good year 1944. I refer to their definite expressions of dissatisfaction with our American system of government. I cannot conceive how any man sworn to uphold it and defend it against all enemies, foreign and domestic, could consistently and in honor have made such statements.

Not so long ago, Mr. HENRY WALLACE made a speech on the west coast. I copied a few quotations from it, and I am going to read them to you:

"Those of us," said WALLACE, "who realize the inevitability of revolution are anxious that it be bloodless and gradual, instead of bloody and sudden."

Think those words over carefully: "Those of us who realize," mind you, and I don't know who the us are, "the inevitability of revolution are anxious that it be bloodless and gradual, instead of bloody and sudden," but he doesn't say that he is opposed to its being bloody and sudden even.

He says, "We believe it can be bloodless and gradual if the makers of public opinion, if the politicians, if the pressure groups, will only influence their millions of followers on behalf of the public good instead of regional and class prejudice. We are not going to use the whole"—and thank God he said this—"We are not going to use the whole Russian political and economic system here in the United States"—I am glad we are not going to use the whole of it, you understand. "It was made for Russia and not for us, but Russia is doing every day what we in the United States have only preached on Sunday."

Who in the hell is the "we" he is talking about? There are none of those "we's" in this room, I know. [Much applause.]

Now, let's see where this philosophy comes from. I am going to give you some quotations from a book called Where Do We Go From Here? The author of that book is well known to the author of the book which I just referred to you. He is one not of our inner circle, as such, at the present time, although he studied here, and although he dwelt here, but his name is Harold J. Laski, in charge of the policy making of the present rationing and O. P. A., and so-called anti-inflation movement in Britain. He wrote this book while serving our great mother country, and he says this:

He says that we must submit to a revolution, either as he, Dr. Laski, proposes it, or by violence. What did HENRY WALLACE say right at the beginning? He goes on, and I quote: "It poses precisely the same problems for us as it has posed for our enemies. We can meet them if we will by consent, or we can meet them as in Italy and Germany, in terms of bloody and violent conflict, but we still have to meet them."

He wrote on and said, and now listen to this—listen to this and mark it well:

"But I have argued"—from the same book—"that war is a condition technically adapted by its nature to enable the process of adaptation by consent to begin."

Is that a suggestion that during a great war, the adaptation of a great people to revolutionary processes is conceived to be a propitious moment? Let's see.

"For if victory comes more shortly than we expect, the problems of adaptation will remain, and on all of the evidence we shall shrink back into our wanted habits without the chance that the psychological convulsions of war impose to make the effort toward consent, when relatively it can be met at ease."

What do you think of that proposition?

We recently had a message to Congress, just antedating the veto message on the tax bill, wherein the conclusions of our Chief Executive are given, after stating that we have grown to our present size and strength under certain political rights—and he used the word "political"—"among these the right to free speech, freedom of worship, free press, freedom of assemblage and freedom from unwarranted searches and seizures, but as our economy has expanded we find these political rights inadequate (what does the word 'inadequate' mean?) to guarantee us success in our pursuit of happiness, so I would recommend a second bill of rights."

Have you read the second bill of rights? It is a reparaphrasing of the doctrine of defeatism, of self-satisfaction, of stagnation. It means frozen prices in its effect, and it means the junking of what that immortal flag stands for.

Now, when the Congress of the United States is confronted with messages from the Chief Executive in terms such as that, what would a dumb Texan like me be called upon to do, but stand by his guns? I am asking you. I don't know any different, and if I go back to the Congress of the United States following this election, where every Member of the House faces his constituency, and a decision is made as to his choice and selection by what we pray will be a free exercise of the right of suffrage, don't expect me to change between now and election. [Applause.] I still believe in what Uncle Sam with the gray whiskers stands for. I still believe in the immortal traditions, yes, in that communion of sentiment, ideals, and beliefs that Texans believe in. I agree with what they believed in when they shook off the yoke of Santa Anna, and when again they made the greatest contribution to the United States that was ever made by any State in this Union or elsewhere, when Texas joined this Union.

Take the contributions of Texas men in the armed services. Take the traditional history of Texas and the background that stands forever enshrined in the minds of all true Texans, the Alamo, and San Jacinto, where we gained the incentive objectives that permitted us to live the American way of life. Do we find ourselves being thwarted, by a failure of what the Chief Executive pleases to call political rights? These were certain inalienable rights, and there is a difference between the term "political" and the one I just used, "inalienable."

And in passing for further cooking in the forum of American reason, may I make the suggestion that among those so-called political rights he mentioned the right to freedom of worship. It seems to me that neither he nor any other man will gainsay that our common God has had a lot more to do with mankind over a much longer period than has he or any other President of this country, and we fought to attain that right, which is one which came to us because we were men, and desired to worship our God according to the dictates of our own respective consciences, and that was one of the things we fought to gain when the immortal words with which I started my statement at the beginning, by Thomas Paine, at Valley Forge, and by request of Washington was read to that ragged army, "These are the days that try men's souls," were uttered.

The right to freedom of worship, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom from unwarranted search and seizure were rights, gentlemen, that had no politics in them but they had the bullets and the blood of Americans as an impetus to attain them, and if some folks think that there are among us some who won't fight to keep them, they are a damn sight wronger than they are in their philosophies, even in the O. P. A. [Much applause.]

I want to say in conclusion a few things that I think you ought to know. Personally there is no man in or out of the Congress of the United States to whom I yield in my personal desire to be of assistance to the Chief Executive of this Nation as Commander in Chief of our armed forces in this war. I mean it, just as I meant the other things that I have said. Next only to that desire would be my desire that one of these days, and I pray soon, I may be able to agree with him and our Democratic Party on the floor of the House and in the Senate on some vital matters, among which are going to be a decision as to whether or not we are going to keep the present O. P. A., or whether we are going to re-form it under and along American lines. May I say I hope they will agree with me, and give me a chance to go along with them. I would love to do it. [Applause.]

In this great Nation of 135,000,000 Americans are many men competent and able to steer this ship of state. Within the ranks of the Democratic Party, and I mean Democrats of the real kind, are many men who are competent, qualified, and patriotically able to do this job. I don't want to create the impression that I am afraid to name some of them. I will start with the great Democrat from Texas, the Governor of Texas, my friend, Coke Stevenson. Next, and by no means least or last, a true American, a stalwart Democrat, a great student of government, the Honorable HARRY BYRD, Senator from Virginia, and there are many others. If he were not too far along in years and could he even at that get rest enough to calm down, we could do far worse than our dear old friend, "Cotton" ED SMITH, from South Carolina. Even if such men after election could serve for an appreciable part of their time and die in harness, we would still live in America at the time of their death.

Now, on the matter of price control, and the Price Control Act, I didn't quite complete the drafting of the bill, but here is a brief synopsis of some of the major things that the bill contains, and I have written this thing out, so with your permission I will read it:

"The Economy Price Control Act of 1942 automatically expires on June 30 of 1944. As of the time this is written, it seems more than probable that this act will be renewed. If it is renewed, it is of the greatest importance that it be changed to prohibit all perversion of the 1942 act."

I want you to get that. Do you folks realize that since the O. P. A. was set up, that the provisions of the 1942 act have never been adhered to, and all you have to do is to look at the prices fixed affecting cattle, which have never been up to the point where the law said they should be in the 1942 act and since the O. P. A. was set up. Is that square dealing or not? Is that carrying out the intention of Congress, or not? Certainly not.

"When the act was passed in 1942, it was not the intent of Congress that the entire price structure should be frozen." Joe Montague spoke on that yesterday. "That the methods employed involve voluminous regulations, going minutely into detail, or that price control would be used for profit limitation." Get that.

And none of these perversions were necessary, but they have the effect of impairing and reducing production, and reducing the number of producing units, and of impairing and reducing the operations of those units, as well as reducing the number of distributing units.

"The longer such perversions continue, the more rapidly we approach and reach a completely frozen economy. Neither was it contemplated that the price level be rigidly held to the level of September 1942, or any other particular level. As a matter of fact, it is imperative that there be sufficient flexibility so that a vast and complex economy production may be maintained and moderately increased by allowing some fluctuations in price. The main consideration is that these price fluctuations do not have an aggregate effect which will increase the general price level more than, say, 12 percent in any 1 year.

"In drafting a revision of the Price Control Act to become effective July 1, 1944, I therefore propose that the following provisions be incorporated in it:

"First. The general policy should be declared to be that of fostering the production of basic articles. Follow this fostering of the production of basic articles with the fostering of the production of articles necessary for military or civilian use that are in short supply by permitting the necessary price increases in any one fiscal year of not to exceed 12 percent over or under the price for the article in effect on the last day of the preceding fiscal year, or the day nearest that date upon which the price was quoted, paid, or published.

"Two. For the few basic commodities which require more specific attention and regulation"—now follow this—"a Price Control Board of three persons"—that is a control board—"should be created with the necessary powers to consider the facts and set the limits of price rises for the articles enumerated in the act as basic commodities with directions, or, if necessary to maintain the increased production, rises in prices for the articles may be permitted during the fiscal year, but in no case shall the price be increased more than the 12 percent range over the price in effect at the end of the preceding fiscal year.

"Three. The Price Control Board should be authorized to name a committee of three from each of the industries producing the articles designated to be basic commodities within the meaning of this act, and delegate the power to these committees to follow production, present the facts to the Board, and propose changes in price when deemed necessary."

Now, I won't go on and call your attention to more than this, except simply to tell you this: That under a Price Control Act set up to operate the American way, that would be intelligible to the American people—and this may hurt my bill—the job can be done by one-fourth of the present employees operating under the Price Control Administration. It can be done because of a certain confidence which can be justifiably reposed in the American people, that they will do most of the work in these critical war periods.

Second, there will be no need for food subsidies, if the American people are given an opportunity, while they have plenty of money, to pay their own grocery bills, and it will not be necessary for them to stultify themselves by charging those grocery bills to future generations and to the boys over there when they come home. [Applause.]

This proposition will bring to an end any continuation of a battle for subsidies, unless the proposal to spend subsidies is supported by the only reason which it had at its incept, which was to bring the American people into hand and made them dependent upon the Federal Government for their salvation. I am opposed to that. [Applause.] I am going to stay opposed to it, too.

In short, this bill merely provides for the producers of other commodities in short supply, which shall be named as basic commodities, the fundamental principles, the basic principles, now contained in the meat management plan, which was so ably explained to you by your fine counsel and my beloved friend, Joe Montague, on yesterday.

I am not going to take more of your time, but I did feel that you had the right to know just what the one long time member of this association who happens to represent a great District in the State of Texas in the Congress of the United States thinks about the way we are going, and I have done my best to give you how and what I think, and why I think it.

I thank you.

Rehabilitation of Disabled Veterans

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation is to take up immediately the so-called American Legion bill of rights bill which passed the Senate Friday, and that hearings will be held starting this afternoon.

Of course, I am in favor of the passage of the legislation without delay, but to my mind it does not go far enough. It seems to me we can avoid a great deal of criticism that has been directed at Government agencies because of the delay in handling claims as well as the rehabilitation of the disabled. With that thought in mind, I introduced two bills, H. R. 4191 and H. R. 4227.

House bill 4227 is to take care of the disabled and to see that there is not a day that they are not actually receiving some financial assistance from the Government. It also provides for their rehabilitation. True, the American Legion bill provides for education, but first I am sure even those who will benefit by the American Legion bill would want us at the outset to care for those who have been returned disabled as a result of their service.

House bill 4191 is to likewise provide that there is no period when the dependents of those who have made the supreme sacrifice are not receiving financial assistance from the Government. For instance, there is no reason why the Veterans' Administration can not immediately pay death compensation when they receive word from the Department that a veteran has died as a result of his or her service provided the veteran was contributing toward an allotment for dependents. That should be accepted as evidence that they are legally entitled to recognition, under existing law.

There is a protecting clause in both bills both for the claimant as well as for the Government, where the papers can be reviewed at a later date if either is not satisfied with the award.

I have appealed to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation to add a new title to the American Legion bill and include the language in H. R. 4191 and H. R. 4227.

Rehabilitation of our returning disabled soldiers is a sacred obligation of our Nation. With the numbers of injured rising as we continue with plans for the invasion of the continent of Europe, and as we increase our offensive against the Japanese, we must plan now in order that our fighting men on their return will not be forgotten and be required to live out hopeless lives on Government pensions, but rather that they can be restored to useful and contented existence. Those who have paid with limbs, with arms, with eyesight, and some with broken nerves and minds, for the democracy which we enjoy and the victory we must win deserve the best of medical treatment that science and man have been able to devise, but this is not all. They deserve another chance—rehabilitation—an opportunity for happiness and a decent livelihood.

How many thousands and hundreds of thousands will follow them while the war rages and after the peace is signed, we can only guess. The latest official reports place American combat wounded at 64,098 through March 15, 1944, and this does not include all of those who have been discharged from the armed forces because of physical disabilities. Many others who were discharged were not battle casualties, but were incapacitated for military duty in other ways.

We can only arrive at an approximation of the final casualties that this war will produce. The United States Army alone suffered over 200,000 wounded in the First World War. The Nation then had an Army totaling about 4,500,000. This time the country is figuring on a military strength two and one-half times greater than in the last war. Therefore, the casualties may easily total one-half million. And when it is recognized that this war is more terrible than the last one, it should be taken for granted that the casualties will be still higher. While it is true statistics are a matter of conjecture we must often resort to them in order to form a conclusion.

During the First World War 15 to 18 out of every hundred wounded succumbed to their wounds. Today statistics show that out of each hundred wounded by shot or shell, burned or crushed, approximately 3 die. Modern medical science is accomplishing today on the battlefields and in the military hospitals things which would have been regarded as miracles in 1917 and 1918.

From these statistics an idea of the magnitude of the problem of rehabilitation can be gained. When these thousands of disabled and mutilated veterans return we must do more than "be good to them" or give them menial jobs as a symbol of our gratitude. The great majority of these mangled veterans will still have a lot of ability and they should be rehabilitated and helped in being placed where their remaining skill may be utilized to its best advantage. In most cases by proper rehabilitation they will be able to take their places alongside able-bodied citizens in industry and the commercial world.

It is true to have a successful rehabilitation program employers too must be given a new conception of disabled workers. In the past employers have been reluctant to hire persons with disabilities because it was felt they could not compete with other workers. The war demands for workers have gone a long way in educating employers that men and women with disabilities are just as efficient as those who are able-bodied. This has been a wholesome experience for industry and a definite program of education should be advanced.

To the disabled service man and woman, rehabilitation begins where the work of medicine and science ends. Our present conception of rehabilitation is a very broad one. It is not just helping an individual to master some artificial device which has been substituted for a member of his body, but rather in its broad sense it is a system of treatment and care which will restore an individual to the greatest functional efficiency.

It is not enough to simply furnish the means of rehabilitation. Each disabled individual is a separate and distinct problem. There are no assembly lines in this work. The problem of rehabilitating one who has lost a limb is entirely different from that of rehabilitating one who has lost an arm. Methods of training and technique vary with almost every individual because no two temperaments are alike. Proper rehabilitation training can be furnished only by individuals especially skilled and trained in this work.

There are a few private institutions in the United States devoted to this highly specialized work. One of the most outstanding such agencies is the Institute for the Crippled and Disabled, in New York City, which is often referred to as the school of another chance. I had an opportunity to visit this institution during Christmas week. Formerly they devoted their efforts exclusively to the rehabilitation of civilians, but they are now operating on a wartime basis. They have had over a quarter-century experience in the rehabilitation of the disabled which began with actual service to the disabled veterans of World War No. 1. This experience should be helpful to the Government in all phases of its rehabilitation effort.

As my colleagues and friends are aware, I have suffered the loss of both limbs above the knee, one amputated in January 1943 and the other June 15, 1943.

As a result of my contact with this institute I feel I can qualify as a competent witness on rehabilitation. At the outset of my visit to this institute I received appliances but what I really needed then and did get was proper instructions in their use. For 5 days, 5 hours a day, I was in school, so to speak. For 4 months prior therto I tried to learn the knack of walking with artificial limbs, making practically no headway. In those 5 days due to the instructions given me I learned more and progressed more than in the previous 4 months. I admit the progress is slow, but it is apparent and I honestly feel I am approaching the goal. When I do, I will owe it to the instructions and appliances I have received from this institute.

In view of my personal experience, I insist our maimed ex-service men and women will get nowhere unless the Government has competent instructors.

Naturally I am greatly interested in rehabilitation. I have been in contact with the Surgeon General of the Army, the Navy, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, the head of the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Security Agency, and the Maritime Commission.

My investigations disclose the Air Forces of the Army has a real rehabilitation program. Without casting any reflections, I am convinced it would be wise for every other agency of the Government charged with rehabilitation of the disabled to investigate the progress made by the Air Forces as well as their methods.

The Air Surgeon and his assistants made arrangements with this New York institute to train some of the medical personnel and likewise noncommissioned officers were schooled there in every phase of rehabilitation. Not one, but a number of groups of both types were educated in the methods which have proved to be so beneficial to thousands.

Too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Jeremiah Milbank, the founder, and his board of trustees for placing at the disposal of the Government this wonderful private institution. Always in the red, the deficit is made up by the founder, the trustees, and other public-spirited citizens.

In view of their past experience in rehabilitation the founder and his associates knew outside assistance would be necessary especially from the standpoint of training instructors if the disabled men and women of this war were to receive proper attention, so a War Emergency Committee which is composed of Richard C. Hunt, as chairman; George G. Deaver, M. D., Archibald A. Gulick, Sidney A. Mitchell, Charles Pratt, Col. John N. Smith, Jr., Roland H. Spaulding, Ph. D., and Walter E. Hope, ex officio, was set up. The officers of the board of trustees are: Walter Ewing Hope, president; George A. Sloan, vice president; Oliver B. Jennings, secretary, and Jeremiah Milbank, treasurer; Bruce Barton, Mrs. H. Lawrence Bogert, Jr., Mrs. Guy Fairfax Cary, Duncan S. Ellsworth, Mrs. J. Magee Ellsworth, Desmond FitzGerald, Mrs. Artemus L. Gates, Lewis Gawtry, Samuel M. Greer, Archibald A. Gulick, Will H. Hays, Richard C. Hunt, Sidney A. Mitchell, George M. Moffett, Charles Pratt, Mrs. Thomas J. Preston, Jr., Mrs. Frank Russell, Frank P. Shepard, Lewis L. Strauss, and Miss Florence S. Sullivan.

The director of the institute is Col. John N. Smith, Jr., a former Army officer, a graduate of West Point, who is a member of the advisory committee on rehabilitation appointed by Gov. Paul McNutt, Federal Security Agency.

I cannot conceive of any words that can be expressed to bring to the attention of Government officials the tremendous responsibility that rests upon their shoulders, especially those charged with rehabilitating the disabled, than the annual report of the director to the board of trustees. Therefore, I include it as part of my remarks. This report starts with a foreword entitled "We Must Not Fail Them." It follows:

While we serve only those who have reached 16 years of age or over, never let us forget the brave procession of disabled children marching hopefully to manhood and womanhood. They, more than the fortunate able-bodied, as they graduate from childhood to the age when they must think of their places in the world, will need a helping hand. There will be advances in medical science to stem the tide of the crippling diseases, and the many great agencies devoted to helping crippled children will year by year learn to do more for them. But still it follows, as surely as day follows night, that in this year 1943 there are some 12-year-old boys and girls who will need our services in 1948. The institute will always be needed, and we go forward ever remembering there are children of today who will be coming to us tomorrow.

When they come, we must not fail them.

The report which gives a clear picture of the activities of the institute follows:

THE INSTITUTE ON A WARTIME BASIS

Last year's report told of the gift in December 1941 by Jeremiah Milbank, our founder and trustee, to enable us to engage to the fullest extent in wartime activities, and of the appointment of the War Emergency Committee, headed by Richard C. Hunt, to be in charge of these matters.

Our wartime objectives are based on this simple premise. We have had 25 years' experience in the rehabilitation of the disabled, which began with our actual service to the disabled veterans of World War No. 1. We believe that this experience should be helpful to the Government in all phases of its rehabilitation effort on behalf of both the civilian and the war disabled. This has been urged upon all Government departments in any way concerned, and it is believed that all of them now generally recognize that we have the knowledge and experience we claim; that our methods are worthy of serious study; and that we have a staff of experts who could be helpful in the instruction and guidance of the rapidly expanding force of men and women who will be engaged in the great work of fitting disabled servicemen to take their rightful place in the peacetime world. Many officials have visited the institute, conferred with our staff, and studied our methods. Thus the basis has been established for our active cooperation in various phases of the problem.

The first of these cooperative efforts already launched is with the office of the air surgeon of the Army Air Forces, in connection with its convalescent and rehabilitation program. The institute's part is that of training the medical and other professional and technical personnel involved, through a series of courses now being conducted at the institute building, utilizing the services of our staff and our equipment.

The air surgeon of the Army Air Forces has established eight convalescent and training centers throughout the United States, strategically located. War casualties returning from the front are first sent to Army general hospitals for definitive treatment. When this has been accomplished, the men are transferred to these centers for convalescence and retraining. The aim, while the war is still in progress, is to retrain the men where possible for other Army Air Forces assignments, particularly the Air Service Command. There are many types of military jobs in the Air Forces which are identical with those found in peacetime civilian economy. Thus, while undertaking such retraining, the men will also be fitting themselves for regular civilian employment after the war is over and they are finally discharged from the service. Some of these war casualties will be found not capable, physically, of any further assignment and service in the Air Forces. They will be discharged for disability. For them, the period under treatment in these convalescent centers will go a long way toward preparing them for the vocational rehabilitation program provided by the Veterans' Administration, or for entrance directly into civil pursuits. As a way of assuring the success of this plan, the Air Forces decided that all those to be charged with this responsibility should undertake special training and that the institute would be the best place to conduct it. The training program began on November 15, 1943, from which time until November 27 there was a seminar for a group of 20 medical officers chosen to head this new work in each of the 8 centers. Dr. George G. Deaver, our medical director, led in the conduct of the seminar under a curriculum submitted to and approved by the Air Forces. All the senior members of our staff participated in the program.

The week after this seminar was concluded, a course of training began for a group of 40 of the Air Forces personnel composed of psychologists, social workers, educators, and vocational counselors. The curriculum for the course was somewhat similar to that for the medical officers, but greater emphasis was given educational, psychological, social work, and guidance subjects. When this course was completed, it was given to another group of similar size and composition. Many of the men in both groups had had extended prewar experience in these various professional fields. Under present plans, this training program will extend for a considerable period and will include others in the categories of those already trained as well as nurses, physical therapists, physical educators, and other personnel.

There is a possibility, as time goes on, that the facilities of the institute may be utilized still further in other ways through the joint cooperation of the Air Forces and our instructional staff. We have also been asked to cooperate with other military and civilian governmental agencies in their rehabilitation programs. Just recently we had an inquiry from the Surgeon General of the Army, asking whether we would be prepared to undertake the training of artificial limb makers.

We believe this actual demonstration with the Air Forces of how we can help will lead to further opportunities of this nature with the same or other branches of the armed services.

Rehabilitation must not be thought of solely as a post-war problem. Men are coming back to the hospitals now and large numbers of the disabled are being returned to less active military service or discharged and returned to private life. The urgency of the whole problem seems only now to be fully appreciated in all responsible quarters. Hence the governmental programs are being rapidly completed, and shortcomings in legislative provisions are being remedied. While it is difficult even for the skilled observer of national happenings to see all that is going on, it is our belief that from now on there will be a strenuous and more definite effort to see that there are effective measures to deal with every disabled man in the humane and sensible way the country expects.

What we have been privileged to undertake in behalf of the Air Forces represents what we believe is but the beginning of useful wartime service. We are failing in no opportunity to urge that we be given other similar opportunities for service. We hope that before another year is ended we shall have gone further in the field of wartime service envisioned by our founder long before Pearl Harbor.

REGULAR ACTIVITIES

Last year's report told how employers were looking to the disabled as a possible source from which to meet the labor shortage. Thousands have been employed who in normal times would have found it difficult to obtain jobs and usually only after training and special guidance and placement assistance. Many who in normal times had to come to us for training have found jobs and had their training on the job. Most of those now coming to us have physical difficulties of unusual severity, in many cases complicated by psychological and social work factors. Men and women like this have heard on every hand that the disabled are being employed. Thus, there come to us or are brought to us, many grievously afflicted people who until this time were so disheartened and so conscious of their unfitness that they would not even think of asking an organization like ours to see what could be done. Case after pitiful case has been accepted despite an experience which tells us how very little can be done for some of them. About a third of those we serve today suffer from some form of cerebral palsy, one of the most distressing of man's afflictions.

These cases and many others call for special medical, educational, psychological, and social-work study and supervision, and patient trials in guidance in the hope of finding a kind of work leading to employment that they can learn. Results, small in themselves, are major achievements for people so badly disabled. We have had to learn new methods, and our service involves us in new fields of research. Hence, we have fewer than in past years who are fitted to enter our training schools and sheltered workshop directly. With the majority of those coming to us today, it is necessary that we keep them longer than the usual evaluation period of 17 days in the guidance-test class. Even with this longer period, we find that additional therapeutic treatment is necessary in many cases before they can enter our schools and sheltered workshop. With this situation confronting us, we established an occupational-therapy program in January 1943, under a registered occupational therapist and it has proved very successful in its efforts. Our physical reeducation program was also enlarged and intensified. The gains, beyond what we can do for these poor people, are to be measured in terms of the new knowledge we are acquiring which we hope will be of help to the similarly afflicted in other parts of the country and other parts of the world.

THE OUTLOOK

We must build not only for today but for tomorrow. There are three great opportunities for institute service in the years immediately ahead:

1. Our wartime service.
2. New ways of helping the very seriously disabled.
3. Intensification of research and public education.

Our wartime activities will in all likelihood continue for several years after the war ends and will continue to take an important place so long as it is given us to serve in this field.

We believe that the physically disabled will have given so good an account of themselves in the war industries that it will never again be so hard for those with moderate disabilities to find jobs. But when the war industries are liquidated and there are the expected shifts of the industrial population, large numbers of the disabled will be released and will have to find new jobs at the very time when the Army and Navy are returning millions of men to private life. Some will have to make a new start and will come to public or private agencies like our own for rehabilitation service to acquire a thorough training in some new trade or vocation, and to find help and guidance in securing employment. We speak in our foreword of the disabled children who need help when they reach adolescent age, and year by year they are coming to us. Generally, however, we believe a larger proportion of those we shall be serving will be very seriously disabled men and women, and hence the development of our service to cope with cases of this sort is a major objective.

We are convinced that a great opportunity for service presents itself in broadening our research work and our public educational effort. There are signs of a greatly awakened national interest in the problem of the physically disabled, both veterans and civilians. We have an increasing number of visitors to the institute, our correspondence with interested groups in other parts of the country is growing, and we feel that we are among the private institutions in this field who are counted on to contribute to the advancement of the cause we serve. Hence we have already reorganized the institute with a view to strengthening our research work, steps are being taken to organize the knowledge we have gained so that we may be more useful to others, our library is being expanded and rearranged, we are steadily building up our file of motion pictures of interesting cases and their development, and the production of a scientific film with descriptive comment is being planned. There will be a series of publications based on our experience and research which should be of great value to others who are confronted with problems similar to ours. We are expanding the work we have been doing in the training of rehabilitation workers, in which field our staff has already been so successful. In these and other ways we shall be serving the disabled everywhere—an object that has been before us for many years.

ORGANIZATION

Reference has been made to a reorganization of our work. The chart of the new organization which was presented and discussed at a meeting of the board of trustees has created considerable interest on the part of officers of other philanthropic organizations to whom it has been shown. All who have seen it feel that it represents a sensible and logical subdivision of responsibilities in an organization of this character. We have a limited number of copies of this chart so as to be able to give it to those who have a serious interest in the organization of philanthropic endeavor.

While it was the purpose of this reorganization to apportion responsibilities in a definite manner, all of the staff understand that the end result is in the establishment of good team play. This after all is not a business organization and there must be flexibility in organization and management if there is to be any success in dealing with the complex human factors of these men and women to whose service the institute is devoted. All our departments contribute to this total effort. Each subdivision of our staff knows its place in the total picture and all at the same time strive for the end result of complete service. To effect the changes in organization there were a considerable number of changes in office and space arrangements which have been helpful. Chief among these was the establishment of the business administration offices on the ground floor and the rearrangement of the public reception space which is now very attractive. The reception and interviewing of applicants is now carried on on the fifth floor where offices are provided for the educational supervisory staff and the public-relations department. Visitors are also much impressed with the recently established arrangements on the third floor for the testing of the disabled to appraise their activities inherent in daily living. Here we find out how fast a disabled man can cross a street, whether he can get on a bus, what weights he can carry, and in many other ways determine exactly what he needs to be taught in order that he may travel to and from work, dress and care for himself, eat in public, and do other simple things that spell the difference between being home-bound and being able to go to work.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Institute exercises were held as usual. There was the outing up the Hudson in August provided as in past years by one of our trustees, and various parties and dances to high light the recreational program. The weekly parties given by the young women's auxiliary under the guidance of Mrs. Bogert, one of our trustees, again brought enjoyment into the lives of many. All these things have their part, no less important than teaching and training and work, in building up self-respect and fitting men and women to gain a livelihood and live better lives.

FINANCIAL

The treasurer has asked that the customary financial summary be appended to this report. For still another year, expenditures largely exceeded income from all sources. This statement deals only with the normal expenditures and income of the institute. The costs incident to our wartime program have been charged to the fund established out of the gift by our trustee in 1941. The donor of certain capital funds intended for endowment is permitting us to draw on the uninvested part of the fund to meet the current deficits, rather than curtail our activities.

Personal income taxes are mounting and there are continuing calls on the generous-minded to support special wartime drives. These and other circumstances have made it difficult to secure new gifts and even to hold all our regular contributors. Even so, we have realized that we have done less than we should to bring our story before a widening circle of friends and hence have taken steps to do more than we have in this direction. Our trustee, Mr. Bruce Barton, has been very helpful in this. His guidance was most helpful in the recent issuance of Thumbs Up in a new and more attractive form and in devising other means to widen our list of friends and supporters. There is a larger object in all this than the raising of money. Ours is a field of social endeavor that needs understanding friends if it is to be supported adequately by both public and private effort.

THE STAFF

I have conducted many distinguished visitors through the institute—many more than usual in recent months. All, as they part with kind words about what we are doing and about our building, our equipment, and our methods, end by praising our staff. Almost always I have found that this is the asset of the institute which most deeply impresses visitors in their brief hour's glimpse of institute life. And so wholeheartedly do I believe that there is truth in this, that as I write my report I feel, as in previous years, that it should be signed by all my associates, for the credit is theirs for the accomplishments we report. This is a businesslike place; yes; but we have a group here who in every action show a genuine devotion to the work, going far beyond the everyday loyalty men and women display to a business enterprise. The atmosphere here is rather that of a place of learning and this is but natural, for all, not only the staff, but the disabled, too, both teach and learn. All of us have a deep pride in our association with this great humane effort.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN N. SMITH, JR.,
Director.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that no Member of this Congress, or in fact, no one who contributes to the upkeep of our Government would want private individuals to carry the financial load in donating the services of a great organization such as this to instruct Government personnel to properly care for the disabled. Ways and means should be provided to care for this expense although these good men and women do not ask it.

As I visited the various departments of the institute and saw how interested the personnel were in unfortunate people I agree wholeheartedly with Colonel Smith that he is surrounded by a group that show genuine devotion to their work. Dr. George G. Deaver is a leader in rehabilitation work, while Mr. Frank Sally, Chief of the Orthopedic Division, is really an encyclopedia on every phase of manufacturing appliances, proper fitting, and instructions in use.

Mr. Speaker, I am very enthusiastic about the activities of this institution, but why should I not be when in the space of a few months it has been so beneficial to me. What they have done for me they have done for others.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that the work of these men and women will be called to the attention of public-spirited citizens throughout the country. What a great contribution those financially able could make if they would provide such an institution in every large city in the country. The Government must and, I am sure, will take care of the disabled who were members of the armed forces. There is still another job, taking care of unfortunate citizens not financially able to take care of themselves. To those who possess wealth, I say, try it. What happiness will come to them in the end. They will not be repaid in money but the knowledge that they have helped others will be their reward and that is far greater than money.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. We are going to make sure that the gentleman from Missouri has a hearing before our committee during these proceedings.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman.

Disposition of Food Surplus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 23, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, the following commentary is on the bill (H. R. 4281) introduced by me to authorize the disposition of excess food stocks:

PREAMBLE

At the termination of World War No. 1, the various Government agencies disposed of food that was declared surplus in any manner they saw fit and with no consideration as to the season of the year and the conditions under which it was being disposed, resulting in the unnecessary breaking of markets and causing many cases of bankruptcy in the industry. The uncertainties of what foods were to be disposed of by the Army and Navy reacted to the disadvantage of the farmer, who hesitated to plant crops for fear of not being able to dispose of them without loss. In many instances, those farmers who did plant large crops suffered financially.

This bill has two chief purposes in view: The first is to provide an orderly means of disposing of excess stocks of foods that may be in the hands of Government agencies when the war ends, or when the narrowing of its scope may cause a marked reduction in the food requirements of these agencies. In view of the increasingly successful prosecution of the war, it is important that we settle promptly upon a program for liquidating such stocks that will avoid the speculative operations and the widespread dislocation of markets that occurred at the close of the last war.

No less important, however, is the immediate effect that the establishment of such a program will have upon current production of foods to meet present war needs. Producers, processors, and distributors of food, while anxious to make their full contribution to the prosecution of the war, nevertheless view with justifiable alarm the prospect that substantial proportions of the heavy production of foods they are called upon to achieve may turn out to be in excess of requirements, and that they may be left to stand heavy financial losses as a result of the disruption of markets through indiscriminate dumping of these excess foods. American farmers and the American food industry are entitled to the assurance that the passage of this bill will provide, and there is no question that enactment of it into legislation now will relieve them of serious worries and give them the needed encouragement in their wholehearted drive for all-out production.

In brief, the bill proposes to center responsibility for the disposition of all excess stocks of foods, regardless of the agencies holding them, in a single official, the War Food Administrator. Subject to consultation and advice from representative advisory committees of producers, processors, and distributors, he would be authorized to transfer excess foods between Government agencies or to establish the prices, terms, and conditions of sale in established commercial channels. Having given the original owner or vendor the first opportunity to buy, he would be required to provide equal opportunity to all established and responsible processors and distributors. To assure efficient and flexible operation of the program the War Food Administrator would be given wide discretionary authority in carrying out the intent of Congress; to assure responsible exercise of this authority and to enable Congress to keep continuous check on the success of operation of the program, he would be required to report to Congress on his operations at least once each calendar quarter.

The bill thus provides for sound and competent administration through centralization of responsibility and the granting of powers of administrative discretion consonant with the types of operations involved, while at the same time specifying clearly the purposes for which Congress grants this authority and providing continuous means for Congress to keep informed regarding the exercise of it.

The comments that follow are directed to the individual sections of the bill and are intended to make clear their separate purposes and their relationship to the measure as a whole.

Section 2 (a): "Food" is defined in this bill to include all those commodities that are now by Executive order made the responsibility of the War Food Administrator in the organization of the Nation's war program. The bill is thus made to cover not only those commodities usually included in the term "food" but also a considerable number of related commodities derived from foodstuffs and other agricultural commodities.

Section 2 (b): "Excess food" is defined to include all food held or contracted for by Government agencies, wherever located, at home or abroad, and which is excess to the needs for which it was acquired; authority to determine what foods are in fact excess to the needs of an agency is appropriately left to the discretion of the head of that agency.

Controls of this nature must be had to prevent the return of this food to the United States after it has been sold abroad.

The second paragraph of this section is intended to cover any merchandise that was packed or set aside at the request of the Government or under regulations ordering a certain percentage of the pack to be held subject to Government orders, and should be considered as a Government obligation.

Section 2 (c): This paragraph is intended to cover all branches of the Government, including the Army, Navy, Lend-Lease, and so forth.

Section 2 (d): The War Food Administration is an agency that has already been set up and is familiar with the details of administering this act, and it was felt that no new agency or commission should be created for this purpose.

Section 3: Centers in the War Food Administrator full authority over the disposition of all foods declared excess by any Government agency, and prohibits any other Government agency from disposing of excess food except by authorization from the Administrator. The centering of responsibility for operations of this kind in the hands of a single responsible official can hardly be questioned if the program is to be so coordinated as to assure proper consideration of alternative uses of the food disposed of and management of the sale of such food as is disposed of through established commercial channels in such a manner as to avoid disorderly and inequitable distribution, and otherwise to carry out the purposes specified in the bill. The delegation of authority and responsibility for this program to a single administrative official rather than to a board or commission is essential in a program of this kind, because day to day decisions must be promptly made and actions quickly adjusted to the changing conditions of the market.

The War Food Administrator is the administrative official in a position to carry out these responsibilities most competently. He has an agency with long experience in operations of this kind, with organization and personnel trained and experienced in them. His agency is currently engaged in the conduct of similar and closely related programs and he is in a position to coordinate the disposal of excess food with all other Government operations in the food field, including the general stabilization of markets and maintenance of prices to producers. Unless the disposition of excess Government food stocks is carried through with such coordination, it is likely not only to be unsuccessful as a separate program but also to endanger the success of other programs of the type mentioned.

Section 4: Food producers, processors, and distributors of food are vitally concerned in this program. They are entitled to and the best interests of Government are served by assuring procedures by which they shall be properly consulted in the conduct of the program, and it shall have the benefit of their knowledge and experience. This section, therefore, provides for the establishment of commodity advisory committees, representative of these groups and following closely the pattern of industry advisory committees currently established by the War Food Administration. This system of industry advisory committees has served with notable success in bringing to the Government food programs the counsel and advice of members of the food industry and facilitating sound industry relationships in the conduct of the war-food program. In addition to the individual commodity advisory committees, the bill provides for a representative coordinating committee, to include also the chairmen of the several advisory committees, as well as interests representing possibly labor and consumer.

The section was designed to permit flexibility in appointing small committees which could study each individual commodity and which would work under the policies laid down by the coordinating committee. However, it was thought advisable not to spell this out into too much detail, as it was felt that if all were tried to be specified some other interests which should be on the committee would be precluded from participation because they were not specified in the bill.

Reference should be made here to sections 7 (a) and (c), which describe further the functions of these committees and their relationship to the Administrator. The coordinating committee is intended to consult with and advise him regarding general rules and regulations in the administration of the program. The individual commodity advisory committees are to consult with and recommend to the Administrator regarding the disposition of particular foods. To assure that any administrator who may be appointed to exercise the authorities granted by this bill will in fact give full and proper consideration to the recommendations of these industry committees, he would be required under section 7 (c) to explain to each committee, in case he does not follow its recommendations, his reasons therefor.

Sound administrative procedure requires clear definition of the status of advisory committees of this type. Either they must be definitely advisory in function, with clear authority to the Administrator to act according to his own best judgment after proper consideration of their advice and recommendations, or else they must be given responsibility coordinate with the authority for determination of action that is delegated to them. In the latter case, their operation would become essentially that of boards or commissions, with the consequent cumbersomeness in action inevitably associated with such a form of organization. This bill seeks to avoid such an unnecessarily ponderous and burdensome form of organization. It is at the same time designed to give assurance to those representatives of food production and distribution that real use will be made of their services and real consideration given to their advice.

Section 5 (a) and (b): It is apparent that to properly administer the authority delegated under this bill, the War Food Administrator and his advisers must be fully informed regarding foods that are in excess and must also have as competent information as possible from all Government agencies holding food stocks regarding probable future excess stocks of food that will need to be disposed of. These sections provide the authorities essential to obtaining such information, subject to the limitation that the security of our armed forces in prosecuting the war must not be interfered with.

It is essential that the Administrator have the proper information as to inventories so that if one agency reported a surplus he could then find out from the other agencies the quantities they had on hand in order to determine if more excess foods of the same type might be coming into the market. Without this information it would be impossible for any advisory committee to recommend the disposal of foods for the best interests of everybody, and with this information on hand, and passed along to the trade, both processors and farmers are in a better position to determine what their next year's pack and crops will be. With this information also, it would be possible, with merchandise that would last 2 or 3 years, to determine a policy of equal distribution over the period of time. With the assurance that there would be but a certain amount released, processors and farmers could then safely make their plans for a period ahead. It is conceivable that if there were a large surplus of canned peas or corn to be disposed of, the farmer would be inclined not to plant any for the ensuing year, but if he knew there would be only a certain amount released, he would then be able to plan his crops so as to conform with the normal requirements of the public, and over a period of 2 or 3 years possibly, absorb the entire surplus without disastrous effect of having the entire quantity released at one time.

Section 5 (c): Two different methods are specified for the War Food Administrator in disposing of excess foods. It is likely that in many cases foods excess to the needs of one Government agency can be used by another in carrying on its activities. It is obviously more efficient in such cases that the food be transferred directly from one agency to the other, rather than have the one agency disposing of food by public sale at the same time that the other agency is procuring similar food by public purchases. It will also prevent, as occurred after the last war, one branch of the Government selling a large quantity of surplus to a buyer, who in turn resold it back to another branch of the Government at a considerable profit.

Two important outlets within the Government for excess foods will undoubtedly be distribution for relief purposes at home and especially in war-torn countries, and distribution through the school-lunch and child-feeding programs that are now being carried on under authorization of Congress. Interagency transfers of food for these purposes are therefore specifically mentioned in the bill, although such transfers are not limited to these purposes.

In the customary procedures for disposition of excess stocks by Government agencies through public sale, receipts are not credited to the agencies in question but are covered into the general funds of the Treasury. The bill therefore provides that interagency transfers of food shall likewise be made without reimbursement. This arrangement will also facilitate utilization of foods within the Government rather than dumping them on commercial markets, since the burden otherwise imposed on appropriations for specific purposes might in many cases prevent desirable utilization of food in this manner. The second method of disposing of excess food is by sale through regular and established commercial channels; the procedures authorized here are further specified in sections 6 through 9.

Section 5 (d): Efficient disposition of excess food requires that the official responsible therefor be authorized to have such food inspected, packaged, processed, reconditioned, stored, transported, or to have other services performed in connection with it that will facilitate the most desirable utilization of it. Such authority, which is conferred by this section, will enable the Administrator both to make best use of the food and to prevent spoilage and deterioration of it and otherwise maximize the return to the Government through its sale or disposition.

This paragraph was deemed advisable also so as to give proper information to the committee and to the trade as to the actual condition of the merchandise when offered and also to permit repacking where advisable, in order to prevent unnecessary loss. For example, this paragraph would permit the Administrator to take some canned peaches, which, because of their age, could not go into consumption quickly, but which could be converted into a jam or some other wholesome product, possibly without any loss in value.

Section 6: This section requires the Administrator, in disposing of food through established channels, to provide proper advertisement and information regarding the food to be disposed of, and to give equal opportunity to all responsible, established processors or distributors who may have an interest in its purchase, subject to the restriction that the original owner or vendor or the owners of a trade-mark or trade-name appearing on the package shall be given a prior opportunity to purchase the food, and thus protect the value of his trade-mark, if he feels it necessary. It also prevents discrimination in price or favoritism shown to one processor as against another.

A special provision avoids unnecessary red tape in the disposition of small lots of food, or lots that must be disposed of promptly to avoid spoiling or deterioration.

Section 7 (a): See comments on section 4.

Section 7 (b): If excess Government stocks are to be disposed of in an orderly fashion, it is important that speculators and fly-by-night operators be prevented from acquiring them and disposing of them in irresponsible fashion. This section therefore provides for the voluntary registration of processors and distributors who may be interested in food stocks to be disposed of by the Government and restriction of such registration to those who are responsible, established firms regularly engaged in the handling of such foods. Discretion is left to the Administrator in such registration to allow for special situations such as the return to business of men from the armed forces who might otherwise be debarred from a favorable opportunity for reestablishing themselves because of their inability to show that they had been continuously engaged in such business while in the service of their country.

Section 7 (c): As noted in the comments in section 4, this paragraph attempts to make the advisory committee an active one and not, as has happened in some agencies, a committee on paper only whose advice is not followed. Frankly, some groups in the food industry would like to have seen this wording strengthened to the effect that the advisory committee could overrule the Administrator, but after due consideration it was agreed that a committee of businessmen had no one to whom it would be responsible, and it was therefore deemed impractical. In addition, it was felt that a Government official would resent being subjected to any such control of this nature by the industry. It was agreed that if the advisory committees were used properly this wording would be acceptable.

Section 8: In normal times the customary method of disposition of excess Government property has, of course, been contract sale to the highest bidder. It is obviously undesirable that excess food stocks in the hands of Government agencies at the close of the war be disposed of by this type of dumping operation. On the contrary, it is most important that suitable restrictions be imposed upon the prices at which excess foods are sold and the conditions of their sale to assure orderly marketing and to prevent disruption of the current orderly distribution of food through established channels.

This section also relieves the Administrator of the provisions of Federal law regulating the normal procedures in disposing of excess Government property, while retaining the requirements that Congress has imposed regarding the maintenance of prices to agricultural producers.

Sections 9 and 10: These sections are self-explanatory.

Section 11: As previously described, the bill imposes upon the Administrator the requirement of reporting to Congress at least quarterly upon his operations in exercising the authorities and carrying out the responsibilities delegated to him. This procedure has been notably useful, for example, in connection with lend-lease operations, in keeping Congress and the public informed regarding the actions of administrative officials to whom important authorities and responsibilities have been entrusted. It places Congress in a position quickly to become aware of and make necessary adjustments in operations that in its judgment fail to properly carry out its intent.

Section 12: This section confers an immunity necessary if the interests of the Government are to be served by making available the full benefits of knowledge and experience of practical businessmen in the operation of the program.

Section 13: The tenure specified in the bill takes into account on the one hand the necessity of promptly assuring producers, processors, and distributors of food a stable and continuing program that they can count upon to protect them from the disastrous consequences of wartime developments over which they have no control and, on the other hand, the desirability of proper review of the program and opportunity for modification and improvement of it after it has been in operation for a reasonable period.

Excerpts From Speeches and Resolutions Introduced Bearing on Polish-Russian Relations and the Rehabilitation of the Overrun Smaller Nations

REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 23, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the Fascists, isolationists, and pacifists who opposed President Roosevelt's defense program are now active in disseminating propaganda to the effect that Russia and England are working for a separate peace, thus seeking to destroy the accord and unity existing between the United Nations. For the past several weeks especially they have been harping upon the Russian policy with respect to the boundaries of Poland.

Believing from the very inception of the war that Russia will eventually drive the Nazis out of their country, free the people of the countries overrun by the Nazi hordes and tremendously aid in the final defeat of the Nazis, I have had every reason to believe the statements made by Marshal Stalin and other official representatives of Russia that none of the smaller countries would be deprived of their rights, lands, freedom, and liberty. Under leave granted me, I am inserting in the RECORD excerpts from my speeches touching on Polish-Russian relations which include the pledge and assurance of Marshal Stalin to Poland and the Polish people I also insert a resolution which I introduced during World War No. 1 to exclude Poles, Bohemians, and other nationals residing in the United States from the classification of alien enemies as subjects of Austria-Hungary, and my reason for inserting this resolution at this time is to direct attention to the fact that today our Government, even though Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and other countries are occupied by the Germans and suffering under the heel of Nazi oppression, does not regard the alien nationals of those countries residing in the United States as alien enemies of this country. The second resolution which I am including in the RECORD is one that I introduced on February 8, 1919, which provided that the United States establish diplomatic relations with Poland and Czechoslovakia. Shortly thereafter the recognition of both Poland and Czechoslovakia became an accomplished fact when Congress passed resolutions which were signed by President Wilson.

Mr. Speaker, it is my fervent hope that not only the United Nations but Russia will aid to rehabilitate Poland and those countries which have been so ruthlessly destroyed and deprived of their freedom and liberty and that Poland, when peace will come, will emerge a still stronger and greater nation to take its place among the nations of the world in maintaining a permanent peace.

Mr. Speaker, I now insert the speeches and resolutions, as follows:

POLISH-RUSSIAN RELATIONS AND THE REHABILITATION OF THE OVERRUN SMALLER NATIONS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 401, to make in order consideration of House Joint Resolution 192, to enable the United States to participate in the work of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation organization and ask for its immediate consideration. The resolution aims to provide for millions of unfortunates—men, women, and children—who have been driven from their homes and deprived of all their possessions and are now roaming the countries of Europe from one end to the other. As I say, the amount provided for is restricted, and is based on this, that each of the 44 nations will contribute 1 percent of its national income. * * *

I feel it is not necessary for me to call attention to the plight of millions of Poles, Yugoslavs, French, Belgians, Greeks, Hollanders, and the peoples of the smaller countries, saying nothing of the outrageous atrocities practiced on them, and especially on the Jewish people, believing that is generally known and recognized by all of us. Never in the history of the world has the need for relief been so great as in this instance. Therefore I feel that we should provide those who have escaped the murderous hands of the Nazi and who are half-starving and suffering tortures beyond description, should have sufficient food, clothing, medical care, and, yes, shelter. Any help that will alleviate their suffering will be repaid tenfold. It will serve to prevent future hardships and will bring about their rehabilitation in all of the overridden countries. * * *

PLEA FOR UNITY AND COLLECTIVE SECURITY AMONG EUROPEAN NATIONS WHO WISH TO DEFEAT HITLERISM

(December 14, 1943)

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, * * * I am immensely pleased that my oft-repeated assurance that Russia will never be inveigled into a separate peace with Germany and will stand honorably and steadfastly with the United Nations, not only to accomplish complete destruction of the Nazi-Jap militarism, but also to bring about a lasting and just peace, and freedom and liberty to the Nazi-overrun nations. And, furthermore, that there will be complete cooperation to reestablish their freedom and liberty and a real democratic form of government.

It should be remembered that since the two most despotic maniacs, Hitler and Mussolini, appeared upon the stage of world prominence, it has been Soviet Russia that has repeatedly and persistently demanded collective security and the formation of a protective alliance of the peoples and governments of European democratic nations to challenge fascism and nazi-ism and to stop the expanding and approaching danger of vicious aggressive conspiracy.

Had the alliance of European nations, as sponsored by the statesmen, been effected in time, and had President Wilson's plea been heeded by our Senate to enter the League of Nations, it would most probably have prevented this terrible global tragedy.

Those of you who have followed my activities in Congress will recall my activities in behalf of the independence of the smaller nations and my continuous and urgent demands for unity and collective security among those European nations who wished to defeat Hitlerism, and I am taking the liberty of repeating my remarks made on the floor of the House of Representatives on March 18, 1938:

"Three years ago (that was in 1935) I voiced the belief that a secret or tacit agreement existed between Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, but my warnings went unheeded.

"* * * There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that Hitler, Mussolini, and the raving-mad Japanese war lords are in conspiracy to divide the entire world among themselves, or at least as much of it as they can manage to grab."

Again I call attention to the fact that I made this statement in 1938.

Their pretended fear of communism served the Nazi propagandists as a camouflage to conceal their dastardy intention to create disruption and disharmony among the nations of the world, to strain friendly relations between the United States, Great Britain, and Soviet Russia. They heralded all over America and in neutral countries the bug-a-bear that on the defeat of Germany the whole of Europe and America would be dominated by the international Communist dictators. This was answered by Stalin's dissolution of the Communist International Comintern. He made this statement:

"The dissolution of the Communist International Comintern facilities the work of patriots in freedom-loving countries in uniting the progressive forces of their respective countries, regardless of party or religious faith, into a single camp for national liberation, for unfolding the struggle against fascism, against the menace of world domination by Hitlerism, thus clearing the way to future organization of companionship of nations based upon their equality. I feel that the disssolution of the Communist International Comintern is perfectly timely because it is exactly now, when the Fascist beast is exerting its last strength that it is necessary to organize the common onslaught of freedom-loving countries to finish off this beast and deliver the people from Fascist oppression."

It is also timely to quote from Stalin's statement made regarding Russia's war aims. They are:

"1. Liberation of occupied European countries, including Poland, France, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Greece.

"2. Liberated countries must be allowed to choose their own form of government.

"3. All war criminals must be punished.

"4. Such order must be created that no future attempt at world domination can be made by Germany.

"5. Establishment of full collaboration among the nations of Europe on the basis of full mutual trust, which will make any future aggression impossible."

For years the Nazi-Fascist propagandists were spreading falsehoods and misrepresentations of facts in an effort to influence our people into believing that the Government of Soviet Russia is not founded upon democratic principles of justice, that freedom is brutally suppressed, and that only a small minority of the Russian people are loyal to the Soviet system of government. The facts are the exact opposite. No government enjoys the whole-hearted support of its people as does the Russian Government. I wish to God we had the unity the Russians enjoy.

There are no Quislings, no traitors, no fifth columnists in Russia. When the German Army treacherously invaded Russia it was met by the Russian people, 170,000,000 of them, united in courage, in spirit, and in determination. They are heroically ridding their beloved country of the barbaric invaders according to plan. Yes, the Russian plan!

Again, I wish to quote Stalin in connection with the pernicious accusations by the Nazis that Russia is secretly trying to communize the world and dominate the European continent and America:

"We haven't, we can't have, such a purpose in this war as the conquest of foreign territories, of foreign peoples in Europe, Asia, including Iraq. We cannot have such a purpose as to impose our will and Slavonic regime on the other enslaved peoples of Europe."

Of course we all know that Russia was compelled to enter into its treaty of nonaggression with Nazi Germany to gain time. She was not prepared for war, and she used the precious intervening time to mobilize her Army, organize her industry, and fortify her frontier. This, however, did not prevent her from giving continuous aid to stricken China.

President Roosevelt in acclaiming the results of the Moscow Conference expressed the belief that Soviet Russia is anxious to cooperate with the United States, Britain, and all United Nations in the war and peace. I am satisfied that the vast majority of our American people fully recognize the great achievements and progress made by the Soviet Government within the short space of 26 years, and that they, too, hail the Moscow conference as a harbinger of a new world cooperation and everlasting peace.

The hour of Russia's triumph over German greed and barbarity is not far distant. I am proud, indeed, to have been privileged to make some little contribution to the better understanding of that great and gallant people. They have earned the right to the fullest measure of lasting peace and prosperity. God grant that what is coming to them—and to the whole world—be not long delayed.

POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

(May 3, 1943)

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker * * * I wish to commend our colleague from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] who, besides his diligent efforts in behalf of his constituency and his work as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, has striven to enlist the help and interest of liberty-loving Americans in the welfare and reestablishment of the Polish Republic. My congratulations are also extended to our colleagues the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI], now presiding over the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORSKI], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SCHUETZ], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MONKIEWICZ], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWAN], all of whom have so inspiringly expressed their views looking to the reestablishment of the Polish Republic in the near future. I am naturally especially interested that Poland should again obtain its freedom and liberty because I know that having felt the harsh hand of oppression it will inspire all other minority countries and they will help to cooperate to bring about the elimination of intolerance toward all.

As a Member of Congress I was proud in actively supporting and voting for a congressional appropriation for the erection of a monument in honor of our great Polish-American revolutionary heroes—Kosciusko and Pulaski—and to be present at the dedication and unveiling ceremonies. As one who aided and cooperated with the great Polish leaders of years gone by, Paderewski, Lechinski, and others in 1918, and as one who had the opportunity and the privilege to witness President Wilson advocating and urging the freedom of Poland and the liberty of all the small nations I was greatly inspired, but recently greatly grieved that finally, through no fault of Poland, the Polish Republic was overrun by the Nazi hordes, not because the people of that Republic were not desircus of defending their independence, but because of the unfortunate conspiracy action on the part of the Nazis, French-Nazi leaders, and British pacifiers who refused Poland the right to rearm and to defend herself as the people were desirous of doing. If they had permitted Poland to rearm in time and had agreed that Russia should be permitted to cross Poland to aid Czechoslovakia it is quite possible that Poland as well as Czechoslovakia and the other small nations would be free today or would not have been so wantonly attacked and their homes and lands so distressingly laid waste. Consequently, there is no one here or anywhere who regrets more than I that Poland and the smaller nations were so ruthlessly despoiled of their liberty.

Mr. Speaker, I hope and pray that in the near future the United States will again as she did under President Wilson, be helpful in bringing about the reestablishment of the great Polish Republic and thereby also aid in bringing about the independence and freedom of all the other peoples, not only in Europe but wherever they are seeking freedom and liberty.

POLISH LEADERS SHOULD NOT FORGET TREATMENT ACCORDED POLES IN PRUSSIA

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, subsequent to the war I was a staunch advocate of the League of Nations, which, I firmly believe, would have prevented international lawlessness or at least minimized all future danger of war.

Hitler, demanding the return of Germany's lost colonies, only cloaked his purpose of European aggression, and it was long ago clear that he would one day climax the years of planned propaganda in Austria by an invasion of that country. His seizure of Austria is but a prelude of more ambitious plans. Peace- and liberty-loving Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the other small independent nations now see his shadow across their lands—Memel, Danzig, and the Polish Corridor, Alsace-Lorraine, and the much-desired Ukraine.

For the time being, engaged in consolidating his gains, he may utter reassuring words to Poland and Yugoslavia. But they have only to recall his utter disregard of treaties, and his oft-repeated statements as to his ultimate aims, to realize how necessary it is that they prepare to resist invasion, for invasion is bound to come.

Great Britain, rather late, is commencing to realize its danger. Does Poland realize her danger?

The leaders in Poland might well hearken back to other days, and consider the former treatment of Poles in Prussia. I remember in 1908 how Prussia prohibited, by edict, the teaching of the Polish language in their own schools, and how they proposed in their Parliament a compulsory dispossession of the homes of Polanders. For 2,000 years the Poles and their fathers before them had occupied this land, but notwithstanding and in contravention of the Congress of Vienna of 1815, and in violation of Prussia's organic laws prohibiting distinctions between citizens of the Kingdom, that Kingdom's Parliament even then showed its prejudice and discrimination against the Polish.

At the time I speak of, Congressman Arthur L. Bates, of Pennsylvania, was impelled to introduce into this House a resolution extending good wishes and sympathy to the Poles in Prussia in their efforts to maintain their property rights.

Recalling this, and viewing the present prejudice which governs in Germany, Poland should properly estimate the future insofar as her relations with that country are concerned.

[65th Cong., 3d sess.; H. J. Res. 408; In the House of Representatives, February 8, 1919; Mr. SABATH introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed]

Joint resolution establishing diplomatic relations with Czechoslovakia and Poland

Whereas Czechoslovakia and Poland have established permanent governments and have been recognized by the Government of the United States as independent states: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That diplomatic relations be established between the Government of the United States and said governments by the appointment by the President of the United States of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to each of the said states.

[65th Cong., 2d sess.; H. J. Res. 181; In the House of Representatives, December 7, 1917; Mr. SABATH introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed]

Joint resolution providing that Poles, Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Rumanians, Ruthenians, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, and Italians be, and are, specifically excluded from the classification of alien enemies as subjects of Austria-Hungary

Whereas this Congress, upon the recommendation of the President of the United States, has declared that a state of war exists between the United States and Austria-Hungary; and

Whereas certain states and provinces within the Empire of Austria-Hungary have been subjugated to its rule without their consent and against the wishes of the inhabitants; and

Whereas the peoples of these states and provinces, to wit, the Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Ruthenians, Poles, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, Italians, and Rumanians, suffering from the persecution and oppressions inflicted upon them by the Empire of Austria-Hungary, have sought and been given the haven of these United States in very large numbers; and

Whereas these people gratefully appreciate the shelter and opportunities given them by the United States and are now eager and anxious to serve this country in its present grave crisis; and

Whereas throughout the breadth and length of this country thousands of men of these races have enlisted in the several branches of the armed forces of this country to sustain and aid it in the holy fight for democracy and the freedom of all nations, large and small; and

Whereas many more thousands of the men of these races have been called to serve and are now serving under and by virtue of the Selective Draft Act; and

Whereas the said Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Ruthenians, Poles, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, Italians, and Rumanians are technically considered subjects of Austria-Hungary, which status is beyond their control and contrary to their wishes; and

Whereas by the declaration by this Congress that a state of war exists between the United States and Austria-Hungary these said Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Poles, Ruthenians, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, Italians, and Rumanians at present serving this country in the several branches of its armed forces who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, or who, having declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, have never become fully naturalized, are immediately considered alien enemies, thereby being restrained in their patriotic desire to serve this country whole-heartedly and devotedly and to give their all to aid the cause of humanity and democracy; and

Whereas they and all other people of these states and provinces who are noncombatants would be barred from entering, working, conducting business, or residing within certain territories prohibited to alien enemies; and

Whereas such condition would cause a grave wrong and irreparable injury to peoples whose loyalty and devotion to this country stands unquestioned and unchallenged, and who unselfishly and unreservedly have upheld the cause of the Allied Powers against the Central Powers: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the said Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Ruthenians, Poles, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, Italians, and Rumanians, be, and they are hereby, specifically excluded from the classification of alien enemies wherever such classification now exists, as to the subjects of Austria-Hungary, by reason of any act of Congress of the United States or regulations established by the President of the United States and under such rules and regulations as the President may from time to time promulgate.

SEC. 2. That the said Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks, Poles, Ruthenians, Serbs, Croatians, Slovenes, Italians, and Rumanians shall not be barred from the armed forces of the United States due to their status as (unwilling) subjects of Austria-Hungary and that they shall be subject to the operation of the Selective Draft Act.

Smear Attacks by Walter Winchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN DIES

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Sunday, March 26, 1944

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me over the Blue Network Sunday, March 26, 1944:

My fellow Americans, I asked for time on this program because of certain false statements made about me and the Committee on Un-American Activities, of which I am chairman. I do not intend to exchange insults with Mr. Winchell. I do not question anyone's right to criticize Congress. While I am interested in replying to the false statements many times repeated on this program, I am more concerned to fix the attention of the American people on one of the most sinister forces this Nation has ever faced—a highly organized and well-financed enterprise to destroy by villification the character of any public man who gets in the way of the objectives of the groups who manage and finance this offensive.

It is difficult in a few minutes to describe the technique of these men. We are at war. Treason and sedition are ugly words. These specialists in villification would not dare charge reputable men with sedition. But they have found a means by which, through innuendo and indirection, they can select a victim and smear him with the odium of treason while skirting the edge of libel laws. Let me illustrate this.

First, they find an offender who is really guilty of sedition. Then, without charging you with that offense, they merely mention your name repeatedly in connection with his. They identify you with his guilt by indirection. Recently the Government indicted 30 people for sedition. Using these persons as a base, Mr. Winchell tells you about them in such a way as to leave with you the impression that I and my committee are protecting them. He infers that the committee had information about them which it deliberately withheld. Another time he says in his column that I am planning to investigate him and will time the investigation to coincide with the date of their trial in order to distract public attention from their guilt and create a reasonable doubt in their favor. Then he tells you our committee has done nothing to expose American Fascist groups.

What he is saying in all this, by innuendo, is that I am shielding Nazis and plotting to divert attention from their trial after deserting my sworn duty to investigate them.

Actually the facts are precisely the reverse. Our committee began its work in August 1938. Since then we have examined 178 witnesses whose testimony dealt wholly with Axis activities. That testimony fills over 4,000 printed pages. We have seized their files. Our records are one of the most extensive in existence on the subject. We have issued seven reports on Nazi, Fascist, and Japanese agents here. We have opened them to the press. Mr. Winchell himself has used them, and when he did I thanked him as I did other reporters and commentators. In the last 3 years 5,597 agents from the F. B. I., Naval and Military Intelligence, and other Government agencies have come to our Washington office for information. Our regional offices in New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles have similarly aided thousands of Federal agents.

Mr. Winchell has talked a lot about the forthcoming trial of the 30 persons indicted for sedition in Washington. He has said this committee did nothing to aid the Government. No man knowing the facts would make such a statement. Prior to the indictment, Mr. O. John Rogge, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, came to our offices with his agents and worked for several weeks, and our committee turned over to them over 900 documents to be used as evidence. These consist chiefly of the files of the indicted persons seized by our committee in 1938, 1939, and 1940. An official of the Department of Justice recently stated that 75 percent of the evidence to be used in these trials was supplied by our committee. Our committee exposed Bund Leaders Kuhn and Kunze and they went to jail. We exposed a flock of German and Italian agencies, whereupon the Government closed their consulates and sent their agents to jail or out of the country. Our committee exposed, long ago, William Dudley Pelley, George E. Deatherage, James True, Parker Sage, William R. Lyman, Garland Alderman, and others now under indictment. Now, in the presence of these facts, why does Mr. Winchell say we are protecting these people?

Well, let me clear this up. These smearers are not interested in exposing Nazi agents here. That job has already been thoroughly done by the F. B. I., the Naval and Military Intelligence units and our committee. They are interested in using the exposure of these Nazi agents to destroy their political opponents by linking through innuendo the names of reputable and loyal citizens to these Nazi agents to punish them because of their opposition to the objectives of this "smear bund." My crime is not my failure to expose the Nazi and Fascist agencies, because the public records show I have exposed them. My crime is my refusal to join in the conspiracy of character assassination by using the power of our committee to smear loyal citizens. It is my insistence on investigating, as well, Communist Party members and fellow travellers and those who echo their party line.

Now, I want to say this, Mr. Winchell is not in himself important. For a number of years he has made a living peddling bedroom keyhole scandal to the American people. Now, of course, a man in that business can get an enormous audience on the radio. Mr. Winchell with his big audience also has a political value. He can be used as a transmission belt to deliver political propaganda, handing it on, sandwiched in between his collection of divorces, infidelities and other social derelictions. In this case Mr. Winchell is being used as a transmission belt to deliver into millions of ears damaging statements, half truths, cunningly slanted implications designed to impugn the loyalty and to destroy the characters of American public men who oppose the objectives of these groups and to break down confidence in the Congress of the United States.

I hope Mr. Winchell will not say that he is not being so used. Because he has freely, though perhaps unconsciously, admitted it. Only last Sunday he told us that someone had charged that he had been kicked out of the Navy. I do not know whether he was kicked out or not. I am not interested. But I am interested in his own account of his departure from the Navy. He said he had been removed from active to inactive duty "for reasons which cannot be told until after the war." Here are his own words: "When I demanded active duty for the fourth time, I was instructed to stay on the radio with the following words: 'Some men must go overseas to be shot and some must stay over here to be stabbed in the back.'" Now, I ask, who told Walter Winchell that? He says he cannot tell until the war ends. But he admits he is under orders from some powerful person, from whom he is willing to take orders, to stay on the radio. For what purpose? To sell beauty preparations as a part of the war effort? Of course not. He was ordered to stay on the radio to do what he is doing—to carry on the work of the "smear bund," to intimidate its opponents and to discredit the Congress. But who is this "smear bund"? Who is this great personage with so much power that he can reach into the Navy to keep Mr. Winchell on the air and off the sea for propaganda purposes; and who is so exalted that his name cannot be breathed until the war ends? Who are these other groups leagued with him in this strange, un-American enterprise of smearing men into silence? What are their objectives?

The President appeals to the American people for unity. But at the same time this man is busy weekly on the air, daily in the papers, hurling insults which impugn the patriotism and loyalty of the Congress and the various public leaders, and the people who elect them.

Typical of these insults which Mr. Winchell has broadcast in the past 2 years is the following: "The only trouble with the sedition indictments is that while the defendants are in court some of their supporters are still in Congress." Then, again, he said, "What the country needs are some more criminal trials or, better still, impeachments, especially among the men who make and break their own laws." A new low was reached on September 7, 1942, when he stated: "Many of Hitler's American pals have been arrested but too many have been renominated." Also on the air he has used the phrase "cheap and vulgar politicians in Congress" in reference to the Members of that body. He has been equally vicious and untrue in statements appearing in his column where he has written: "Congress includes some of the sorriest 'stumblebums' in the Nation." And only a few weeks ago he referred to the House of Representatives as the "house of reprehensibles." What, I ask, in the name of fairness, is accomplished for unity by such attacks? Who is responsible for this? I think the people want to know. If Mr. Winchell is a tool, who is handling that tool? It must be obvious to every fair minded and patriotic citizen that such false and malicious attacks tend to undermine the confidence of the people in the legislative branch of our Government. What could be a greater disservice to this country in time of war?

Mr. Winchell, you have had much to say about tolerance. What could be more intolerant than these un-American attacks? Such attacks are the chief characteristics of fascism and the very essence of intolerance. You, Mr. Winchell, seem to have forgotten that those who expect tolerance from others should practice tolerance themselves.

This would be serious if Mr. Winchell were the only Charlie McCarthy of the "smear bund." He is, however, only one of many. Who are they? Who is behind them? The American people would like to know, and I promise you that Congress will soon find out.

One word more. I have spoken of smearing men. That is the smallest part of this subversive offensive. Congress is the last bulwark of your freedom. Win the war for freedom and destroy the power of Congress and you will have lost your freedom. Now I warn you that there is in this country a carefully organized and integrated and dangerously intelligent and aggressive movement to undermine the authority and destroy the prestige of Congress in the interest of setting up an all-powerful central executive. This program of vilification is part of that. Our committee has already exposed many of the persons and organizations who form this movement. In a short time we will expose many others and before we get through we are going to tell you the full story. We are going to find out and tell you who is supplying the brains and who is paying the bills.

Fellow Americans, we are really fighting two wars. One is a war of men, guns, tanks, planes, and ships. The other is a war of ideologies, rumors, intolerance, character assassinations, subversive activities, and propaganda that seek to destroy representative government. We must win both of these wars to preserve our freedom and guarantee that when my boy and your boy and our loved ones return from this awful conflict they will find the same Stars and Stripes waving triumphantly over the same institutions of freedom for which they fought and bled and for which their gallant comrades died.

REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country are engaged in the biggest food production effort in the history of agriculture. The responsible governmental agencies are making daily appeals to the farmers to produce more and still more. The response evidences a desire to comply with this governmental request. There are, however, some things going on in connection with this program that the farmer cannot understand. He writes to his Representatives in Congress and says, "How can I produce more when you take my help from me? How can I produce more when you take my help and yet fail to offset this loss by refusing me adequate machinery? How can I produce more when the Government directs the flow of essential oilseed meals to areas where it will not produce as much as I can produce?"

Mr. Speaker, these are real and vital problems to farmers in the great Middle West, which is actually the bread basket for the world today. I shall deal with one of them.

The War Food Administration is charged with the responsibility of formulating this vital program. It has the power to regulate the distribution of essential feeds where it wills. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not doing a very good job at this time. The tables below have been prepared by me from information furnished by the Chief of the Agricultural Adjustment Agency, United States Department of Agriculture, Mr. N. E. Dodd.

I make the charge that there is a serious default in the distribution of these feeds. At the present time they are not going into the best food producing areas as appears from the tables.

Table III shows the 20 leading States in livestock food production. Iowa tops the list in the big six, followed by Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Texas. Yet in the distribution of these feeds Iowa is fourth, Illinois is third, and Minnesota is ninth, Wisconsin is fourteenth, Missouri is eighth, and Texas is first. Why, this kind of distribution if the Department of Agriculture is interested in producing more food? Why not put it where it will do the most good?

Now examine table II. You will note that Mississippi ranks seventh in feeds received, yet it is twentieth in volume of food produced. North Carolina is thirteenth on list for receiving oil seed meals, yet occupies the nineteenth place of foods produced. Other examples of faulty distribution can be seen by quick glance at the tables, so further citation is unnecessary.

Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion, that this problem is charged with politics and if not corrected the food program for 1944 will be seriously impaired. The time to act is now. On December 2, 1943, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 59 which aims to correct the abuses indicated herein; it would order the War Food Administration to direct the flow of necessary oil meal feeds to those States where they will do the most good. Further, it will prevent Government politicians from playing politics with the feed business.

[78th Cong., 1st sess.; H. Con. Res. 59; in the House of Representatives, December 2, 1943; Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency]

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the War Food Administrator or any other officer or agency of the Government, including any Government-owned or Government-controlled corporation—

(1) in acquiring, selling, or otherwise disposing of protein meal; or

(2) in imposing upon processors, grinders, or other persons any requirements or restrictions with respect to the sale or other disposition or the shipment, delivery, or distribution of protein meal, should so act as to insure distribution of protein meal among the several States on the basis of, and in proportion to, the livestock units in such States.

REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. L. S. M. F. T.—L. S. M. F. T. This well-known Lucky Strike selling radio slogan has been dinned into the ears of the American people for months past. The Hartford Courant suggests that the connotation of those initials be changed to stand for Less Spending Means Fewer Taxes. L. S. M. F. T.—Less Spending Means Fewer Taxes. American taxpayers would respond to this rallying call.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by adding this editorial from the Hartford Courant of March 18 of this year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to follows:

It may be taking an almost unfair advantage of a citizenry still weakened by their bout with Form 1040, and still with that worn and palsied feeling as though they had been put through the wringer—in many instances, literally true. Nonetheless, this is as propitious a moment as any in which to speak of governmental expenditures to those who have just paid through the nose.

We Americans have become virtually caloused and shock proof when it comes to Government spending. Nobody begrudges for an instant the necessary war expenditures, which incidentally amounted in February alone, to more than $7,800,000,000, or better than $300,000,000 a day. But, aside from that, for the past decade or more, money has been dispensed from Washington with all the abandon of the fictional Mr. Brewster trying to throw away his millions—only nowadays we do it with billions. Reflect soberly on the fact that last year the Federal Government spent $88,000,000,000, a sum impossible to visualize.

Not all of this went for necessary or even desirable ends. Some of it went to pay the salaries of thousands of officeholders living fatly on overstuffed Government pay rolls. Other millions went for housing projects that will never be used. Blithely Government officials toss away a mere $135,000,000 on the Canol project in the Canadian wilderness. And even more recently Secretary Ickes speaks of another paltry $165,000,000 for an oil pipe line in Arabia.

Some of these fantastic expenditures in themselves would normally constitute a major national financial scandal. Such, for example, is the case of Basic Magnesium, Inc., on which the Government squandered $133,000,000 in a transaction that the Truman committee has described as "the most outrageous and unjustified contract proposed in connection with the war program * * * a wholly unwarranted gift of Government funds to a newly organized corporation that had no financial resources and only the most meager experience." Where this money went may be gaged by the fact that Basic Magnesium had 700 "executives" on its pay roll, of whom 100 received salaries in excess of $5,000 a year.

The list could be almost indefinitely extended to prove conclusively that our Government has gone hog wild in spending, so that not even Congress has any idea of how the money is spent or even who is spending it.

Some of the realities of this situation were confronted by the average citizen on March 15 when he went through the financial wringer. If the pain seemed great, remember—this is only the beginning. It would be well for the country if those in high places adopted for awhile the well-known, cigarette-selling radio slogan that has been dinned into the ears of the American people for months past. That is "L. S. M. F. T.," and by this time you hardly need to translate it for the average listener-in.

Our suggestion is that the connotation of those initials be changed to stand for: "Less Spending Means Fewer Taxes." This is a rallying call to which wide-awake American citizens would gladly respond.

Civil Aeronautics Board's Interpretation of Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, Strait-Jackets American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, the interpretation which has been placed on the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 by the Civil Aeronautics Board places the American merchant marine in a strait jacket which destroys its ability to compete with other maritime nations. This will ultimately stifle the American merchant marine.

The building and maintenance of a strong American merchant marine is as fundamental to our national defense as is the building and maintenance of a strong Navy. The merchant marine is one of the four main links in our chain of national defense, composed of the Army, the Navy, the merchant marine, and the air service. It is the link in this chain that provides the sinews to both our Army and Navy. Without an adequate merchant marine, our Army overseas and our Navy would both be helpless. It is therefore absolutely essential that we build and maintain the finest possible merchant marine to strengthen our national defense.

Before the war the United States produced at least 10 percent more goods than it consumed. The technological advances made during the war makes it now appear that we may produce even more when our peacetime economy is restored. These surplus commodities must be sold in foreign markets. Our merchant marine is the agency that finds these foreign markets and we must encourage this development of our postwar trade to give employment in this country. The limitations placed upon our merchant marine by the decisions of the Civil Aeronautics Board must be removed and if the C. A. B. refuses to do this, then other administrative or legislative means must be utilized to overcome the decisions of the C. A. B. It should not be permitted to thwart national interests as a whole.

No right-minded person would seek to retard the development of American aviation, either domestic or foreign, by reason of what it means to our Nation's security in time of war, as well as to our economy in time of peace. By the same token this applies equally to our merchant marine, the efficiency of which must not be destroyed to benefit aviation.

Those who have the genuine interest of American aviation at heart will recognize the interdependence of aviation and our merchant marine in transoceanic commerce, in the same manner that aviation interests of friendly foreign maritime nations have, and they will encourage the removal of this strait jacket from our merchant marine. When the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 was under consideration in the House of Representatives, amendments to the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 were also being considered. At that time, the President of the Air Transport Association of America, testified before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries—page 24 of the hearings of March 22, 1938—as follows:

> If the shipping or any other transportation companies wish to engage in air transportation, there is no reason why they should stand on any different basis from any other person desiring to enter this business.

It was generally understood at that time that our merchant marine would be able to compete in the field of transoceanic air transportation. Subsequently, however, the Civil Aeronautics Board chose to interpret the intent of Congress to suit its own views as indicated in an address made on November 11, 1943, by Mr. Harllee Branch, a member of the C. A. B., when he said:

> The Board has determined that the provisions of the Civil Aeronautics Act rigidly restrict the participation of the older forms of transportation in the air-transport field, and this determination is amply supported by well-established congressional policy.

Another member of the C. A. B., Mr. Oswald Ryan, has expressed his opinion by the statement:

> Thus, a construction of the Civil Aeronautics Act which rigidly limits the participation of a surface carrier in the air-transport field to cases where the surface carrier is enabled to use aircraft in its own operation to public advantage is in harmony with the well-established pre-existing congressional policy.

The complete indifference of these gentlemen with reference to international trade and its problems is clearly shown in these two statements. They have attempted to interpret congressional policy as laid down over a period of years on domestic transportation where complete Government regulation can be maintained, so as to apply to the transoceanic field where regulation by our Government cannot be maintained except as it applies to our own merchant marine.

There is no more highly competitive field of economic endeavor than international maritime commerce. Our merchant marine has survived this competition because we have attempted to overcome the handicaps placed upon us. But it is impossible to meet the competition other maritime nations will create by the operation of air-transport lines through surface carriers, unless we follow that same course. Our economy and our national defense demand that we encourage the development of air transport by surface carriers on parallel lines.

Federally Owned Lands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following declaration of policy as to federally owned lands by the Tuolumne County Board of Supervisors. This declaration of policy clearly sets forth the position of the local governments in my district regarding what is undoubtedly the most serious single problem faced by the county governments of the mountain counties of California:

DECLARATION OF POLICY AS TO FEDERALLY OWNED LANDS

To all lovers of justice and the American way of life, whithersoever dispersed:

It is an unfortunate but peculiar trait of human nature that the average person seldom shows a sympathetic interest in the woes and tribulations of his neighbor until he unexpectedly finds himself afflicted with the same malady. But when that does occur, he often emits a lustier howl than the original sufferer.

This experience has been particularly true in the history of the Federal land problem. Small counties like Tuolumne, whose economic future have been seriously menaced by reason of an extremely constricted tax base, have struggled and fought for many years in an apparently vain attempt to gain two objectives—general recognition of their plight and Federal redress for their grievances.

Progress was painfully slow until the outbreak of the present World War. Then, with the tremendous acquisition of private properties for military purposes, other communities which had enjoyed an immunity from Federal "landitis" awoke to the realization that their tax rolls were being encroached upon to the extent of many millions of dollars. The former indifference has completely vanished and in its place a mighty clamor is heard from coast to coast for an equitable adjustment of the Federal land problem.

However, the smaller counties, who were the pioneers in the movement, again find themselves laboring under a disadvantage and in actual danger of being shoved aside in the process of obtaining Federal restitution for wrongs inflicted upon local government. This danger lies in the objection that has been raised to full compensation for counties in which Federal holdings consist mainly of national forest and park lands or other lands which have never been placed on the local tax rolls.

This objection, or contention, is based upon a false assumption, and is grievously unjust to those counties which, through no fault of their own, have been deprived of their potential tax bases. In humble imitation of a famous and historic doctrine dear to every patriotic American heart, we hold these truths to be self-evident, namely, that all the political subdivisions of these United States were created on an equal basis, and that they were endowed with certain inalienable rights, that among these rights was the privilege and opportunity of expanding their tax bases until all the lands within their borders had gone on the tax rolls, thus forming an adequate and substantial revenue for the perpetuation of their local governments.

Practically all the States east of the Mississippi River exercised this right. By denying this privilege to western States, the people of the West have not only lost a birthright, but have suffered a rank discrimination.

There is another moral issue involved which many well-meaning people have failed to grasp. It is an established and accepted code of ethics that no person may be deprived of his rights or possessions without an opportunity to protest the proposed seizure. The same great principle should apply to political entities. By acts of Congress and without the consent of the people directly affected, many political subdivisions were suddenly deprived forever of the opportunity to expand their tax base. In Tuolumne County, for example, 70 percent of the potential tax base was wiped out.

It is not our purpose or desire to quarrel with the conservation policies of the Government, but if these vast areas are to be held for the use and enjoyment of the people of the United States as a whole, then the Federal Government which represents all the people should make suitable amends for the injustice done innocent citizens whose only fault was in making the mistake of building their homes in a region abounding in natural resources and scenic beauty.

There are some who callously feel that Tuolumne County should be induced to wind up its affairs and die as a political subdivision. Such persons either forget or ignore the fact that it was this section which cradled California and made it possible for her to join the great sisterhood of American States while still an infant in years. Let no one imagine for a moment that our Union was preserved in the dark days of the Civil War because the Americans of the North were more courageous and intelligent than the Americans of the South. The northerners won because they had a bountiful stream of gold flowing into their coffers, and that gold came from Tuolumne County and the other counties of the mother lode—all little counties today.

These counties are proud of their past and hopeful for the future. They do not ask for pity or charity. All they ask is simple justice in order that they may continue to function as self-respecting American communities. To this end they invite the support and cooperation of every individual and group who believe in the perpetuation of local government as opposed to bureaucratic control, and who fully realize that the great chain of American counties is no stronger than its weakest link in a moral sense.

The Next Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial by Glenn E. Bunnell, editor of the Stuart (Nebr.) Advocate. In presenting this eritorial I wish to say that Mr. Bunnell is a man particularly free from political bias. It is certain he reflects the thinking of a great majority of the men and women on the farms and in the smaller towns of Nebraska. It follows:

THE EDITOR'S COLUMN

(By Glenn E. Bunnell)

As we approach the coming Presidential campaign the people seem to divide themselves into three general groups. There are, of course, subdivisions of these groups, but for the present we will consider only the three large units of thought.

First. There is the group composed of New Dealers who favor Roosevelt for a fourth term.

Second. There is a group of conservative, old-guard Democrats who want to see the party stay in power under a new leader.

Third. The ever-growing group who favor the complete or clean sweep of the present administration and the election of a Republican President.

It is between the first and third groups that the main battle will be joined. The second group, while quite numerous, seems to lack any great strength.

The planks in the two platforms will be many, but for the most part they will have some bearing on the winning of the war, making the peace, and post-war readjustment.

The big argument of the first faction will be based on the old adage about it being unwise to change horses in the middle of the stream. However, the third school of thought will point out that while changing horses in midstream may not always be wise, it would be well to change if the horse you are on does not seem to be getting any nearer to the other shore. In such a case it may be most advisable to get on a horse that seems stronger and better able to breast the current.

I am not willing to say that the present administration is not doing all it can to win the war; but I will say that another administration might be able to do more. It appears that the present administration has committed itself to certain policies, which they know, or should know by now, are not the best; but which they cannot change or abandon for very good political reasons. A new administration, starting with a clean slate, could adopt or abandon all of the present administration policies on their merits, with no political strings attached. Our Government, like our homes, is good, but like our homes, Government needs a thorough cleaning every so often.

In addition to winning the war, the administration we put into power next November, will have to make the peace, decide this country's international policy, and guide us through the readjustment period after the peace is made.

A good-neighbor policy looks like a fine thing, and it is; but we should make these good neighbors our friends by sound, honest statesmanship and a wise and just foreign policy, and not by trying to buy friendship. No friendship worth having can be purchased like a load of coal or a bunch of bananas. I do not mean that we cannot render financial aid to a proven friend in need, but you cannot buy a friend or a neighbor's loyalty with money, even American money.

One more thing. If Roosevelt is reelected he will not have a Congress with which he can work in complete harmony, but if a Republican leader is placed in the White House, it appears that the legislative and executive branches of our Government will again be able to work together, not with one as a rubber stamp for the other, but in mutual respect of each other's ability and aims.

The O. P. A. Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a letter written by Mr. J. Clyde Tomlinson, general chairman, Gregg County war price and rationing boards, to Mr. Chester Bowles. I commend the letter to the membership of this House:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Longview, Tex., March 22, 1944.

Mr. CHESTER BOWLES,
Office of Price Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter making inquiry as to my appraisal of the O. P. A.

Under present wartime conditions, there is unquestionably a definite place for the O. P. A. program. This is particularly true with regard to price control, and the rationing of certain scarce and critical necessities. I do, however, feel that our regulations should be simplified and reduced to an extreme minimum, steering as far away from regimentation as possible. Furthermore, I feel that the organization should be streamlined and expenses reduced. Without an intimate knowledge of the organizational set-up, I can see little reason for regional offices and their staffs when district or State offices would suffice.

Next, it is most important that discrimination be avoided in all price-control measures, which has not been done in the past. As an illustration, the people of the Southwest fully realize that the rankest kind of discrimination has been shown in fixing raw milk, crude oil, and other prices. The milk price is locally being taken care of by subsidies, but the American people dislike subsidies. Now, there is a movement under way to subsidize stripper oil well production. The independent oil producer only wants a fair price for his product, and not in the form of a subsidy. Crude oil today is selling for less than in 1937, while production and discovery costs have constantly risen. Integrated or major companies have a distinct advantage through their operation of transportation, manufacturing, and marketing facilities, some of which, I understand, are subsidized.

In conclusion, I am of the opinion that all commodity prices, as well as labor, should have been frozen at the beginning of the war, thereby not permitting the war to increase the profits for anyone. You are doing a fine job and represent a great improvement over your predecessors in office, and I trust that you can succeed in revamping the organization and its functions in a manner that will completely restore the confidence of the people.

Sincerely yours,

J. CLYDE TOMLINSON,
General Chairman, Gregg County
War Price and Rationing Boards.

CC.—Congressman BECKWORTH.

Dollars Before Humanity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick:

DOLLARS BEFORE HUMANITY

The attitude of the American Government toward the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people is not complimentary. The famous Balfour Declaration issued in the name of the British Government following the First World War was a joint policy of the Governments of Great Britain and the United States. It was hoped then by the Allied Governments that the establishment of a Jewish homeland would solve an age-old problem.

With this in view the British Government assumed a mandate over Palestine, but during the Munich period the then British Government adopted the so-called white paper restricting immigration, land purchase, and colonization of Palestine by Jewish settlers. While the British Eighth Army was fighting with its back to the Suez Canal the Jews of Palestine were performing heroic deeds as commandos and as other shock troops.

The overwhelming sentiment of the American people is expressed in the simple words of the Senate resolution:

"That the United States shall use its good offices and take appropriate measures to the end that the doors of Palestine shall be opened for the free entry of Jews into that country, and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization, so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

There must be some place for the Jews of Europe and Asia to go. They have been dispersed and massacred in Germany, Poland, Russia, and other countries. Millions of them are fugitives. They were making wonderful progress in Palestine, building modern towns and cities and in the development of agriculture until the British policy changed.

Now there is another complication—this time a serious one. The natural enemies of the Jews in Palestine are the Moslems, whose faces turn to Mecca and Medina. Mecca is in Saudi Arabia. That country has a crafty, determined ruler in the person of Ibn Saud. Just now the American Government is showering Ibn Saud with gifts. They smell of oil.

Arabia has fabulous oil reserves—the richest in the world—and American capital is there on the ground floor. There is where Secretary Ickes of the P. R. C. wants to build a pipe line at a cost of $165,000,000 for the transportation of this oil from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean.

Is this why the United States Government has lost interest in Palestine as a Jewish homeland? Do dollars come before humanity?

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on March 25, 1944:

Dear friends of the triple cities and my congressional district, imagine my pleasure when I read in the Binghamton Sun last week an account of the formation of another Hall Furlough Club, this time in the tenth ward of Binghamton. The account also carried the picture of the elected officers: Mrs. Janet Virgilio, president; Mrs. Joseph Gennarelli, vice president; Mrs. Dominick De Santis, secretary; and Mrs. Denny Lo Vuolo, treasurer.

Allow me to extend to Mrs. Virgilio and all her fellow officers and members of this new Hall Furlough Club my very best wishes for their future success. I know their enthusiasm will be a source of inspiration to other groups about to organize. These patriotic women know I am absolutely and wholeheartedly behind them in their fine work.

A central council was definitely set up this last week at a meeting held in Johnson City. Miss Septemia Morlando, president of the original Hall Furlough Club was elected president of the central council. Mrs. Virgilio was chosen vice president, and Mrs. Violet Grassi, president of Hall Furlough Club No. 3, of West Endicott, was elected secretary-treasurer. I know they will all do a good job.

And speaking of elections, Johnson City's Republican Women's Club reelected Mrs. Pearl Klingman president for another year.

Also reelected are first vice president, Mrs. Irene Excell; second vice president, Mrs. Jane Day; secretary, Mrs. Mona Landon; treasurer, Mrs. Grace Strickland. Members of the executive committee include these officers and Mrs. Ruth Vought, Mrs. Gladys Werts, and Mrs. Gertrude Walling.

The other day I received a letter from these Republican ladies, and I quote from it:

"MY DEAR MR. HALL: At a recent meeting of the Johnson City Women's Republican Club, it was voted unanimously to endorse your bill for free furloughs for men in service. If there is anything that we can do, either as a club or as individuals, we shall be very glad to do so.

"With appreciation for past favors and best wishes for the future,

"Very sincerely,

"MONA LANDON,
"Secretary.

"JOHNSON CITY, N. Y."

Endorsement of the Hall furlough bill by these ladies is most gratifying to me. I know it will be most encouraging to all concerned.

Recently, I have been sounding out sentiment from Republican leaders in Congress about what may happen this fall, which, as you know, is a Presidential election year. JOE MARTIN told me he feels certain that a Republican House of Representatives will be elected in November. Practically everyone in Washington is certain of a Republican President.

The manner in which the recent Johnson City and Endicott village elections were conducted is a tribute to harmony and concord on the home front. The victorious Republican candidates should be congratulated. They have certainly set an example for the rest of us to live up to. I feel sure the same party harmony which existed in their campaign will be followed throughout the remainder of the year. As Mr. Hill, our distinguished Republican leader in Broome County recently said, this is no time for family fights. I am in absolute agreement with him.

Address of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey opening the annual exhibition of the Press Photographers Association of New York, held at the Museum of Science and Industry, Rockefeller Plaza, New York City, and broadcast over a coast-to-coast red network on Friday, March 24, 1944:

You do not know what a relief it is to be here tonight. This is really a night off for me, the first in weeks. As you know, the New York Legislature has just finished a session of 2½ months, probably the most intensive and constructive session ever held at Albany. Our hard-won State surplus of $148,000,000 has been locked up to provide post-war improvements and employment for veterans and war workers. Taxes have been kept down, every soldier and sailor from New York has been assured a simple, valid ballot, workmen's compensation protected from the chiselers and State services have been strengthened generally.

So, last Sunday began the 30-day bill period during which I must act upon some nine hundred new laws. This is the toughest 30 days of the year for the Governor of New York, so you will, perhaps, understand why I am doubly glad to have a night off with you, here tonight.

We are here to give fitting recognition to outstanding achievement in the field of news photography. The good reporter, whether he works with the camera and flash bulb or with notebook and typewriter, was never more necessary than he is today It is impossible for us here in America to realize what a precious thing we have in a free press until we start reading the unashamed falsehoods offered to most of the rest of the people of the world by what they call newspapers.

We in America have learned to distinguish between fact and opinion, between gossip and actual events. We have come to doubt a news report when fact is adulterated with opinion.

The news and camera men who report to us through the newspapers, the radio, and news reels are the eyes and ears of America. Under our system they have to report truthfully or else they gradually die from public disrespect. Thanks to that system, they make us the best informed people in the world. And it is through knowing the truth that we can keep ourselves free.

Unfortunately, there have been increasing signs of late that our newspapers are being denied the right to print all the news. Important matters have repeatedly been withheld for months until they leaked out and became the subject of such widespread gossip that they could no longer be suppressed.

Only now do we learn, because it leaked out, of the shooting down of 23 transport planes and the killing of 410 American paratroopers in Sicily 8 months ago. Even after a presidential broadcast, we still know precisely nothing of what really happened at the much-heralded conference in Tehran. We only know of the disquieting evidences of disunity which have since occurred in the Pravda attacks on the British and the Vatican, followed by the startling repercussions brought out by the President's announcement of the three-way division of the Italian fleet.

All of us understand the necessities of military censorship. We expect the military authorities to withhold all news, such as that of troop movements, that could be of any aid to the enemy. But the events of which I speak have not been suppressed to keep information from the enemy so much as to keep them from our own people. One such incident might be charged to blunder; two such incidents begin to lay the unpleasant suspicion of administration policy. When we find the State Department requesting the British censor to suppress political news sent to American papers by American correspondents abroad, it begins to amount to a deliberate and dangerous policy of suppression of the news at home.

Despite millions of dollars spent on War Information Service, we are constantly being surprised. Often we learn of important events through the pronouncements of foreign statesmen or by reading dispatches cabled back to this country from foreign papers. After making all due allowances for wartime conditions, it still remains that we know far too little about our own foreign policies and practically nothing about our diplomatic commitments.

The press of this country has cooperated unanimously in voluntary censorship. It will continue to do so. But the stakes in this war are too high for it to be fought in the dark. The issues are too momentous. It is time we had light as we fight for freedom.

In the days ahead we shall face severe tests. We have already grimly prepared ourselves for the coming invasion of the Continent which we know will be hard and bloody.

The mothers, fathers, wives of American soldiers who are to make that great effort will be brave and patient, as they have always been. But they will demand that they be told the truth and with reasonable promptness.

There seems to be too little recognition of the fact that free people cannot fight a war with blinders on their eyes. Knowing present dangers and the hardships ahead they will brace themselves to any task. They will sacrifice as deeply as the welfare of the Nation demands. They can do neither if they are not told where they they are going and why.

Our people can take the bad news with the good but they have a right to know the facts. We need a free, informed people to fight a war for freedom.

Whatever excuse may be made for the blunders of censorship in wartime, we must see to it that no vestige of censorship either voluntary or enforced, shall continue for one moment when the war is over. Then we shall face the hard task of building a just and lasting peace. That task cannot be successful without the aid of an alert, courageous, and unfettered press.

The building of a durable peace will not be simple. It will not be accomplished overnight by the mere signing of a treaty. It will certainly not be done just by an agreement made by a few men seated around a conference table. It will be achieved by the labor and willing sacrifice of people the world over for generations to come because they understand the conditions of peace and want them.

There have been studied efforts in recent months to nake people believe that Congress will obstruct the building of a lasting peace. That is not true. That is a part of a continuing effort to discredit the Congress of the United States. I have confidence in the Congress because it is close to the people. I have eternal confidence in the good sense and the character of the American people.

If the peace we build is to succeed, it must reflect the will and understanding of our people. That understanding can be fostered and that will expressed through a free press. Certainly in the years to come, the peace will succeed only if our people have the information and the will to make it succeed as a living reality. For the sake of our sons and our sons' sons, we must have the determined, abiding will to build a better world.

In this mighty undertaking you who represent the eyes and ears of America will have a major part. I am happy to join in the tribute tonight to those of your members who have won the honors this past year. Each of the working news photographers who receives his award tonight has achieved distinction in his profession. Each has passed the acid test of excellence, for the awards I present were voted by rivals to members of their own craft.

First is the award named after the late Harvey Deuel, the brilliant editor to whom belongs the credit for much of the advance made in press photography. It goes to the man who took the best spot news photograph of the year. This award, which rates as the grand prize of the show, I have the honor to present to Pat Candido of the New York Daily News.

Second comes the memorial trophy for the best sports picture in the show. The award, sponsored by Acme Newspictures, is named after the late Carl Thusgaard, who lost his life last September while photographing a bombing mission in New Guinea. I take pleasure in presenting this trophy to John Rooney of the Associated Press.

Among the most interesting exhibits in the show are the pictures taken with the new Speedlite camera invented by Professor Edgerton of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The best Speedlite shot of the year was made by Anthony Camerano, staff photographer of the Associated Press.

Until his death a couple of years ago the dean of press photographers in New York was the well beloved William Zerbe of the New York Herald-Tribune. For him is named the first prize for the best photograph in the pictorial class, which is won by Irving Haberman, staff photographer of PM.

The feature class means pictures which tell their own story, pictures requiring little or no caption. The first prize in this class was won by a photograph of Mrs. Emma Van Coutren, who has seven sons and four daughters in the armed forces of her country. The photograph was made by Arthur Sasse of International News Photos.

Finally comes the award of the first prize in the portrait and personality class, character studies with a camera. It is entitled "Portrait of a Hero", which fittingly describes the subject Sgt. Fred Quirus, who in one night of rescue work on a railroad wreck near Philadelphia, saved 8 victims who were seriously wounded, and carried out 16 dead bodies. This prize also goes to Irving Haberman.

It has been a pleasure to be here and congratulate you, not only the winners but the members of the Press Photographers Association of New York. You have struggled long, you have worked hard and intelligently for the position which you as a craft now hold and for the high standards you have reached.

Condensed Statement of Willard H. Dow, President and General Manager of the Dow Chemical Co., Before the Special Committee of the United States Senate Investigating the National Defense Program—the Truman Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 21, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, you are all too familiar with the tireless efforts of the past decade to take from the Congress its legislative power and transfer it to the Executive. There was nothing accidental about that movement. It was a deliberate attempt to break the link between Government and the people so that a change in our form of government might be made without the consent of the people—keeping Congress as a mere rubber stamp in order to give lip service to constitutional process.

The modern type of dictator, whether he be a Napoleon or a Hitler, always assumes power in response to what he calls the sovereign will of the people. He never bothers to mention that the representatives of the people who vote him absolute power were selected by him for that single purpose.

But, fortunately for the future of our Nation, our people have asserted themselves and, by electing to Congress Republicans and the kind of Democrats who refuse to be rubber stamps, have checked the transfer of powers. We of the Congress are now in process of getting back the powers which should never have been surrendered. Those who are content to remain supine marionettes of the Executive are now in tiny majority. Their constituents will soon have the opportunity to pass judgment upon them and their works.

The people, whenever the chance is offered to them, are sending to Congress men pledged to end the Executive tyranny that extends from the conduct of great affairs down to the pestering of individual citizens by petty, bumptious, dictatorial bureaucrats. We of the Congress are struggling to clean up the mess that Executive willfulness has made of both our domestic and our foreign affairs. We are driving out the fascism, which under another name has all but hog-tied us, and we are clearing the way so that our boys may achieve the kind of victory and the kind of peace that they are fighting for.

We are on our way to achieving an American freedom. We are calling things by their right names and junking, as fast as we catch up with them, those rules, regulations, and practices which were throttling real freedom.

Many of our citizens are so bewildered by the petty tyrannies in which they are enmeshed that it is doubtful if they yet fully realize what the resumption of power by the Congress means to them. They do not yet realize that in the Congress they can now find relief from Executive tyranny, and it is my proud privilege to tell you, so that it may be a matter of eternal record, that one of my constituents was the first to come to the Congress, and, opening his whole record, ask for justice.

I refer to Willard H. Dow, the president of the Dow Chemical Co. of Midland, which is in my Congressional district of Michigan. That company was organized half a century ago by a man the memory of whom I honor and revere as a great American patriot—Herbert H. Dow. He started from scratch. In the beginning he had only an idea, energy, a few dollars advanced by friends and the supposedly worthless salt brine that underlies so much of Michigan. He brought these elements together and, by putting earned brick upon earned brick, he built a great institution and a great community. I may remark that this building which was in our finest tradition would have been impossible under New Deal tax laws.

LAW LIBRARY
FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

In the First World War this company served the Nation well. In the present war under the son of the founder, this company, because it is bigger and stronger than before, has served the Nation even better. I shall not attempt here to detail the extent of that service because I must be brief. I shall only tell you about magnesium.

This company, through 25 years, and at a heavy financial loss, pioneered in the manufacture of magnesium, with the result that this country had an independent magnesium industry and when the war broke out we were not, as in rubber, dependent upon a foreign source of supply. Dr. Willard Dow was so far ahead of the authorities charged with procurement of war supplies and equipment that nearly a year before Pearl Harbor his company, in addition to enlarging the plants at Midland, had gone down to the sea that laps the shores of Texas and there erected a plant to take magnesium out of sea water. The one inexhaustible source of supply for this vitally necessary war material. That is something which no one has ever done before.

While Dow was thus straining to meet the needs which at that time only he foresaw, the Department of Justice clanged into the scene with what has now been proven to be a rigmarole of charges brought under a perverted notion of the antitrust laws. They took advantage of the war to force a settlement. I shall not at this time attempt to go into the motives of the Department of Justice in seeking to attack business in the initial emergency. Be that as it may, the actions were settled under the specific agreement that none of the charges alleged were admitted.

Ever since then the Dow Co. has been the victim of a smear campaign which assumed that all the charges were facts and which has gone far beyond even the allegations of the Department. Dr. Dow finally turned to that committee of the Senate known as the Truman committee and asked for a day to present the facts from the records of his company.

The committee gave him his day, heard his testimony, and cross-examined him on it. The committee has filed its report and it not only completely clears the Dow Co. and its president of all the charges that have been made against it, but also sets out its war record of magnesium production as a great American achievement. I desire here and now to compliment the Truman committee on its courage and its fairness.

Since Dr. Dow's demand for justice and his securing of it at the hands of Congress is to me a historic event that presages a new era, I believe that Dr. Dow's statement before the committee should be made a matter of public record. Here it is, in slightly abbreviated form:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am before you today to present to you the war record of the Dow Chemical Co. in magnesium, in the hope that you will scrutinize that record in the most minute detail. You are, I believe, concerned solely with the war record. The Department of Justice has at various times and in various places tried to force into the Dow war record certain charges growing out of peacetime operations. It pretends these charges are proven facts. By deduction, it claims both the Dow Chemical Co. and the Nation were less able than they should have been to meet the magnesium needs of the war emergency.

We are not here to defend against these charges. We are here positively to demonstrate that the charges never did have and never could have had the least basis in fact. We intend to show you that, had it not been for the long, hard years of travail out of which Dow magnesium was born, this Nation would not have had a magnesium industry. We intend to show you that, had it not been for our foresight in extending our facilities more than a year before Pearl Harbor and going down into the seas off Texas, this Nation would not have been able to meet in magnesium the initial emergencies of war. We intend to show you that Dow worked to such effect that in the critical year of 1942 it produced 91.2 percent of all the magnesium produced in this country. And further we intend to show you that every act complained of by the Department of Justice as against the public interest was actually in the public interest and that, if anyone impeded the magnesium program, it was not Dow. In short, gentlemen, we believe that the Dow record in magnesium is one of the highest public service. We ask you to affirm or negate that belief.

If you will bear with me for a moment, I will give you a little of the background of our company. It was founded by my father, Dr. Herbert H. Dow, on an idea which he worked out as a student in the Case School at Cleveland. My father tried out his plan in 1889 in a shed at Canton, Ohio, with about $300 put up by friends. The money ran out in a few months and the little concern folded up. But my father learned something and in the next year came to Midland, Mich., and in 1890, with several thousand dollars, started what developed into our present company. He made his idea work and in 10 years was the principal American manufacturer of bromine.

The point that I want to emphasize is that we are a local, self-made company, and we have always been just that.

The company was becoming such a large factor in bromine and in bleach that it began to attract the attention of those European nations who regarded the American chemical market as their exclusive property. In 1905, my father was visited by a German representative of the European bromine cartel and informed that, unless he stopped all exports and came to some arrangement with the cartel, the Germans would undercut and ruin him.

He replied instantly that he would do as he pleased and believed he could hold his own against all comers. The Germans cut to less than anyone's cost, and the Germans had the funds to keep up the fight longer than Dow. But the Germans reckoned without my father's resource. He found that the Germans were selling at 20 cents everywhere except in the United States, and so he quickly opened offices in England and in Germany and, with a German agent and a German trade-mark, sold at 15 cents in Germany—undercutting their home market.

In a year the Germans withdrew from the market, acknowledging themselves licked for the first time in their chemical history.

Much the same thing happened with bleach, but this time British and German interests together tried to force Dow out as they discovered that the Midland concern was taking nearly half of the bleach business of this country. In 1903, the British cut. Dow carried on, ready to meet any price. By the fall of the year, the foreign interest withdrew.

It was the war that took America and Dow into magnesium. When the First World War broke out in 1914, all the magnesium used in the United States was imported from Germany. The market for magnesium metal—which the Germans sold at $1.65 a pound—was trifling. The metal had no structural use and was principally bought by the makers of fireworks and flashlight powders.

Let me emphasize that it is not difficult to make magnesium metal in a laboratory. The difficulty comes in producing commercially. And, although there has been a lot of talk about magnesium patents and I also shall talk about them, the really big thing is the "know how." That comes only from experience and, I may add, very expensive experience. Dow leads the Nation as a magnesium producer because we have through the years gained the "know how."

With the German supply shut off in World War No. 1, our Nation found itself short of magnesium as a deoxidizer in the manufacture of nickel and for flashlight powders, and the Allies found themselves short of powder for tracer bullets and flares. Let me call to your attention right now that the present great demand for magnesium arises from the war needs for powder, incendiary bombs, and other than structural uses. We and, I presume, the United Nations are using only about 25 percent of magnesium metal for structural purposes. That is an important fact to bear in mind when considering what will happen to our present magnesium facilities in the post-war world.

The Dow group had magnesium chloride and in the summer of 1916 they decided to get into making the metal and began experimenting. They had plenty of book knowledge but no commercial knowledge. The company had no money to spare and everything had to be done with the material at hand. The group worked out a small rectangular box of welded boiler plate. This cell was heated over a brick arch, molten magnesium chloride poured in and the current turned on during one of the hottest afternoons that Midland had ever known. Soon little globules of metal began to float on the surface of the bath. The group knew that at last they were on their way to success. They stood by all the night, anxiously watching and unconcernedly breathing in quantities of chlorine gas. In the morning, they had a 1-pound cake of metallic magnesium. That was the 20th day of July 1916.

The next step was to a cell six times as large, from which to learn the essentials of engineering to go on a production basis. This cell ran reasonably well and on good days produced a dozen pounds of magnesium. But also it began to introduce some of the difficulties that were to be expected in manufacturing.

Nevertheless, the unit was kept going, and in the winter of 1916–17 the group decided they knew enough to go into production. Plans were drawn for a real plant. On an autumn day in 1917, the plant was finished and ready to go into production. None of the group ever having operated such a big plant, there was some trouble in getting all the cells filled and the current turned on. Then things began to happen. Within 48 hours the plant had to be closed down as a failure.

That was a heavy—almost a staggering—loss. The group set about making a new cell, using the experience they had gained. This cell worked. It produced 50 to 60 pounds of magnesium a day and 16 other units were gradually installed. But on February 1, 1920, after the plant had been in apparently successful operation for 6 weeks, one of the melting pots broke, the molten bath gushed out over the floor, set fire to the building, and in almost no time the whole plant was ablaze with a new kind of fire that nobody knew how to put out. The only salvage, curiously enough, was a pile of magnesium ingots that had been stacked on the floor. When the mass of twisted iron and steel was cleared away, the ingots were there unharmed.

The company had sold 3,852 pounds of metal in 1918 and 859 pounds in 1919. The loss was over $60,000. Of the several magnesium metal producers that had started business in the war period, by 1920 only the American Magnesium Corporation at Niagara Falls and Dow at Midland remained. The others had dropped out because they could not see any future in the business. My father had lost two plants and, without a plant, was in an excellent position to get out of business. He had no intention of doing anything of the kind, even though German magneisum was beginning to enter the country in an effort to reestablish the position lost by the war.

This time they set up only four cell units—in order to do some testing before going further. This plant was operated satisfactorily, but, as the depression settled upon the country late in 1920, the plant shut down and did not reopen again until 1922 when the depression was receding and a tariff bill had been passed giving the American chemical industry a chance to live. Then the group expanded the four cells and developed, as well as refined, the process. They had started with nothing except laboratory knowledge and, devising ways and means as they went along, at no step did they have a situation which could be covered by a basic patent. There were no basic patents in the magnesium industry. Anyone who chose could enter the industry.

The Dow intention had been to make magnesium metal and to sell it as such to processors who would do their own alloying and fabricating, for Dow had neither the personnel nor the means to engage in the new kind of business involved in the making and fabrication of alloys. The American Magnesium Corporation, their only remaining competitor in the production of magnesium, had gone into both alloys and fabrication. There was little hope for Dow to sell any metal unless there were processors to buy the metal. It became evident by 1918 that the processors would not grow of themselves and would therefore have to be grown. Dow knew nothing about making either alloys or castings and had access to no body of knowledge. Therefore they had to start from scratch. In 1918 they had opened a little metallurgical laboratory to develop and test alloys and a little foundry and shop for casting and machining. They had no intention of going into business, but wanted to accumulate knowledge so as to teach others how to go into business.

They ran into some patents held by the American Magnesium Corporation (which had been bought by the Aluminum Co. of America) and into others held by the German I. G. Farben—a post-war chemical trust that embraced pretty much the whole of the German chemical industry. Dow had to work out their own alloys and they called these alloys "Dowmetal." They really were Dow metal because they were evolved by the Dow group.

The largest outlet for magnesium was for use as an alloy with aluminum. That use was taken care of by the American Magnesium Corporation. But Dow steadily expanded production, jumping to 72,250 pounds a year in 1923 and to over 200,000 pounds in 1926 and steadily bringing down the price, in the hope of being able to compete on a price basis with aluminum. In 1922, before the tariff on magnesium was raised, it sold at $1.60 a pound, but by 1926 Dow was selling at 69 cents a pound. In every year up to 1927, Dow lost money substantially, except in 1926 when the sales netted about 5 percent and in 1927 when they netted about 1 percent.

It has been alleged that Dow restrained trade. From this it has been deduced—with complete unfairness—that Dow hindered the development of magnesium in this country. These allegations grow out of Dow's transactions with the American Magnesium Corporation.

Both the companies were in the fabricating field—the only two in the field—and, as was usual with a new product, taking out patents as they went along, there was bound to be interference in the applications, but it so happened that it was not until late in 1926 that a really important interference came up. Rather than have a contest which would be only one of many, the two companies on March 4, 1927, executed a license in which each party had the right to sublicense to such sublicensees as bought metal from one or the other. Since these two concerns were the only ones producing magnesium in the United States, the real effect of this clause was to exclude the licensing of the patents to people who bought imported metal.

A. M. C. had been investigating the Dow magnesium and had received a trial shipment of 2,000 pounds. This shipment proved so entirely satisfactory that A. M. C. began buying magnesium from Dow. Each purchase by A. M. C. stood on its own feet and generally A. M. C. as a quantity buyer, got about 10 cents a pound under the general market—which was highly profitable for Dow—for it cost on the average more than 10 cents a pound for Dow to sell and service others. There was no agreement or understanding that A. M. C. would buy any definite quantity except as ordered from time to time by A. M. C. on regular purchase orders.

In this same year, A. M. C. chose to stop producing magnesium and Dow was left as the country's sole producer. This was either a privilege or a burden. Up to that time neither Dow nor anyone else had succeeded in making any money out of the production of magnesium. Dow, in effect, was presented with a monopoly by default. Dow had the same kind of monopoly in producing magnesium as Henry Ford had during the early days of producing Model T—the monopoly which comes of course when anyone makes a thing better and cheaper than anyone else. The A. M. C. business gave Dow a sufficient backlog to warrant enlarging production and going forward with price reductions.

The Dow group was determined to make a position for magnesium in the United States by taking the metal out of the specialty and putting it into the commodity class. This could be done only through the price reductions of volume production and by intensifying research in the fields of production, fabrication, and uses. Magnesium production is peculiar, in that if a cell be started into operation it cannot easily be closed down without the feed in the cell freezing—that is, hardening—which may mean rebuilding a considerable part of the cell before operations can again be begun. Therefore it may be cheaper to let a cell run on, in the hope that the output can be disposed of, than to shut it down and take a certain loss.

After 1927 when Dow was presented with what is called a monopoly, we were able not only to reduce prices at a faster rate than before but also to increase production at a faster rate than before. It has been freely asserted as a fact that Dow kept the price of magnesium one and a half times the price of aluminum and this kept down the sale of magnesium. Dow made its own prices to sell the most magnesium it could and our prices were in no way related to aluminum prices.

The A. M. C. went out of the production of magnesium on its own volition and without any notice, much less any agreement with Dow and for the simple reason that it had a responsible producer who could sell them magnesium at a price below their own costs of production. This did not, however, prevent the A. M. C. from looking around to discover if a source cheaper than Dow could be found. The I. G. Farben people, during 1928 and 1929, began actively looking for a chance to get back into the American market which had been closed to them by the tariff, for they could not, in spite of their lower labor costs, meet the Dow prices with German-made magnesium after paying duty charges. Therefore they proposed to establish a plant in the United States, presumably if they could get the A. M. C. contract by underbidding Dow. That resulted in an investigation of the comparative costs of the I. G. and the Dow processes.

The report held that the I. G. process might be cheaper than Dow's. My father indignantly rejected the report and said that he would treat German competition in magnesium exactly as he had met it in bromine. He and his group made no effort to suppress the possible competition by any agreement or compromise. That was not their way. They were ready to meet all comers without fear or favor. That was their way. The I. G. did not enter the United States to build a plant and the magnesium industry was preserved as an absolutely American industry. It was preserved in the American way.

In 1930, upon the death of my father, I became president and general manager of the Dow Chemical Co. We organized a special sales division to handle magnesium and its products. The great trouble was the high cost of fabrication and this was further increased by the high spoilage rate. The customers, expensively nurtured by Dow, just would not stay put. The important quarry were the airplane and motorcar companies. Dow installed a squad to teach the Wright Aeronautical Co. how to make castings and did likewise with the Eclipse Aviation Co., which made airplane starters and had been buying its metal from Germany. The principal progress was with the Ford Motor Co. and the efforts at Ford's had the whole Dow Co. excited at prospects of an immense market.

Hopes went high and the contract with Ford in 1931 mentioned 20,000,000 pounds. But the project lasted only 3 years. Neither the Army nor the Navy could be induced to take any particular interest. They took no official account of the European experience with electron, which had been used to some extent in planes and in the Zeppelins during the First World War. By the thirties electron was in general use in German airplanes and the use had spread to other countries. In 1930 several thousand Isotta-Fraschini aircraft motors extensively using magnesium were in commercial operation, and in 1934 the catalog of one British firm listed 102 aircraft parts as regularly made out of magnesium alloys. As far back as 1927 De Pinedo made a round-trip trans-Atlantic flight in an Italian plane with two Isotta motors. On his way back he had to make a forced landing near the Azores and his motors were in the water for more than a week. When rescued they were found not to be corroded. An Italian air squadron under the command of Signor Balbo flew to America in 1933. It was found that their engine crankcases, cylinder covers, oil tanks, pump bodies, and a number of other parts were made of electron. The German planes used more and more electron, but for some reason the progress in the United States was very slow in the aircraft industry, where price, which in other industries formed a primary obstacle, did not really count.

We retained an engineer at Washington to push magnesium with the Army and Navy. It is enough to quote him concerning a program that was set up: "Although this long-range test program was supposed to be cooperative, with the object of making available dowmetal to the Navy, there was little real cooperation. The Navy personnel was passive, leaving the actual pushing of the program to the industrial participants, namely, the Dow Chemical Co. and American Magnesium Corporation."

Now we come to another matter out of which has been created the serious charge that Dow was a member of an international cartel and that its production and prices were ruled by the I. G. It is an infamous charge. It is alleged, but I have no personal knowledge that is a fact, that the I. G. and Alcoa entered into an agreement by which an American company known as the Magnesium Development Corporation was formed. To this company the I. G. transferred its production and fabrication patents. A production patent has to do with the making of magnesium metal, a fabrication patent has to do with alloying and working the metal after it is made. None of us in our company ever heard of this contract between I. G. and Alcoa known as the Alig contract until we were charged in an antitrust criminal action with having agreed to limit our production to 4,000 tons a year. It then appeared that the I. G. had transferred its production patents to M. D. C. They were never used in this country until basic magnesium took them up for a defense plant corporation contract. But, regardless of that, Dow was not a party to the Alig contract and knew nothing of it and the limitation did not apply at all to the I. G. fabrication patents which are the only ones in which Dow was ever licensed. The charge, you see, is utterly baseless.

This is what did happen. There were broadly three sets of fabricating patents—those owned by Dow and those owned by M. D. C. and A. M. C. If we sold to a possible fabricator and gave the use of our patents, we could not guarantee that he would not be subject to an infringement suit by M. D. C. or A. M. C. That hurt business. M. D. C. sued us for an infringement.

The suit may have been only a talking point for a low price. A. M. C. had the choice of buying from Dow or paying more by importing from the I. G. or making its own metal. Dow needed a steady quantity purchaser in order to assure disposing of a part of its increased production. It was looking to Ford as the ultimate big buyer. But Ford was not yet in production. The result was a sales contract on June 24, 1933, in which A. M. C. agreed to buy not less than a million and a half pounds during 5 years.

On January 1, 1934, M. D. C. and A. M. C. and Dow settled their patent difficulties by a cross-licensing agreement under which all the then existing and future fabricating patents of M. D. C. were made available to Dow and its customers. Dow and the public thereby benefited by having access to the I. G. fabricating patents then owned by M. D. C. That is borne out by the fact that the number of fabricators which had been only 3 in 1930 rose to 13 in 1936 and kept on steadily rising thereafter. The purchase agreement with American Magnesium Corporation of 1933 expired in 1938 and was renewed on essentially the same terms in that year. All the agreements were canceled in 1942 after magnesium had been taken under allocation by the O. P. M.

Now we come to foreign sales. The first magnesium sale of 5,000 pounds had been made to an exporter in 1928, and this opening wedge produced sales to England and France in 1929 of 114,963 pounds. After a slight lag, the foreign sales jumped in 1933 to 438,974 pounds, about half of which went to England and the remainder to Mexico, Germany, and Russia. The inventory on May 31, 1933, stood at 2,931,427 pounds.

These foreign sales were evidently a matter of concern to the I. G., especially since in 1934 the United States devalued gold and gave to foreign holders of gold or gold exchange a discount of 40 percent on the purchase of American products. This made Dow the cheapest source for foreigners with gold exchange. I. G. concluded a sales contract in the form of a letter from the Dow sales manager to the I. G. manager in New York, dated September 5, 1934, in which the I. G. agreed to buy 350 tons of magnesium in 1934, and also 50 tons a month through 1935 at a price which, considering the quantity, was a good price for Dow, and, as far as the I. G. was concerned, it offered the opportunity to buy magnesium at probably less than its own cost of production and to resell at a substantial profit to its foreign customers, the largest of which was England. The letter contained this provision:

"Dow agrees to confine its sales in Europe solely to the I. G., with the exception that it reserves the right to sell the British Maxium or its successors not more than 300,000 pounds per annum at a price not lower than the price quoted to I. G. for the same quantities plus an extra charge of not less than 4 cents per pound for I. G.'s larger consumption. Dow further promises to use its best endeavor to keep British Maxium or its successors from reselling magnesium in ingot form and will try to limit its purchases to its own use in fabricating."

Dow has established a relation with British Maxium, but Dow had never sold as much as 200,000 pounds during 1 year in all England, and the sales to the continent had been small and sporadic so the limitations on the sales were apparent rather than real. The price stipulation of 4 cents a pound was approximately the discount which the British concern would have had if it had bought on the devalued dollar that the I. G. was buying on. That was the profit or brokerage which the I. G. hoped to make on its purchase from Dow.

That contract or agreement was for only 2 years and it lifted from Dow an inventory burden that might have been crushing. There were no orders from Germany after 1935, for the small deliveries in 1936 were on orders given in 1935 that could not be filled. From the shipping records, it appears that I. G. acted as a broker, for many of the deliveries were to England and some to Italy. Counting the Dow inventory on December 31, 1933, and the production in 1934 and 1935, Dow sold in those years less than 40 percent of its available magnesium abroad. The Germans in 1934 and 1935, by buying the metal that Americans would not buy, greatly helped Dow to get into larger production and thereby helped the Nation.

Now for the positive. We believed that magnesium was an inevitable metal for airplane construction. We appropriated $650,000 in 1937 to increase our capacity at Midland by 50 percent.

In the Dow expansion program, the goal had been set at 24,000,000 pounds of magnesium a year and 12,000,000 had been fixed as the reasonable quota for Midland. That left 12,000,000 to be produced elsewhere. It is to be remembered that Dow's was not a war program. The opening of the war in Europe had intensified the demand for the Dow metals, but chiefly it had assured Dow that magnesium alloys were coming into their own and that Dow had to be ready to meet the demand.

The Dow search for a new source of magnesium comprehended pretty much all of the mineral deposits. These were viewed solely from the standpoint of the cost of producing metal from the ore. The calculations involved the cost of mining, of power, and of transportation, as well as a consideration of the other products which would be manufactured along with magnesium, in order that the sole dependence would not have to be on the metal.

We had in 1933 successfully completed a plant at Wilmington, N. C., for the extraction of bromine from sea water.

Dow, because of the experience at Wilmington, knew how to handle sea water. The samples of sea water showed that it contained nearly 20 times as much magnesium as bromine, and therefore the job of successfully getting magnesium out of sea water was, on the face of things, simpler than the job that was already being done with bromine. In addition, the sea water offered a broader range of other products than did any of the minerals. The decision was reached that it was cheaper to pump sea water than to mine rock, provided a sea water site could be found that had cheap power and an abundant supply of limestone and salt. The Gulf of Mexico offered several such sites.

After a full survey by outside engineers of all the Gulf sites, Freeport, Tex., was settled upon as the best place to locate the plant. At Freeport there is a strip of land bordered on three sides by the ocean water of Freeport Harbor, with the opportunity to dispose of the waste liquor through a canal to the Brazos River, returning the used sea water to the ocean several miles from the intake. Natural gas insured cheap power in plenty, the oystershells at the bottom of Galveston Bay gave an inexhaustible source of limestone while a salt dome nearby could be piped for all the salt that would ever be required. In addition, sulfur and petroleum were near at hand and transportation was adequate.

The Dow plans—and every detail was worked out by the Dow engineers and chemists—comprehended what would eventually be a complete chemical manufacturing unit using sea water as the major raw material, just as at Midland brine was the major raw material.

The sea water is pumped from Freeport Harbor, at a depth of some 30 feet to avoid the possible dilution by rain water, and is taken through a series of screens. The pumps are capable of delivering 300,000,000 gallons of water a day—which gives an idea of the immensity of the enterprise.

Everything went according to schedule and the first ladle of magnesium was poured on January 21, 1941. We had to go into the market and get new money to build Freeport. We believe that we created a national asset.

It is notable that, with an assured market for magnesium only one private concern in 1940 chose to enter the field, and this concern was only nominally private, for the R. F. C. put up most of the money. They chose an unproven carbon reduction method in preference to the proven Dow method and started off with the promise of 24,000,000 pounds of metal a year—and later doubled their rated capacity. They actually produced 100,000 pounds in 1941 and 2,400,000 pounds in 1942.

I telephoned to Washington in February 1941, suggesting that provision be made for 100,000,000 pounds a year, and offered to increase the Dow facilities, with its own money, to produce that amount, provided the Government would take the full output. The offer was not accepted.

The official estimates began to rise. But they were only guesses. The best guess was 48,000,000 pounds required, but 100,000,000 pounds capacity was suggested in order to have a safety margin.

In March 1941, the Defense Plant Corporation, a subsidiary of the R. F. C., asked Dow to add an 18,000,000-pound addition for their account at Freeport on a rental basis which has worked out so far to about 5 cents a pound. This addition started production in November and was in full production the following January.

In the same month, the O. P. M. reconsidered magnesium because the British had just awakened them in a big way to the need for magnesium for incendiary bombs. The O. P. M. assigned 200 tons of magnesium for the British from Dow.

In June 1941, the O. P. M. went all out with a program to increase production to 400,000,000 pounds. This was later expanded to 600,000,000.

At the same time, the Government requested Dow to make available its know-how to any responsible company financed by the Defense Plant Corporation. Dow agreed.

But, with money and markets assured, only two groups took advantage of the opportunity. One located at Painesville, Ohio, with a rated capacity of 36,000,000 pounds, and the other at Austin, Tex., with a rated capacity of 24,000,000 pounds.

In October 1941, the Defense Plant Corporation asked Dow to construct for them a 72,000,000-pound sea-water plant at Velasco, near Freeport. The management and operating fee was fixed at one-half a cent a pound. This plant started production in June 1942 and was in full production 5 months later.

In March 1942 the Government asked Dow to find 72,000,000 more pounds of production away from a seacoast. Dow selected Ludington, Mich., as rich in magnesium-bearing brine and went through with the erecting and operating of a plant on the same terms as at Velasco. Because of a shortage of materials, a power plant as planned could not be erected at Ludington and the cells had to be located at Marysville, across the State, where power could be bought from Detroit. The Marysville plant began operating in April 1943 and the Ludington plant in June.

Ten concerns in all—other than Dow—contracted with the Defense Plant Corporation to build and operate magnesium plants for the account of the Government. Of those, only the two mentioned above benefited by the Dow experience. The others followed techniques other than Dow's. We were working day and night to increase the supply of magnesium.

But another branch of the Government, not charged with any service of supply, forced itself into the picture. The Department of Justice took upon itself the relieving of a shortage—which the O. P. M. officially said did not exist—by trying to put into jail the only group of men who were providing the means for more production.

From August 1940 until January 1941 the Department of Justice presented evidence to a Federal grand jury in New York City. On January 30, 1941, just 9 days after the great Freeport plant went into operation, the grand jury brought in its findings and an indictment was obtained charging Willard H. Dow, president; Earl W. Bennett, vice president and treasurer; the Dow Chemical Co.; the Aluminum Co. of America; the American Magnesium Corporation; the Magnesium Development Corporation, and certain of their officers with conspiracy.

In a press release, the Department of Justive gave these five reasons for its action:

"1. The existence of inadequate facilities for producing magnesium.

"2. That an alleged conspiracy between the American companies and the German firm had 'restricted, restrained, and discouraged' development and use of magnesium in airplane manufacture.

"3. A serious shortage of foundry facilities for fabricating magnesium products that has 'seriously impeded and delayed' aircraft production.

"4. 'The price of magnesium in the United States has been maintained at artificially, unreasonably high levels' in contrast to prices abroad.

"5. The alleged conspiracy had resulted in maintaining a single producer in the United States."

The fact is that there was never a real—as opposed to simply a theoretical—shortage of magnesium up to the time of filing the indictment against Dow by the Government. Every requirement was met by Dow in 1940. Every requirement was met by Dow in 1941. These were all met out of resources provided by Dow. Since then there have been no real shortages except as the actual supply is compared with the rated capacity, and that has been due to the failure of other Government-owned plants. Dow has operated at better than full rated capacity and has done the job assigned by the Government.

On October 15, 1941, I telephoned from Midland to Thurman Arnold in Washington. This is the substance of the conversation taken down at the time:

"Dr. Dow stated that he was disturbed over the fact that on next Tuesday, October 21, the Department is going to set the case down for trial next April unless all parties indicate their willingness to enter into a plea of nolo contendere assuming that a satisfactory decree and fines would be worked out. Dow said that it was impossible for the Dow Co. to make magnesium and at the same time defend an antitrust suit. Arnold said it is necessary to do both and that the Department could not nolle pros our case on the above grounds. Dow asked for an adjournment of our case until after the emergency. Arnold said that this could not be done. He said that if they did it for the Dow case, he would have to postpone all of the cases until after the emergency. Dow said why shouldn't they do this. Arnold suggested that his advice was for one individual to plead and no doubt satisfactory fines could be worked out at a later date."

The Department of Justice, in effect, said that the defendants had prevented the United States from having a fully supply of magnesium and that the best way to get more magnesium was to take the chief supplier out of his factories and put him in court.

Dow was given the choice of serving its Nation or serving itself. Dow chose, on April 15, 1942, to plead nolo contendere.

At the same time, it was agreed that an equity suit might be filed by the Government, reciting much the same charges as in the criminal action, and the defendants would consent to a decree.

No facts in the case were ever established by legal process. The defendants gave their consents on the understanding that the compromises were of convenience so that they might get on with their work.

I submit to you gentlemen, that the Dow Chemical Co. has been unfairly treated and that it has served the Nation and that deliberately inaccurate and malicious publicity has been and is being used to hurt the public interest. And in support of this contention I submit these facts:

The magnesium program of the Government, and consequently the service of supply to the Allies, was made possible by the foresight of the Dow Chemical Co. in having ready the facilities for production when and as the materials were needed.

In 1942 the critical year in magnesium production, Dow produced 84.2 percent of all the magnesium output in the country and the Dow know-how produced 91.2 percent.

The alloying and fabrication program of the Government, and consequently the use of the metal in airplane building, was made possible only because of the independent research and developments, through the years, of the Dow Chemical Co. and the American Magnesium Corporation and their cross-licensing of patents. Here are the facts for the year 1943:

Dow operated its own plants at Midland and at Freeport, as well as a Government addition to its own Freeport plant. A Dow wholly owned subsidiary operated for the account of the Government, the Government plants at Velasco, Tex., and Ludington-Marysville, Mich. Dow disclosed its process to the Diamond Magnesium Co. and the International Minerals and Chemical Corporation and, exactly as though they were Dow subsidiaries, followed through with its know-how as consultant, adviser, and engineer.

The rated annual capacity of all the magnesium metal plants in the country was 580,000,000 pounds.

The Dow group had 44 percent of this rated capacity, and yet during 1943 they produced 60 percent of all magnesium made.

The Dow group produced at 87 percent of its rated capacity (others 46 percent). Taking out Ludington-Marysville, which began production in June and April 1943, respectively—the Dow group operated at 107 percent capacity.

On the assumption that the Government has spent $400,000,000 on its magnesium program and that the Dow group had $150,000,000 of the total sum, the Dow group had 38 percent of the money spent. On this basis:

The Government has an investment of 80 cents for every pound of magnesium produced in 1943 by the Dow group.

The Government has an investment of $1.67 for every pound of magnesium produced in 1943 by the others.

The Government received 1.2 pounds of magnesium in 1943 for every dollar invested with the Dow group.

The Government received only half as much (0.6 pound) in 1943 for every dollar invested with the others.

Senate of Puerto Rico Opposes Diversion of Tax on Rum to Treasury of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herewith a copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate of Puerto Rico unanimously on March 3, 1944. This resolution supports the position I have already taken on the floor of this House and reflects the desire of the overwhelming majority of the people of Puerto Rico to retain their right to control tax funds collected in Puerto Rico:

Whereas there is pending in the Congress in Washington, legislation to deprive Puerto Rico of the taxes collected on the sale of Puerto Rican rum in the United States;

Whereas for more than 40 years the people of Puerto Rico have enjoyed the right to use and dispose of these taxes in accordance with the laws of its legislature;

Whereas the increase in these taxes is practically the only favorable factor caused in Puerto Rico by the war, in the midst of the many sufferings which the war has caused our people and which our people are bearing in a spirit of sacrifice and comprehension in defense of the great democratic principles: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Puerto Rico: To express to the Congress of the United States its respectful and firm opposition to having the people of Puerto Rico deprived of the right, which it has enjoyed for more than 40 years, to dispose of those taxes through the legislature and for such purposes as the legislature, in representation of the people, believes of the greatest utility and benefit to Puerto Ricans.

Evolution of the Federal System of Mexico—Address Delivered by Sr. Lic. Carlos Sanchez Mejorada, President of the Inter-American Bar Association, Before a Special Meeting of the Federal Bar Association, Monday, January 31, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from an address delivered by Sr. Lic. Carlos Sanchez Mejorada, president of the Inter-American Bar Association, at a meeting of the Federal Bar Association.

Sr. Mejorada, one of the most eminent lawyers of the Americas, has incorporated in this address not only expression of fine sentiments with reference to the members of our bar, our Government, and our people.

He gives us a most interesting statement with reference to the evolution of the Mexican Government, interesting not only to the lawyers of the United States but of interest to our people generally. The Inter-American Bar Association has a great opportunity to render a unifying service to the peoples of this hemisphere. With devotion and intelligent effort that opportunity is being taken advantage of.

Madam President and members of the Federal Bar Association, ladies, and gentlemen: * * * You have heard from the three distinguished orators who have preceded me tonight the very same ideas which I expressed to you last Friday and which may be summed up by saying that there is no better way of dispelling the mistrust and misunderstanding that so easily arise between peoples of different countries than by personal contact which is therefore the natural way of promoting friendship between them. * * *

In expressing to you this feeling of friendship and common purpose, I am simply reflecting the attitude of my country toward international relations (an attitude shown not merely by words but by public actions) which has been expressed so brilliantly by our Ambassador here, Dr. Francisco Castillo Najera.

* * * * *

Since the object of my address is to acquaint you with some of the aspects of our life, in view of the special interest that you have, I thought that you, members of the Federal Bar Association, would like to have some idea of the evolution of the federal form of government in Mexico and its present set-up.

The first question that may come to your mind is: How does it happen that Mexico should be a federal republic? In the United States, you may rightly say, the federal form of government was a conditio sine qua non of its very existence, since the Thirteen Original Colonies were in reality different countries, with different peoples, different origins, and different laws, that agreed to sacrifice only that part of their own rights which was required to form a nation and to carry out the purposes of the War of the Revolution. But why should Mexico, which was, from the time of the Conquest, a single unified nation, under the centralized authority of the King of Spain, represented by the Viceroy, and which, at the time of the independence, had a tradition of three centuries of a central form of government, adopt a federal system? I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, that this very question—whether Mexico should adopt a federal system or a centralized form of government—was the pivot around which revolved our civil wars during the first half century of our national life. Our first National Constitution of 1824—adopted 3 years after the winning of our independence, perhaps more from a spirit of imitation of the United States than a desire to satisfy any real and pressing need of our people—adopted the federal system which was supported by the liberal party in opposition to the conservatives and traditionalists, who advocated a central government. In that struggle, the liberal party was the final victor and, after several successes and defeats, including the final fight against the French intervention of Napoleon the Third and the Empire of Maximilian of Hapsburg, the Federal Constitution of 1857, which was promulgated by the liberal party before this French intervention, prevailed and continued in force until February 5, 1917, when our present Constitution was adopted, introducing many important innovations in our legal, economic, and social structure, but maintaining our federal system of government.

The Laws of the Indies were issued after the conquest by the Spanish kings for the governing of their new Indian subjects, giving these subjects a certain amount of local autonomy whereby each Indian village was really a miniature Indian republic in which the people elected their own leaders and preserved many of their customs and habits, some of which, although not legally recognized, have survived even to this day.

In these geographical, political, and social conditions may be found the origin of the tendency toward a Federal system of government. After the terrible shake-up of our wars of independence, and the state of anarchy which followed, the local interests, the quasi feudal chiefs and "caudillos," preferred the Federal form of government which interfered less with their local power and ambitions. Finally, the Federal form of government, which was sponsored by the victorious liberal party, was permanently established in Mexico.

When the Federal system of government, as originally established, was actually put to the test, it was not very successful. Each state began to pass laws on every conceivable matter and to enter into rivalry with other states in trying to collect the highest taxes, being concerned, not with the general national good but only with local interests. Each state had its own customs taxes which constituted a terrific obstacle to the development of interstate trade. With the advent of peace, the presidents of the republic became stronger and as a result there evolved a process of constitutional amendment giving more and more power to the Federal Government and removing whole branches of economic, social, and legal activities from the control of the states—a method that continues up to the present day and which in my opinion probably will continue for the good of the country. At the present time the following matters, among others, are under Federal jurisdiction: immigration and naturalization statistics, religions and cults, archaeological and artistic monuments, national waters, mineral resources, patents and trade-marks, copyright, labor, hunting and fishing, all types of interstate or international communications and transportation, banking, trusts, insurance negotiable instruments and all commercial practices and contracts, electrical utilities, the motion-picture industry, and many types of taxes. The states cannot legislate on all taxes, nor have they the power to enforce them except in certain cases when they act as auxiliaries of the Federal Government or are permittted by law to do so. There are other matters, such as health and education, on which both the Federal and State Governments can act.

With so many duties and powers, the Federal Government has grown enormously. The judicial branch is very much like your own: the Supreme Court of Justice of Mexico at the top, with 20 justices who each year elect the president of the court, the counterpart of your Chief Justice. The Supreme Court works generally in 4 chambers of 5 justices each (1 for penal legislation, 1 for administrative legislation, 1 for civil and commercial legislation, and the fourth for labor legislation). Next are the district judges and the circuit courts. The latter are, in all matters, except in our peculiar "amparo" institution, courts of appeal from the district judges. The Procurador General de la República is similar to your Attorney General and is the legal adviser of the President and the head of the large body of prosecuting attorneys and of the Federal judicial police.

The administrative or executive branch has developed a large and complicated machinery. In the first place we have, as you do, the different secretariats of state, which in Spanish are called secretarias: de Gobernación, somewhat comparable to your Department of the Interior; de Relaciones Exteriores, comparable to your State Department; de Hacienda, comparable to your Department of the Treasury; de la Economía Nacional, which handles all matters relating to commerce, statistics, electricity, mines, oil, patents, and trade-marks, etc.; de Comunicaciones y Obras Públicas, which deals with all matters referring to telegraphs, telephones, radio, railways, air transportation, highways, etc.; de Agricultura, which is much like your Department of Agriculture, but also includes all the large and small irrigation projects; de Salubridad y Asistencia, handling all matters of public health and of welfare institutions; de Educación Pública, which promotes the general advancement of culture and education throughout the country and administers the Federal schools; del Trabajo y de la Previsión Social, similar to your Department of Labor. There are, besides, the Secretariat of the National Defense, similar to your War Department, and the Secretaría de Marina which has to do, not only with the Navy and the merchant marine, but with fishing in both the inland waters and the seas. Then there are also the Agrarian Department, a big affair which distributes the lands or "ejidos" to the rural villages and supervises the activities of these "ejidos"; and the Department of the Federal District, comparable to your District of Columbia, but with the difference that the inhabitants of the Federal District like those of the States elect Representatives and Senators to the National Congress.

The Peninsula of Lower California is divided into two territories governed by officials designated by the President of the Republic. Naturally, all of these secretariats and departments of the Federal Government have a complete organization extending throughout the country.

Besides these constitutional agencies we have what, in our administrative law phraseology, we call decentralized institutions. These are agencies of the Federal Government, but are not handled in the regular way, having an autonomous management similar, in certain respects, to that of a private concern. The purpose of such agencies is to provide a more flexible and commercial method of management of certain matters. Of these agencies, the two most remarkable examples—though there are today so many that I could enumerate them indefinitely—are the Petróleos Mexicanos or Petromex, which handles the entire Mexican oil industry, and the National Railways of Mexico, now operated by the workers themselves. Both of these are purely Government properties.

Further, we have what we call corporations or institutions of mixed economy, which are incorporated under the law of joint stock corporations. The Government owns 51 percent or more of the whole stock, the remaining portion being owned by private concerns or individuals. The Government generally appoints the manager and the majority of the directors. Of these, the outstanding example is the Bank of Mexico, though there are many others, also very important.

Finally, there are quite a number of different agencies, some of which were in existence before the war but most of which were formed due to the requirements and necessities of the war, which are made up of officials of various secretariats of state or other Government departments. They are: The Intersecretarial Board, handling the property of enemy aliens; the Rubber Commission, which allocates the very small available supply of rubber; the National Committee of Economy, formed by the Secretaries of Finance, Economy, and Agriculture, and so on.

The machinery of government is now so large and the laws and regulations so numerous that there is a tendency to codify and coordinate, in a single, comprehensive law, all provisions relating to a certain branch or to related branches of an activity. For example, we now have the Law of General Ways of Communication (Ley de Vías Generales de Communicación) which includes all the legal provisions relating to communication and transportation, the procedural rules and methods and the penalties for infractions; the National Electric Code which includes all provisions relating to the Electric Industry; the Fiscal Code, which sets up a uniform procedure and the general principles applicable to every kind of taxation, etc.

As to the judicial machinery, aside from the judicial branch of the government to which I referred above, we have a fiscal court, empowered to decide all controverted legal matters between the public and the government. This court, notwithstanding the fact that it is an administrative agency and its members are appointed by the secretary of finance, has been very satisfactory and can be favorably compared with a real court because of the open-mindedness and integrity of its components.

You might wonder, on contemplating this new growth of government agencies, whether they are mere excrescences that will disappear later, like those found on certain trees, or whether we are developing a new system of government not provided for in our constitution nor foreseen by its framers. We are worried by the increasing restrictions which these developments have imposed upon individual freedom, and particularly are we worried by the possibility of their continuance after the war is over. However, we must all recognize that law is an aspect of life itself and, therefore, is a changing, living thing. It is up to us lawyers, instead of merely becoming alarmed, to see to it that the new institutions, required by the new conditions and ways of living, develop without destroying individual liberty.

The National Legionnaire on Oil as a National Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed to be able to include with my remarks the following portion of the Capitol Comment column appearing in the National Legionnaire, official organ of the American Legion, for March 1944:

Secretary Ickes having announced a plan for the United States of America to build a pipe line to carry oil from fields in Iran and Iraq to the Mediterranean seacoast, at a cost of upward of $150,000,000, Representative JERRY VOORHIS, of California, delivered a carefully prepared speech in Congress declaring this to be a plan to aid a group of large American oil companies, and asserting that dollar-a-year men in the Government service had negotiated the deal. These Federal aides happened to be high officials of the oil companies who own the oil which the pipe line would carry. Mr. VOORHIS pointed out that while ostensibly a war measure, the pipe line would probably not be finished until after the war. He asserted that the oil companies refused to give to our Government any oil carried by the pipe line, although they propose to pay for the pipe line itself over a period of 25 years, from the proceeds of the sale of the oil it would carry. Mr. VOORHIS implied the whole deal is a benevolent gesture to the big oil companies in their postwar battle for sources and markets. Mr. Ickes had indicated it was a step in protecting American oil resources by opening up near eastern fields under American control.

This proposal, like the arguments about opening up Alaskan and Canadian oil production and the selection of places to be prospected in the far North, involves a major question of wealth and power in the post-war world. If we are to have oil developed by American companies in far lands, we must be prepared to defend those developments against the world. Britain lost much of her oil and other resources to the Japs in Burma and elsewhere. The Netherlands lost all of her oil and tin and rubber to the Japs when the East Indies fell to them. We lost what we had in the Philippines because we were unprepared to defend it. If we are to be a world economic power, we must remain the top world military power.

Whether the great oil companies, as indicated in the Elk Hills transaction last year, have controlled the Federal policy on oil through dollar-a-year men and lobbyists is something Congress suspects but does not fully understand. Mr. VOORHIS threw a lot of thought material into the congressional hopper.

Politics Is the Science of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, Sophocles once said that "to cast away a virtuous friend I call as bad as to cast away one's own life which one loves best." In Vermont vernacular, "Them's my sentiments!"

So, for what it may be worth, I say Wendell Willkie is my friend.

There are still some things in this world worth more than money or political aggrandizement.

A friendship established in or out of controversy and an intimate association with an individual over long months grows into an appreciation of the worth and value of a man as one to another.

Wendell Willkie stands high in the album of men I have met and known closely and intimately. To be brief, I am and always have been his friend, well knowing his great qualifications for leadership, appreciating but not minimizing his almost fanatical love of his country, such as he hopes to make it and is trying to make it while he preserves its fundamentals against those whose greed for personal political power is set and measured by the dollars they can contribute to that result and to defeat him. The people should know the truth.

God help him, for those who differ from him will not.

The people should be aroused to save themselves and help him to do it, for this is a crusade and not a petty partisan, political campaign. The historical writings of days to come will corroborate me.

The people today should cooperate.

If there ever were a time and a place and an occasion when the people of America should be heard for themselves, it is now. They should assist themselves by asserting themselves now, or forever hereafter, as serfs and slaves to a centralized, regimented, and totalitarian government, they should hold their peace. They have in Wendell Willkie a leader whom to ignore is to travel down the road to fascism.

It is not a question as between candidates, but among men, and principles; and as between those who have the courage to try to lead us out of our dilemma and those who wish for political preferment.

I do not have to stick my neck out, but as one citizen to another, let me dare to say to you now, once and for all, that at Madison, Wis., my friend Wendell Willkie made a speech which is and will be historic, campaign or no campaign.

Dogs will always bark at the moon. Those who are undertaking to serve selfish ends; those who put power in politics above patriotism; those who seek to save to themselves the control of a party against the future of the people, will not agree that it was a great speech. Those who will not take advice as against a situation they contributed to establish; those so jealous of petty political predominance in party circles as not to realize that their sun of dominance has set; all of these, and others I might name, might well seriously consider the fact that the people are satisfied that Wendell Willkie is no politician, but a patriot.

As a patriot he made a speech at Madison, Wis., which should have had national advertising but could not. You answer why. That it will eventually reach the people, I sincerely hope.

There is too much selfish politics and too little recognition of the situation which confronts the people to suit me.

It was a great speech. It was 100-percent American. So is the man who made it. He may be unschooled in cheap political tricks. He is nevertheless fearless. He has not told the people anything they should not know, though as a candidate he might well have refrained therefrom if he were only looking for votes.

He is courageous, far thinking, a leader, and careless as to what his forthright, honest statements may mean to him personally.

I am for him and the cause for which he stands. So, under permission heretofore granted, I submit the following article for the RECORD:

WASHINGTON CALLING

(By Marquis Childs)

POLITICS ON A HIGH LEVEL

MADISON, WIS.—Long after the present primary campaign is over, the speech that Wendell Willkie made here will be remembered. It may well become one of the vital documents in our political history. In a moment of bitterness and dissension, of cynicism and indifference, Willkie has with simple clarity defined the dilemma of the Republican Party. And more than that, he has defined the political crisis of our time.

If this sounds solemn, I mean it to sound solemn. No matter what his past mistakes, his blunders, his inconsistencies, regardless of all political mud-slinging, I believe history will record that he stood up and spoke the plain truth as no one else had spoken it.

As Willkie said, there are striking parallels with that era of 90 years ago when a little group of determined men met in Ripon to express their profound convictions through the medium of a new political party. One party, the Whig Party, was dying in bankruptcy; another, the Republican, was about to be born.

What may be at stake here in this delegate election is more than the future of Wendell Willkie, the individual. It may be a decisive turning point for the G. O. P. If Willkie is defeated, there will be strenuous efforts to make it seem that this is a repudiation of the things he stands for—true international cooperation, the necessary minimum of Government regulation to make a free enterprise system free. The successful Republican nominee—and it will not be Willkie if he loses the April 4 primary in Wisconsin—would be under constant pressure to pull back from any vital commitments.

The theme of Willkie's Ripon talk was that a political party, to survive, must stand up and speak out on the big questions of the day. Dodging, hedging, evasion will end in bankruptcy.

"A political party," said Willkie, "can never stand still * * *. Those leaders of a party who insist on applying old formulas to present problems merely because those formulas worked in the past are damaging the party and will eventually destroy it. For they are standing still, whereas the world around them moves."

In this, of course, was practical politics. It was aimed at Governor Dewey for his silence, his failure to declare himself on the Presidential race. The contest here is essentially between Dewey and Willkie, with possibility that some scattering delegates may go to General MacArthur and Governor Stassen, both of whom are on duty in the Pacific. But it was politics on a high level.

Of two rebellions within the Republican Party, Willkie spoke with implied approval. One was that of the "liberal Republicans" who rose in protest against the corruption of the Grant administration in 1872. The other was the Bull Moose revolt of Teddy Roosevelt.

Willkie may have been hinting that it was time to start another rebellion within the G. O. P. There have been intimations that he would start a third party. It is known that he investigated thoroughly the machinery for getting a third party ticket on the ballot.

But this year there isn't a chance. State laws have been deliberately drafted to make any third-party attempt all but impossible. Even the Socialists, who are veterans at the third-party game, will have difficulty this fall getting on the ballots of States with enough electoral votes to add up to a majority.

That is why it is all the more important for the two parties to give vigorous expression to the issues that touch the lives of every one of us. Otherwise we end in a blind alley of cynicism and frustration, and the marker pointing in that direction says fascism.

I don't know whether Willkie will bolt his party if the nominee is a cautious trimmer cut to get the votes of every possible group by saying as little as possible. I don't think he knows. At this point it isn't important.

It is important that he has spoken with simple forthrightness of the problem of our day. Read that Ripon speech. Our grandchildren may be reading it in history books 50 years from now.

Secretary Hull and His Critics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, critics of Secretary of State Hull and his foreign policy are more numerous and more critical than they would be if this were not election year. Unfortunately, some people's judgment is influenced by political considerations, and many of the critics have been unjust, and upon reflection their charges have been without foundation.

Secretary Hull's recent statement outlining our foreign policy and containing 17 points, should satisfy all reasonable Americans, and it is a disservice to try to cause the American people to lose faith in their Government at this time.

Mark Sullivan, the well-known commentator, could never be charged with being partisan or prejudiced in favor of the present Democratic administration, but he is always fair in his diagnoses and conclusions. His article in Sunday's papers entitled, "Mr. Hull and His Critics" is worthy of reproduction and is submitted herewith. I call special attention to the concluding paragraph, wherein he states that critics of Mr. Hull must bear in mind that he is acting in coordination with our military authorities and President Roosevelt, and has better facilities for determining the wiser course than have his critics:

MR. HULL AND HIS CRITICS

(By Mark Sullivan)

FOUR FUNDAMENTALS

Secretary of State Cordell Hull's conduct of foreign relations is assailed by critics. The criticisms have to do with many different actions and policies—our attitude toward Russia, toward Britain; about Poland, about Italy, France, Yugoslavia, Finland, Palestine, India. In nearly all cases, the questions involved are intricate and, as respects the average citizen, remote. Some of the questions are understood by not more than a very few Americans—including individuals and leaders of groups who have a special interest, and also earnest and disinterested students and the like.

In the din over these questions the average citizen is confused. Yet he feels instinctively—and correctly—that the way these questions are settled, the courses our Government takes, will deeply affect the fate of himself, his children, and the country. For some enlightenment of the puzzled citizen, there is here attempted, so far as space permits, a statement of some fundamentals of Mr. Hull's policies, as this column sees them.

1. Mr. Hull, in the spirit of first things first, believes in winning the war. To each question that arises, he seems to apply that test—would a given course help toward victory, or postpone victory; and would it bring victory with the least loss of American life? Among many examples, Mr. Hull for over 2 years, backed up by President Roosevelt, followed a policy of not breaking diplomatic relations with the Vichy government of France. Against this course, critics raged. They urged, among other actions, that we seize by force the French island of Martinique in the West Indies. In the end, we got Martinique without loss of life—enabling President Roosevelt to say with justifiable exultation, that we got it as a gift, as a "base on balls."

2. Absolutely essential to winning the war is the preservation of unity with our great military allies. Some actions of Russia disturb us. In handling such matters, the first requisite is to give Russia no occasion for any course other than to remain in unity with us until the war is won.

3. Toward countries and peoples conquered by Germany and about to be liberated by us Mr. Hull has a definite attitude. To such countries as Austria he has said in effect, "Help earn your freedom by fighting for it; help us win the war." Implied in this attitude is that such countries should avoid internal strife over ideologies or factional issues until their freedom is won.

4. The policy of first win the war cannot, of course, stand alone in a watertight compartment with all questions of future policy and ideology in other watertight compartments. Here arises a border line of extreme difficulty, and it is in this border line that most of the criticisms arise. Some actions taken now, or other actions not taken, or failure to protest actions by our allies, while useful in winning the war, may embarrass us later when we come to the expected postwar effort to set up an international organization for preserving peace and other forms of cooperation. The embarrassment bears heavily on Mr. Hull, for creation of such international organization is fundamental in his policies.

5. Many critics of Mr. Hull are as sincere as he. Conceivably some may be as wise or even more farseeing. But some, at least, are passionately partisan on special points. Many of the criticisms have a common quality. They have to do with the internal affairs of European countries, the kind of government to be set up in a given country after the war. Some critics wish a certain group to head France after the war, and to that end wish our Government to recognize that group now, discriminating against other groups. Other critics have the same attitude with respect to Italy and other countries. Some such critics in their zeal go so far as to urge courses in the interest of European factions or ideologies which might handicap our winning the war or prolong the war.

In deciding between such criticisms and the course of Mr. Hull it is to be borne in mind that Mr. Hull, acting in coordination with our military authorities and with President Roosevelt, has the better facilities for determining the wiser courses.

Fulbright Selection Lauded

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to read of the announcement made by Secretary of State Cordell Hull on Saturday that our honorable colleague, WILLIAM J. FULBRIGHT, had been selected to head a delegation of five leading educators and public men to a meeting of the United Nations Council on Education, which will be held shortly in London.

In the prevention of future wars the education of the other nations of the world is a matter of paramount importance. One reason we are a peace-loving people is that we have always been taught that peace is honorable and we have always sought peaceful means of settling disputes. One reason for the rise of the spirit of tyranny and aggression in Germany and Japan is that the children of those nations have been taught that war is honorable and that all personal freedom should be subjugated to the rise of the state.

It is a great compliment to our colleague, BILL FULBRIGHT, and to the Congress of the United States, that he was selected by Mr. Hull to head our delegates to this important meeting. He is not only a competent Representative, but he can bring back to the Congress the facts of the plans that may be agreed upon and he can interpret to the Congress the necessity of any congressional action that may be indicated.

For some time there has been the feeling in Congress, especially since the Food Conference at Hot Springs, that the House of Representatives should participate in the formulation of our policies regarding foreign affairs. By bitter experience we have learned that in order for the commitments of our Executive to be effective, they must have the support of the Congress.

I think the selection of Congressman FULBRIGHT to head the delegation from the United States to the conference of the United Nations on education is a fine move on the part of the State Department. His presence in this position will provide that link between Congress and the State Department which has often been missing. By his training and experience, Congressman FULBRIGHT is especially well qualified for this duty. His experience in business assures us that whatever the interests of this Nation may be, they will be protected and no unrealistic commitments made. Further, his experience in education is an assurance of an understanding of the problems involved. His activities in this House since he has been here are ample proof of his unusual ability to grasp and understand these great problems which are fundamental in building for peace.

It is obvious that the function of education in the process of creating a better world is not one that can come to fruition within a short time. We may not be able to notice in our lifetime the effects of sound policies. Nevertheless, we cannot deny that, unless sensible programs of education for the people are adopted, there is no hope for that understanding and discrimination which is indispensable to a democratic society.

The Nation's War Emergency Pipe Lines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. BUELL SNYDER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, immediately after the Japs attacked Pearl Harbor we were confronted with many huge problems. One was transportation of all commodities, and especially the transportation of oil of all kinds from Texas-Oklahoma area to the eastern seaboard. This problem became more critical when the Germans started sinking our tankers on the Atlantic and Gulf coast. The solution was to build pipe lines from Texas to the eastern coast. The biggest pipe-line construction in the world was undertaken almost immediately and completed ahead of schedule. The Nation owes a debt of gratitude to the Administration—to Mr. Ickes—his loyal and efficient group of assistants, such as Mr. W. Alton Jones, president, War Emergency Pipe Lines, Inc., and Mr. George A. Wilson, Director of Supply and Transportation, Petroleum Administration for War, and, above all, to industry as a whole and to labor. They did a big war job in record-breaking time—in time to keep the people of the eastern seaboard from being chilly and also to furnish ample supplies across the seas for our fighting forces.

More than a thousand interested people gathered at pumping station No. 22, just outside of Rockwood, Pa., to witness the dedicating and christening exercises of these war emergency pipe lines.

The master of ceremonies was Hon. Charles F. Uhl, United States attorney for western Pennsylvania. Addresses by Mr. W. Alton Jones, President, War Emergency Pipelines, Inc., and Mr. George A. Wilson, Director of Supply and Transportation, Petroleum Administration for War, and Dr. Paul Stewart, president of Waynesburg College.

The christening of these pipe lines was of extraordinary interest not only to those who gathered there, but to the reading public throughout the Nation. The 24-inch War Emergency Pipeline was christened by Mrs. J. Buell Snyder, wife of Congressman SNYDER, by pouring into the machinery of the pump station a can of oil taken from General Doolittle's bomber which bombed Tokyo on April 18, 1942.

The 20-inch War Emergency Pipeline was christened by Mrs. Stanley W. Calkins, of Uniontown, Pa., by using a bottle of gasoline taken from a United States Liberator that helped to bomb Berlin on March 7, 1944.

The program was enriched by music furnished by the Rockwood High School band and the Somerset High School band and at Pumping Station No. 21, where an inspection was held later in the day, the North Union Township High School band welcomed the official party.

At each of these pumping stations there were flag-raising exercises. At Rockwood, Pa., a high-school girl was selected by her classmates to unfurl a beautiful American flag presented to the high school by Congressman SNYDER and at Pumping Station No. 21, a high-school boy was selected by the North Union Township High School to unfurl the same type of American flag, which was presented by the Connellsville Order of Elks, Connellsville, Pa.

Following is the address I delivered that day:

We are standing here beside two of the greatest oil arteries on earth—the Big Inch and Little Big Inch pipe lines—271 miles from the end of their 1,400-mile journey where they are steadily delivering fuel for the war program of the United Nations and for essential civilian uses.

I shudder to think how serious the petroleum situation would have been today, if the 24-inch and 20-inch pipe lines were not in operation.

I well recall that 6 months before Pearl Harbor, Petroleum Administrator for War Harold L. Ickes presented his plans for the immediate construction of a pipe line extending from the mid-continent Texas fields to the Atlantic seaboard. The petroleum industry was prepared to proceed. However, there were those who believed that a pipe line was unnecessary—tankers carried 95 percent of the east coast oil requirements, they said.

But Petroleum Administrator Ickes pointed out that many tankers were being diverted from the Gulf coast-east coast to run to trans-Atlantic service for the British. He also reminded the public that, in event of war, our tankers would be subjected to submarine attacks. He reminded anyone who would listen that "you can't sink a pipe line." The problem was approached on the assumption that it would be wiser to develop as quickly and expeditiously as possible, an overland transportation system that would insure continued delivery of petroleum to the east coast.

It was not until 6 months after the terrible catastrophe at Pearl Harbor that Mr. Ickes was given authority to construct these pipe lines. Justification was then obvious to everyone, because tanker after tanker was being torpedoed—tankers could no longer freely and safely ply the coastal waters from the Gulf of Mexico to the east coast.

In a letter to me, Secretary Ickes said, "Knowing, as you do, the indispensability of oil in this war, you will appreciate our interest in doing whatever gives greatest assurance that it will be moved where it is needed, in the quantities that are needed, at the time when it is needed—and with the least drain upon other essential phases of the war program. We dare not take a chance on anything short of this. I am aware that there have been sharply divergent estimates as to the length of time that would be required to construct the proposed trans-Florida canal. General Reybold, has, I believe, estimated that it would take approximately 3 years. This time element, alone, I should think sufficient to decide the issue. However, regardless of the time for construction, from a petroleum transportation standpoint, the canal would be ruled out on the basis of efficiency in the use of materials and manpower for pipe lines. Very careful calculations have indicated that barges and tugboats would use steel for the delivery of oil with only about 55 percent of the efficiency of a large pipe line.

"As to the manpower situation, I may point out that the present construction program for inland waterway expansion—which consists of 21 2,000-horsepower steam-driven towboats and 100 600-horsepower Diesel-driven tugboats—will require a total crew personnel of approximately 1,400. Of this number approximately 500 must be trained pilots and engineers. Indeed, it is feared that serious difficulty may be experienced in recruiting and training sufficient competent personnel to insure the successful operation of this program. The hazards involved, especially in the inland waterway transportation of inflammable and combustible products, make it imperative that at least the pilots and engineers engaged in such transportation possess a high degree of skill as well as considerable experience. Even the unskilled crew personnel must be thoroughly schooled in the basic fundamentals of this specialized and essential trade. On the basis of a movement of approximately 100,000 barrels daily of clean products in steel barges from Houston to Trenton, a crew personnel of approximately 3,000 would be required to man tugboats, of whom, 1,200 must be skilled pilots or engineers."

The 24-inch pipe line has now been in operation since February 19, 1943, at which time, oil first started flowing into the Norris City, Ill., terminal and tank cars speeded the crude oil eastward. The first direct deliveries of crude oil by pipe line from the Texas fields to the east coast took place on August 15, 1943, when the first batch of oil flowed into the Philadelphia terminal of the line. As shipments were increased more and more, the Big Inch soon reached its scheduled capacity of 300,000 barrels a day. Actually the line has exceeded that figure on many occasions.

The wartime facts of oil are simple and serious. All of the gasoline that we civilians use is derived from crude oil. All of the heating oil and kerosene and lubricants and other petroleum products that we use come from the same source. But that same crude oil must also yield the 100-octane gasoline that is fueling the bombing and fighting planes that are blasting our enemies with ever-increasing intensity. Yes, and the toluene to make the TNT for the bombs they drop. It must produce the 80-octane all-purpose gasoline that propels our tanks and trucks and jeeps and motorized artillery. It must furnish the fuel oil that runs our warships and merchant vessels. I have mentioned only a few of the many, many petroleum products which are required in enormous quantities by the military.

In May 1941 the amount of crude oil and petroleum products being moved overland from the Southwest and Midwest to the east coast was only 60,000 barrels a day. Today, more than 20 times the amount of petroleum is being shipped from the Southwest and Midwest overland to the East as was possible in May 1941. The two pipe lines beside which we now stand play a major role in this remarkable transportation record.

Today one-third of all the gasoline produced in this country is used for strictly military purposes. Another 14 percent is used directly in the production of war matériel, including food. Another 43 percent is used for essential transportation services and for essential driving necessary to get war workers to their jobs and to enable other citizens who have to travel by car to fill their jobs.

This new pipe line, the Little Big Inch, provides an added margin of assurance that the expanding military operations of the United States can continue to be fueled fully and on time. The Defense Plant Corporation, a subsidiary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, financed both pipe-line projects. The lines are being operated for the Government by War Emergency Pipelines, Inc., without fee or profit of any kind.

You may be interested in hearing some facts about the newer Big Inch line. The Little Big Inch is a 20-inch steel tube, 1,475 miles long. Somerset Station is No. 22 of 29 stations, each spaced approximately 50 miles apart. The centrifugal pumps of the stations are driven by huge 1,250-horsepower electric motors. Unlike the Big Inch which moves crude oil to the east coast refineries, the Little Big Inch pipe line moves finished products, such as gasoline and heating oil, to East coast storage, where it is used to help meet military, civilian and industrial requirements. Because of its greater resistance to motion, the heavier heating oil will, at full capacity, move into the east coast at the rate of 180,000 barrels per day, while gasoline, being a lighter petroleum product, will deliver at the rate of 225,000 barrels during each day of capacity operation.

Cost figures are not yet completely compiled on either pipe line. However, preliminary estimates indicate that both pipe lines will pay for themselves through the savings to the Government effected by this means of transportation compared with other overland transportation facilities.

A squealing pig passed through Somerset not long ago—it was in the pipe line—and when caught in a gate valve about a hundred miles east of here, it was necessary to shut down operation and release it. The pig was not the barnyard variety, but a pipe-line mechanical device used to swab out the pipe line. It is propelled by the same pressure force that moves the oil and is used for the same purpose as you would use a swab on the end of a ramrod to clean your gun—pipe liners call them "pigs."

We, here in Somerset and Fayette County, can justifiably take pride in our association with these two huge oil arteries—for these pipe lines are the same by which we can supply our soldiers overseas with more oil—oil with which to fight our battles—win our war—and much sooner bring back our boys—and return the world once more to peace and prosperity.

American Journalism—Two Men and an Ideal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post, Washington, D. C., of March 26, 1944:

AMERICAN JOURNALISM—TWO MEN AND AN IDEAL

"If we can look out tonight upon America, troubled though it is, and find it exercising its liberties, a part of its safety must be attributed, not to its Constitution, its laws and its Government personnel, but to the individual standards of its journalists."

With this tribute to the newspaper profession, Raymond Gram Swing, noted radio commentator, last week accepted the $1,000 du Pont award for exceptional service.

Mr. Swing later turned over the $1,000 to the Raymond Clapper Memorial award, founded to honor the memory of the Washington newspaperman who died recently in a dive-bomber crash during the invasion of the Marshall Islands.

The Clapper award, announced by a group of Mr. Clapper's friends and colleagues, took the form of a gold medal to be given annually to the Washington newspaper writer whose journalistic contributions most closely approximate the outstanding reporting of Mr. Clapper. A plaque by a famous artist will hang in the National Press Club and the name of the winner will be added each year. As the fund grows a cash award will be added.

Mr. Swing's penetrating observations on the standards of American journalists, made when he accepted the du Pont award, follow:

"To some extent, all professions are both highly individual and highly interdependent. Law and medicine, for example, are a composite contribution of innumerable individuals. This is still more true of journalism. The gathering and distribution of news is the work of many myriads of persons, each one of whom must adhere to right standards if the truth of the whole is not to be impaired. Even what may appear as the most individual of all the journalistic functions, the analysis of news, is utterly dependent on professional cooperation.

"No man's judgment is his own, in a creative sense.

"It is a compilation of the judgments of many other individuals who in turn have compiled and adopted and modified the judgments of still more individuals. And what a man thinks becomes his own only in the sense that he accepts responsibility for it.

"That being so, an occasion like this one, is a recognition of the work of a great army of public servants. This army, being unofficial, does not come before the Nation at stated times for approval or disapproval. And it does its work, in the main, not for honor or thanks, but for the happiness of self-expression.

"If we can look out tonight upon America, troubled though it is, and find it exercising its liberties, a part of its safety must be attributed, not to its Constitution, its laws, and its Government personnel, but to the individual standards of its journalists.

"In the war in which the continuation of our free life is at stake, the journalists of this country have gone about their work with the enlarged effort and the increased willingness to sacrifice which the crisis has called for.

"American correspondents have died at the front, many have accepted unspeakable hardships in the line of duty, not suffering for their newspapers or press associations or networks, but in the performance of their work as freemen, finding the service of this freedom being worth any cost whatever, the risk of life included. To them, then, is honor to be paid, as the bright heroes of their profession and of the Nation. They have demonstrated their responsibility.

"They have cared about individualism, personal initiative, and the service of Americanism with quiet, unadvertised devotion, and they are part of the conscience of the rest of us in the profession who will strive to be responsible like them."

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions in the House during the past few months I have urged that the United States come to the aid of Finland to help solve the dilemma in which that country finds itself.

The peace between Finland and Russia should be settled on the basis of the Atlantic Charter and subsequent agreements between our allies. For, if the Soviet Union is permitted to sidestep the basic principles of these agreements in her present dealings with Finland, then the chances of keeping permanent peace by international cooperation will be placed in great jeopardy.

The Washington Times-Herald of March 25 contains a very pertinent statement on this question by former President Herbert Hoover, which is as follows:

HOOVER URGES AMERICANS TO AID FINLAND

NEW YORK, March 24.—Former President Herbert Hoover today called upon the United States to "use our good offices to secure some way out of the impasse for Finland."

Though he "profoundly regretted" Finland's entrance into the Russian war on Germany's side, Hoover warned that "there can be no lasting peace in the world unless such peoples as the Finns are to have their independence and lands restored."

SITUATION DIFFICULT

Declaring that Finland's purpose in joining the German war effort "was not to spread nazi-ism but to preserve the liberty and democracy of the Finnish people," Hoover continued.

"Her situation in this war has been difficult. She had the option of joining Germany or of being raped by the Germans like Belgium, and in making her decision she was no doubt impelled by the hope of recovering her homelands again.

CLASS IS DIFFERENT

"Despite all that has happened, we cannot class her with the other allies of Germany. Finland wants to cease fighting. She cannot do the impossible by interning the German Army in her borders. Indeed she may need her forces to protect her from seizures such as have come to Hungary."

In asking that the United States take a hand in solving the Finnish dilemma, Hoover pointed out that "the United States, Russia, and Britain have agreed to collaborate in building self-government and freedom in the world."

Also, in that connection there appeared in the March 26 issue of the Washington Sunday Star a very well-written editorial on Mr. Hoover's statement which I include herein:

MR. HOOVER ON FINLAND

In the growing uncertainty over the war aims and policies of the Allied Great Powers, former President Herbert Hoover has just uttered a constructive note. His text is the problem of Finland and the part which the United States Government should play in its solution, but his thesis is applicable to other problems which are still in suspense.

Mr. Hoover begins by emphasizing the profound importance of the Finnish question and its proper solution in the future of freedom, because for 300 years Finland has been the symbol of the struggle for liberty. It is against that historic background, high lighted by the incontestable achievements of the Finnish people in creating and maintaining progressive democratic institutions, that its foreign policy in recent years should be considered. Regrettable and ill-advised as her action may have been in entering the war on the side of Germany 3 years ago, the purpose of the Finnish people was not to spread nazi-ism, but to preserve their liberty and democracy, as well as to recover the vital portions of her territory which she had been compelled to cede to Russia in consequence of a war waged against her by the Soviet Union only the year before.

Furthermore, the military situation in the summer of 1941 was such that if Finland had not entered the war against Russia she would have been "raped by the Germans, like Belgium." Therefore, Mr. Hoover contends that, "despite all that has happened, we cannot class her with the other allies of Germany. We cannot forget that her whole aspiration is democracy and freedom."

This leads up to Finland's present dilemma. She wants to cease fighting and get out of the war. But she cannot defy Germany without throwing herself on the mercy of Soviet Russia, and this she is unwilling to do without some definite assurance from the Western Powers. Is it not time, asks Mr. Hoover, for our Government to use its good offices to insure "the application of those ideals" to which Russia, as well as the United States and Britain, have formally proclaimed? "Does not our Government have an obligation to the future which must be exerted now?" Mr. Hoover ends by pointing out that "in the long view there can be no lasting peace in the world unless such peoples as the Finns are to have their independence and lands restored. Nor are the American people likely to accept any peace which does not extend the independence of nations, much less diminish them."

At an hour when many voices are urging the subordination of everything to military expediency it is timely that one who has acquired the reputation of an elder statesman should emphasize the necessity of adherence to basic principles, abandonment of which may lose us the peace even though the war be won.

Secretary Hull Outlines Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the United States is fortunate at this time in having as its Secretary of State the Honorable Cordell Hull, whose sound judgment, wide experience in international affairs, and far-seeing vision splendidly equip him for the important post which he holds in this world crisis.

Recently he issued a statement outlining the bases of the foreign policy of the United States, known as Hull's 17 points, and, under leave granted, same is submitted herewith:

BASES OF THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

OUR FUNDAMENTAL NATIONAL INTERESTS

In determining our foreign policy we must first see clearly what our true national interests are.

At the present time, the paramount aim of our foreign policy is to defeat our enemies as quickly as possible.

Beyond final victory, our fundamental national interests are the assuring of our national security and the fostering of the economic and social well-being of our people.

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

Cooperation between nations in the spirit of good neighbors, founded on the principles of liberty, equality, justice, morality, and law, is the most effective method of safeguarding and promoting the political, the economic, the social, and the cultural well-being of our Nation and of all nations.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION BACKED BY FORCE

Some international agency must be created which can—by force, if necessary—keep the peace among nations in the future.

A system of organized international cooperation for the maintenance of peace must be based upon the willingness of the cooperating nations to use force, if necessary, to keep the peace. There must be certainty that adequate and appropriate means are available and will be used for this purpose.

POLITICAL DIFFERENCES

Political differences which present a threat to the peace of the world should be submitted to agencies which would use the remedies of discussion, negotiation, conciliation, and good offices.

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

Disputes of a legal character which present a threat to the peace of the world should be adjudicated by an international court of justice whose decisions would be based upon application of principles of law.

REDUCTION OF ARMS

International cooperative action must include eventual adjustment of national armaments in such a manner that the rule of law cannot be successfully challenged and that the burden of armaments may be reduced to a minimum.

MOSCOW FOUR-NATION DECLARATION

Through this declaration, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, the United States, and China have laid the foundation for cooperative effort in the post-war world toward enabling all peace-loving nations, large and small, to live in peace and security, to preserve the liberties and rights of civilized existence, and to enjoy expanded opportunities and facilities for economic, social, and spiritual progress.

SPHERES OF INFLUENCE AND ALLIANCES

As the provisions of the four-nation declaration are carried into effect, there will no longer be need for spheres of influence, for alliances, for balance of power, or any other of the special arrangements through which, in the unhappy past, the nations strove to safeguard their security or to promote their interests.

SURVEILLANCE OVER AGGRESSOR NATIONS

In the process of reestablishing international order, the United Nations must exercise surveillance over aggressor nations until such time as the latter demonstrate their willingness and ability to live at peace with other nations. How long such surveillance will need to continue must depend upon the rapidity with which the peoples of Germany, Japan, Italy, and their satellites give convincing proof that they have repudiated and abandoned the monstrous philosophy of superior race and conquest by force and have embraced loyally the basic principles of peaceful processes.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE BARRIERS

Excessive trade barriers of the many different kinds must be reduced, and practices which impose injuries on others and divert trade from its natural economic course must be avoided.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCE

Equally plain is the need for making national currencies once more freely exchangeable for each other at stable rates of exchange; for a system of financial relations so devised that materials can be produced and ways may be found of moving them where there are markets created by human need; for machinery through which capital may—for the development of the world's resources and for the stabilization of economic activity—move on equitable terms from financially stronger to financially weaker countries.

ATLANTIC CHARTER—RECIPROCAL OBLIGATIONS

The pledge of the Atlantic Charter is of a system which will give every nation, large or small, a greater assurance of stable peace, greater opportunity for the realization of its aspirations to freedom, and greater facilities for material advancement. But that pledge implies an obligation for each nation to demonstrate its capacity for stable and progressive government, to fulfill scrupulously its established duties to other nations, to settle its international differences and disputes by none but peaceful methods, and to make its full contribution to the maintenance of enduring peace.

SOVEREIGN EQUALITY OF NATIONS

Each sovereign nation, large or small, is in law and under law the equal of every other nation.

The principle of sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, irrespective of size and strength, as partners in a future system of general security will be the foundation stone upon which the future international organization will be constructed.

FORM OF GOVERNMENT

Each nation should be free to decide for itself the forms and details of its governmental organization—so long as it conducts its affairs in such a way as not to menace the peace and security of other nations.

NONINTERVENTION

All nations, large and small, which respect the right of others, are entitled to freedom from outside interference in their internal affairs.

LIBERTY

There is no surer way for men and for nations to show themselves worthy of liberty than to fight for its preservation, in any way that is open to them, against those who would destroy it for all. Never did a plainer duty to fight against its foes devolve upon all peoples who prize liberty and all who aspire to it.

All peoples who, with "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind," have qualified themselves to assume and to discharge the responsibilities of liberty are entitled to its enjoyment.

DEPENDENT PEOPLES

There rests upon the independent nations a responsibility in relation to dependent peoples who aspire to liberty. It should be the duty of nations having political ties with such peoples, of mandatories, of trustees, or of other agencies, as the case may be, to help the aspiring peoples to develop materially and educationally, to prepare themselves for the duties and responsibilities of self-government, and to attain liberty. An excellent example of what can be achieved is afforded in the record of our relationship with the Philippines.

Air Transportation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD,
Washington, March 20, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 8, 1944, as well as the joint letter dated March 7 of six Members of the House of Representatives from the New England States, submitting comments with respect to certain applications pending before the Board proposing additional air transportation services between New York and Boston, and with special reference to the report and recommendation of the Board's examiner thereon. In connection with the latter, you commend the recommendation for an additional New York-Boston shuttle route but seek earnest consideration of the granting of additional certificates of public convenience and necessity authorizing through trunk-line routes to New England from important cities in the south and west.

As you are aware, the proceeding covered by Examiner Wrenn's report involved, in addition to New York-Boston shuttle service, applications proposing through service to Boston from the west coast by Transcontinental & Western Air and United Air Lines through extension of their existing transcontinental routes from New York to Boston as well as a proposal of Eastern Air Lines to extend its route from the southeast to New York on to Boston. There is also another proceeding pending before the Board involving direct service from Boston to the west as proposed by T. W. A. and United which would connect with their transcontinental routes at Pittsburgh and Cleveland, respectively. The examiner's report in the latter proceeding was issued some time ago but, at the suggestion of several of the parties, consolidated briefs were filed covering the two proceedings and a single oral argument will be held thereon. As you know, the reports of the examiners do not represent the decision of the Board, which has not yet acted in these matters, but merely the recommendations of the examiners based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing. As permitted by the rules of practice, exceptions to the examiners' reports have been filed by all the parties of record and the oral argument, referred to above, is now assigned for March 27, 1944. Following oral argument the matter will stand submitted for decision by the Board. You may be assured that in reaching its decision on the above discussed applications the Board will give careful consideration to the transportation needs of the New England area as disclosed by the record.

In passing upon applications for certificates of public convenience and necessity the Board is acting in a quasi judicial capacity and its procedures in connection therewith accord with the usual practice of an administrative law agency. Although the Board's rules of practice provide that "any person, including any State, political subdivision thereof, State aviation commission, or other public body, may appear at any hearing and present any evidence which is relevant to the issues," in the interest of orderly procedure it has been necessary to restrict formal interventions. In the instant case the Boston Port Authority, the Massachusets Department of Public Works, and the State of Connecticut, among others, have been permitted to intervene and thus are entitled to participate in the oral argument. The parties, including the applicants and interveners, have been allotted a total of approximately 12 hours for the argument.

Your interest in the proper development of a sound national air-transportation system, and especially the relationship of the New England area to such a system, is appreciated. Instructions have been given that you be notified immediately of the release of the Board's decision in this proceeding.

Sincerely yours,

L. WELCH POGUE,
Chairman.

MARCH 8, 1944.

Mr. L. WELCH POGUE,
Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board,
Department of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. POGUE: Many persons of my State, including high officials of municipal and State governments, have protested to me against the recent ruling of your examiner limiting air routes into Boston and New England.

Whether well founded or not, the impression exists that this opinion virtually creates a monopoly and will bar the effective growth of Boston as an airport and stifle commercial development so far as air facilities are concerned.

If all this be true, it would indicate a very serious situation, which would profoundly and adversely affect all New England and I desire to urge that you review this entire matter with the view to liberalizing the opportunities for several other companies desiring to operate in our area.

Appreciating your interest and efforts and asking that you send me your views concerning the possibilities, and with usual best personal wishes,

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

I Vouch the Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I delivered before the Ninth Virginia District Democratic Convention, which was held at Bristol, Va., on March 18, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, men and women of the convention, I know that we all feel inspired by the great message to which we have just listened. And I want the great Democrat who delivered the message and who so signally honored us with his presence today to know that we sincerely appreciate the great sacrifice he made in order to be with us. JOHN MCCORMACK, my friends, is not only a great Democrat; he is more, he is a great American that enjoys the confidence and respect of all Americans regardless of party. And after the great Democratic victory that we are going to win this fall which, I am confident, will elevate SAM RAYBURN to the Vice Presidency, I want my good friend, John, to know that beginning with the Seventy-ninth Congress I shall take pleasure, yes, genuine pleasure, in addressing him not as John, but as Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chairman, once again I am the happy recipient of your love and confidence and respect. Once again I appear before you to thank you for that love and confidence and respect you have again today, as you have over the years, manifested for me. And once again I say unto you, as I have on former occasions, that I had rather represent the men and women of the mountains of Virginia in the Congress of the United States than to hold any other office within the gift of our people. I am proud of my people and I am proud of the commission I hold from them to represent them in national affairs. And my constant prayer during these tragic troublesome days is that the Master may give me the vision to see that which is best for our Nation, and, having seen, the moral courage, regardless of consequences, to stand for those things.

As I view national and world events today, there are but two issues in this campaign. Oh, I know that the opposition, afraid to face these issues and calmly and dispassionately submit them to the American people for decision, will use every device known to the skillful and adroit politician to divert the mind of our people from the true issues by stressing and overemphasizing the annoyances and hardships that our war efforts have occasioned, and then appealing to passion and prejudice. And while I realize that this will be their line of attack, I say unto you that it will be as unworthy as was a similar attack against Lincoln's administration during the Civil War which, you know, was the only national election contest ever held in this country during a period of war, with the single exception of the contest between Madison and Clinton, which was held soon after the beginning of the little skirmish we had with the British back in 1812. The American people resented the vicious and unscrupulous attacks against Mr. Lincoln, their Commander in Chief, in 1864, and if I correctly read and interpret the minds and hearts of the American people they are going to resent the vicious and unscrupulous attacks against Mr. Roosevelt, their Commander in Chief, in 1944. The American people separated the dross from the gold in 1864, and, mark my words, they will again separate the dross from the gold in 1944. While Mr. Lincoln was spared to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion, his tragic, untimely death, much to the hurt of the Nation, especially the Southland, prevented him from working out the just and righteous peace that was in his heart and mind. And, somehow, something deep down in me tells me that today just ordinary men and women here in America, and they constitute the backbone of this Republic, have the same confidence in Mr. Roosevelt that they had in Mr. Lincoln, and that the humble prayer of these ordinary, everyday Americans, and I am happy that I am down in that class, is not only that Mr. Roosevelt may continue as our Commander in Chief, but that his years may be extended until after the final victory has been won and a durable and lasting peace has been worked out. Yes, my friends, America, the whole world, needs the leadership and vision of Franklin D. Roosevelt in order to speed the victory and insure a righteous, durable peace.

Let me break through the maze of false, frivolous, and fictitious issues the opposition is trying to develop in order to confuse the people and put my finger on the real issues.

First. Can we best serve our war effort and thus the sooner bring the war to an end, so our boys can come back home, by continuing the present leadership, or by a change that will bring into power either the present Republican leadership, which is a combination of isolationists and obstructionists, or a new and untried, inexperienced leadership?

Second. Will we be in a stronger position to work out a lasting, durable peace by continuing our present leadership, or by a change that will bring into power either the present Republican leadership, which is a combination of isolationists and obstructionists, or a new, untried, and inexperienced leadership?

These are great issues, as important and far reaching as the American people ever considered, and demand straight thinking after careful, prayerful consideration. Issues that so vitally affect the lives of those we love, the security of our Republic, and the future peace of the world, cannot be settled down on the lower levels of life where passion, prejudice, and ill will hold sway; they call for the best that is within us, they demand that we free our hearts and minds of all hate and bitterness, and that we go down on our knees and ask divine providence to give us the moral strength and courage to consider them with a pure heart and with a mind single to but one purpose, and that purpose the welfare of our boys, the welfare of our country, and the welfare of a world that today lies bleeding and broken upon the wreckage of war.

After preparing ourselves mentally and spiritually to become unbiased, honest judges of the issues, the next thing we should do, of course, is to determine the true facts; because I am sure we are all in agreement that a correct decision depends upon a correct understanding of the facts.

Having drawn the issues, and made these preliminary remarks covering the consideration thereof, may I now be permitted to present the facts relative to the two great issues?

My friends, if the leader of any nation ever had a hard time awakening the people of that nation to impending national danger, that leader was Franklin D. Roosevelt. Back in 1935 when a madman, born to the name of Schicklegruber, but whose family cognomen was later changed to Hitler, conceived the idea that he was commissioned by the fates to become the master leader of a master race, Roosevelt had the vision to view with increasing alarm, first, the huge and uncalled-for increase of armament by the German Nation, and then, step by step, Hitler's boastful and challenging pronouncements, his occupation of the Rhineland in violation of the treaty of Versailles, and finally his ruthless and uncalled-for invasion of Poland. Seemingly, until the invasion of Poland, most of our people were insensible to the danger that Mr. Roosevelt so clearly foresaw. And, Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Roosevelt, sensing the danger, set about preparing our country for the conflict he clearly saw in the making, the leaders of the opposition—isolationists then, and deep down in their hearts very few of these leaders have changed—called him a warmonger, an internationalist, a Don Quixote preparing for imaginary battles, a dreamer unduly alarmed over the safety of our country, an ambitious leader hunting an excuse to justify assumption of dictatorial powers, and every other name they thought would discredit his efforts and bring his preparedness program into disrepute with the American people. Ah, these isolationist leaders went farther, and either through ill will, or prejudice, or the lack of vision, or the courage to stand up like men and face facts, turned the ear of indifference to his warnings and, like the ostrich, stuck their heads in the sand, seemingly thinking that what they did not see and hear could do them no injury. Yes, having eyes to see, they saw not; having ears to hear, they heard not; having minds to comprehend, they comprehended not; but having tongues to wag, they wagged them with all the agility and vehemence of a common shrew, and preached a doctrine of isolationism so dangerous that had it been followed free Americans today would probably be the cringing, crawling vassals of Hitler and his master race.

Before Pearl Harbor there came before the Congress five measures that put to a test not only the alertness, sensibility, and perception of the Members to the dangers that threatened us from abroad, but likewise these measures put to a test their responsibility as Members to do all things necessary to preserve the safety and welfare of this Republic. Fortunately for America, a majority in Congress followed Mr. Roosevelt's leadership and put these measures through. Had Republican leadership been followed, every single measure would have failed and, after Pearl Harbor, we would have awakened from our slumber like the foolish virgins without any oil in our lamps.

Oh, for fear there are those who may think I am dealing in campaign talk, let me exhibit the record.

1. REPEAL OF ARMS EMBARGO, JUNE 1939

Back in 1937, under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt, and in an effort to do everything humanly possible to keep America out of the conflict, we passed what is known as the Neutrality Act, prohibiting, among other things, the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations.

When it became apparent that the Neutrality Act was no protection against a madman, but on the contrary was keeping England from receiving American arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and that if England fell America would be next; and, moreover, that under the act Japan, who had never actually declared war against China and, therefore, could not be considered a belligerent nation, could still buy American arms, the President in 1938 recommended the repeal of the embargo against the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from this country to belligerents, provided they were transported in other than American vessels. The Congress failed to act on the recommendation. The President in 1939 renewed the request, and the provision in the Neutrality Act prohibiting the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations came before the Congress for action. What, I ask, did the opposition say, and how did the opposition vote? I vouch the record: They said that a repeal of the arms embargo provision of the Neutrality Act would be construed by Germany as an unneutral act, because Great Britain could send her ships to American ports and Germany, due to British control of the Atlantic, could not. And how did they vote? In the House 159 Republicans voted, 134 against the repeal, which, in effect, was a vote in favor of Germany, and 24 for repeal, which, in effect, was a vote for Great Britain. In the Senate 23 Republicans voted, 8 for and 10 against repeal.

2. DRAFT ACT, SEPTEMBER 1940

Let us look into the record a little further. In September 1940, the Selective Service Act came before the Congress, accompanied by a strong recommendation from the President for its passage. Although the national danger was imminent, and it was apparent to all who calmly and dispassionately viewed the situation, that the time was, if anything, overdue in which to commence training our fighting men, what did the leaders of the opposition say, and how did they vote? Ah, my hearers, keep in mind that this was an election year. It is for you to say whether politics directed their talking and voting. I vouch the record: The opposition argued and argued in face of the fact that the evacuation of Dunkerque had taken place May 30, 1940, and France had surrendered to Germany on June 22, 1940, that there was no necessity for the legislation, that we were at peace, that due to our isolation—our remoteness from the scene of conflict—Germany would never make war upon us. My, my, does not such an argument show an utter failure to sense the impending danger and the necessity of preparing our Nation to face it? And how did the opposition vote? In the House 164 Republicans voted, 112 against the Selective Service Act and 52 in favor of the act. In the Senate 18 Republicans voted, 10 against the act and 8 in favor of the act.

3. LEND-LEASE, FEBRUARY 1941

In February 1941, what is known as the lend-lease bill came before the Congress. The bill fell heir to the number 1776, and was known as H. R. 1776, but even the patriotic, all-American title failed to stir in the breast of the opposition the spirit that animated our heroic, patriotic ancestors back in that eventful year. The object of the bill, as we all know, was to provide Great Britain with food and ammunition and implements of war so she could withstand the terrific onslaught to which she was being subjected at the time. England, at this time, remember, had gone through her Dunkerque, had lost her ally, France, and was being subjected to the most terrific bombardment from the air ever known up to that time, and it was apparent that unless she obtained aid, and immediate aid, would go the way of Poland and France. Well, what did the opposition say, and how did the opposition vote? I vouch the record: Oh, they talked about America being self-contained, our safety because of our remoteness from the scene of action, granting dictatorial powers to the President, and a little of everything except the bald facts that England was right up against it, fighting with her back to the wall, and that if England fell America, in all probability, would be the next nation Hitler would take on. And how did the opposition vote? In the House 159 Republicans voted, 135 against aid to Great Britain, and 24 in favor of such aid. In the Senate 27 Republicans voted, 10 for aid and 17 against aid.

My friends, had not the Congress followed the leadership of the President and granted aid to Great Britain she would have fallen, and today we would be either the vassals of Hitler, or waging a single-handed war against him.

4. EXTENSION OF DRAFT, OCTOBER 1941

In October 1941, less than 2 months before Pearl Harbor, there came before the Congress the extension of the Selective Service Act. The original act called for a training period of 12 months, but provided that in the event the Congress thought the national interest imperiled, the President was given the right to extend the period for such time as might be necessary in the interest of the national defense. What did the opposition say, and how did the opposition vote? Again I vouch the record: This time the opposition charged that we had led the boys to believe that they were only to serve 12 months, that if we extended the period of service we would be breaking faith with the boys, that the national interest was not in peril, and that there was no necessity for requiring our boys to remain longer in the service. How did the opposition vote? In the House 154 Republicans voted, 133 against extending the Draft Act and 21 in favor of the extension. In the Senate, 30 Republicans voted, 17 against extension and 13 in favor of the extension. Just stop and think, my friends, and cold chills will begin to run down your backs, because if the opposition had prevailed the Army of the United States, in the most critical period of its history, would have been practically disbanded, and Pearl Harbor would have found us with ships, but no sailors to sail them; guns, but no soldiers to shoot them; planes, but no pilots to fly them.

5. FINAL REPEAL OF NEUTRALITY ACT, NOVEMBER 1941

Less than 1 month before Pearl Harbor, namely, on November 13, 1941, we had before the House for consideration legislation to repeal the prohibitions in the Neutrality Act against American vessels carrying goods to belligerents and the passage of American vessels through combat zones. The President recommended the passage of this legislation because it was found that the armament we were turning out in ever-increasing quantities under lend-lease could not be transported to Great Britain, Russia, and China unless American ships could be pressed into service.

It also appeared that unless Great Britain, Russia, and China received the armament that they would fall under the accursed heels of the dictators. And if they fell only Divine Providence knows what would have happened to America. The situation was desperate, and the question was—would America in order to make it possible for Great Britain, Russia, and China to hold out and resist the onslaught of the dictators, come to the rescue by furnishing the ships, or would she let these great nations go down, and assume the risk of fighting the dictator nations alone? Wrapped up in that answer, in my opinion, was not only the preservation of Great Britain, Russia, and China, not only the preservation of America; but the preservation of Christian civilization. Well, in this tense, dramatic moment, when everything we hold precious and dear was at stake, what did the opposition say and how did the opposition vote? I vouch the record: Why, the opposition, with its head still in the sand, said that if we took such action we would get into the war—not realizing that it mattered little what action we took, in all probability we would get in the war, and if we did not take favorable action we would be in the war without allies—and some went so far as to openly state that because they did not like the President's labor policy they could not go along with him. Think of it, because they were peeved at the President's labor policy they could not go along with him in his effort to protect our very existence as a Nation. And how did the opposition vote? In the House 159 Republicans voted—137 against permitting American vessels to carry ammunition, armament, and implements of war to Great Britain, Russia, and China—and 22 for. In the Senate 27 Republicans voted—6 for and 22 against.

My friends, I have given you the record of the opposition on the five great issues, all involving our national defense, our safety and security—yea our very existence as a Nation—that came up for determination in the Congress before Pearl Harbor. The defeat of any one of these measures would have jeopardized our safety; the defeat of all would have made it possible for the dictator nations to have subjugated Great Britain, Russia, and China, and Pearl Harbor would have found us without allies, the helpless victim of misguided leadership.

Now, just one question, do you want to turn the prosecution of the war over to the leadership of a party with such a record?

Oh, I know that Pearl Harbor brought about unity and raised American patriotism to such heights that, for a season, the opposition was afraid not to follow the leadership of our Commander in Chief. But as I continue to give you the record—bless your souls, I haven't finished showing the opposition up—you will find that as soon as it became apparent that, due largely to the leadership of our Commander in Chief, we were going to win the war, and hence the fear of a defeat wore off, we find the opposition back at their old trick of playing politics with the war effort.

While I cannot go into all of the machinations of the opposition in their effort to embarrass our Commander in Chief and bring his leadership into disrepute, let me call your attention to a few things, all matters of record—yes, I am speaking from the record today—that have taken place during the recent past.

While we all hate controls, we all realize that without them we will have not only a shortage of food and clothing and critical war material, but inflation as well. No matter what the price we have to pay, or the hardships we have to suffer, every sensible man knows that we cannot afford to run the risk of having a food shortage, or a clothes shortage, or a shortage in critical materials needed for our war effort; and we all realize that this country cannot withstand the war if it is followed by inflation. Realizing these things, the Congress back on October 4, 1942, passed the Price Control Act in which it directed the President to hold the line. The line was supposed to cover our whole economy. One link in the chain is the cost-of-living link, another the salary link, another the wage link, another the rent link, another the price link, and so forth. The President advised the Congress that in order to hold the cost-of-living link he would have to employ the use of food subsidies, but if the Congress knew a better way, he would be glad to follow such a way. As a matter of fact the President does not think any better of food subsidies than the common run of us, but he simply knew of no other way to hold down the cost of living. And the Congress did not know a better way, or, if it did, it made no suggestion to the President, or anyone else, as to a better method. Instead, no doubt proceeding on the idea that food subsidies were unpopular, it went off on a tangent and abolished food subsidies, and it took this action knowing that the hold-the-line chain was only as strong as its weakest link, and that if the cost-of-living link was broken, the wage link, the rent link, the salary link, and so forth, would also break, and inflation would be upon us. How the Congress could establish the line, direct the President to hold the line, and then refuse to give the President the tools he found necessary in carrying out the will of Congress, is one of those mysterious things that no sensible man will try to figure out.

Well, what did the opposition say and how did the opposition vote? I vouch the record: Read the debates and it is hard to tell just what line of reasoning the opposition followed, except they all seemed to be against the President. Like the geese, some flew east, some flew west, and some flew over the cuckoo's nest. But to give you some idea of what was said. I recall that some said food subsidies were not necessary, others that O. P. A. was a nuisance, and still others that the whole thing was simply a scheme of the President to corral the labor vote. You know, the opposition is getting a vote complex. They don't want the laboring folks to vote, they don't want the soldiers to vote, and before we get through with the election I believe they are going to kick on anyone voting unless he belongs to the opposition. In the House 191 Republicans voted, 177 against holding the line and 14 in favor of holding the line. In the Senate 20 Republicans voted, 17 against holding the line and 3 in favor of holding the line. The whole unhappy matter was ended by a Presidential veto, which the Congress wisely upheld, and inflation was thus averted.

Last year the President asked for a tax bill that would raise $11,000,000,000 of additional revenue. Now we are at war, and it is taking more money than the ordinary mind can comprehend to finance it. Surely the duty is upon us who stay at home to raise the money, if it is humanly possible for us to raise it, and not leave it to our boys to do the fighting and then come back home and do the paying. The Congress responded to the request of the Commander in Chief by passing a tax bill that will only raise around $2,000,000,000. The President vetoed the bill, and in his veto message, while he used, I am afraid, intemperate language, he set forth sound and potent reasons why he was forced to resort to the veto. When these reasons, which show up the tax bill for what it is, become generally understood by the people, I sometimes wonder if the American people will not come to the conclusion that it was these potent reasons which laid bare the iniquities of the tax bill rather than the intemperate language that really got under the skins of some.

Well, what did the opposition say? Oh, they said that the poor American taxpayer could not carry a heavier burden as he is already loaded down with a tax burden that is unbearable. This is an election year, you know, and taxes are unpopular in off years, much less election years, and no doubt they thought that such an argument would appeal to the voters. Well, in my opinion, they underestimated the patriotism of the average American. The average Americans, the kind we have here today, are more interested in winning the war so their boys can come home, than they are in dodging their responsibilities as taxpayers. They are not in this war to make a profit, they are in this war to back their boys up with everything they have, including their dollars, so they can, as Kipling would say, "beat the blooming boots" off of Hitler and Tojo and come on home. And let me tell you something else they failed to say. Every dollar we pay on the war today will relieve our soldier boys, who are the future taxpayers of America of just that much. Moreover, roughly speaking, our national income will run around 155 billions of dollars, of which amount around 85 billions will go into consumer goods and 42 billions into taxes, leaving a balance of some 25 or 30 billions, which, my friends, is nearly as much as the entire national income under Hoover. Now, it doesn't take a tax expert or a financial wizard to tell you that 25 or 30 billions of dollars is a lot of money to be left floating around, and if it is not siphoned off in taxes or forced savings, or in some manner, is, in spite of all our controls, going to bring about inflation. Well, here is how the opposition voted. I vouch the record: Neither in the Senate nor House was a record vote taken on the tax bill. A bad sign to begin with. The tax conference report was passed by the Senate without a record vote. Another bad sign. In the House we obtained a record vote on the conference report, and 177 Republicans voted, 144 for the conference report and 33 against. The veto vote was as follows: In the House 202 Republicans voted, 199 to override the President's veto and 3 to sustain the veto, and in the Senate 32 Republicans voted and every one of them voted to sustain the veto.

Recently we had before the Congress the soldiers' vote legislation. Upon the recommendation of the President legislation was introduced waiving registration and the payment of a poll tax and providing a simplified Federal ballot that both the War and Navy Departments stated could be transported to the soldiers and back. Now, when we send our boys away from home and make it impossible for them to register and pay their poll taxes, it is nothing but fair and just that these voting prerequisites be waived. And remember that both the War and Navy Departments stated that they did not have shipping facilities to handle State ballots. It is recognized by all who are acquainted with the facts that a simplified Federal ballot, based upon a waiver of registration and the payment of a poll tax, is the only means whereby a great majority of our soldier boys can vote. When this legislation came before the Congress for consideration, what did the opposition say, and how did the opposition vote? Why, the opposition boldly charged that the soldier boys, if permitted to vote, would vote for their Commander in Chief, and that the whole thing was just a scheme to corral the soldier vote in order to reelect the President. What else? Why the Republicans actually came out and championed the cause of the rights of the States. Oh, yes, they would be perfectly willing for the imaginary rights of the States to stand between our soldier boys and the ballot. Why? Because they seem willing to resort to any excuse or pretext to get rid of the soldier vote. Remember the same Republicans, when it comes to the repeal of the poll tax by Federal legislation, in utter disregard of the rights of the States, are willing to override the constitutional provision vesting in the States the right to determine the qualification of voters. And yet in view of this record, many southern Democrats fell for this Republican hypocrisy. In the House 193 Republicans voted, 175 against the soldier boys, and 18 in favor of the soldier boys. In the Senate, 32 Republicans voted, 22 against and 10 for the soldier boys.

Just here let me pause to answer the charge that the soldier boys, if permitted to vote, would vote for their Commander in Chief. You know, to me, that statement is one of the strongest reasons I ever heard advanced, if not the strongest, as to why Mr. Roosevelt should be reelected. Why, do you ask? Simply because if the boys who are doing the fighting are satisfied with their Commander in Chief and want to see him continued in command until they complete the job, I for one boldly proclaim that their wishes should be granted, and that we who stay at home, secure from danger, eating three square meals a day, and sleeping in warm, comfortable beds at night, should join hands with them and make his election unanimous. If the soldier boys are for Mr. Roosevelt, as the Republicans charge, it is apparent that they are satisfied with his leadership and think that by continuing that leadership victory will come quicker, which means they can come marching back home a little sooner.

Now, let me brush away some of the rubbish. Before I do this, my friends, let me make a general statement. I want to be perfectly frank. I am not contending that mistakes have not been made. I am not saying that I am satisfied with, or that I approve of, all that has been done. In an undertaking, the like of which was never before dreamed of in the world, in which speed and haste meant everything—meant the difference between victory and defeat—mistakes were but natural. Then, too, I know that the administration of some of the emergency laws has not been what it should be. Ofttimes our people have been unnecessarily annoyed with foolish or unjust rulings and useless and annoying red tape. When I ran across these things I have not hesitated to criticize and do everything I could to bring about the needed corrections. I have, however, tried to confine my criticism to constructive criticsm, realizing that while the objectives were good the administration was poor. Many corrections have already been made. Experience is a great teacher, and as we go along I am in hopes that we will be able to reduce the errors to a minimum. But, by and large, I say unto you that in spite of our mistakes and shortcomings, the accomplishments of the American people under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt have been nothing short of a miracle.

The rubbish that is being injected into the campaign to throw the voters off guard may be grouped under the headings: "Food," "Labor," "Industry," "Home front," "Domestic policies," and "Fourth term." May I briefly refer to these things?

(A) FOOD

From some of the dire predictions the opposition has been making for the past 2 years, sometimes I wonder if there are not those in this country who hate Mr. Roosevelt with such a vengeance that they would go so far as to welcome a famine in order to discredit his administration. If there are such they are going to be sorely disappointed, because the great majority of the American farmers are in this war to win and are fighting as hard as any soldier on the battlefront to produce the necessary food to carry us through. I think I know something about what the American farmer has done and is doing, and some day I hope to have the opportunity to give you a detailed report. Suffice to say, whether or not you approve of Mr. Roosevelt's food program, I am here to tell you that, in spite of all dire predictions to the contrary, it is producing food, and the American people are the best fed people in the world today, and the American armed forces have more and better rations than any other army. And I want to further say that no segment of our population is more patriotic than our farmers, that they have made real sacrifices, farming early and late, oftimes without sufficient help, without sufficient machinery, and that they have produced more food in less time than was ever produced in the history of the world. The great majority of American farmers know that while mistakes have been made, that every effort has been made to see that sufficient help remained on the farm and that sufficient farm machinery was made available. The difficulty has been brought about by a manpower shortage and the imperative use of steel and other critical war materials for munitions of war. And, in my opinion, ordinary American farmers will resent the effort the opposition is making to place them in a false light. The opposition is simply underestimating the patriotism of the American farmer. Let me say this to the opposition: No matter what sacrifice it takes, the American farmer will never let our soldier boys go hungry.

(B) LABOR

From some of the unjust, unfounded, and vicious attacks made against Mr. Roosevelt's labor policy, I sometimes wonder if there are not those in this country who hate Mr. Roosevelt with such a vengeance that they would go so far as to welcome a general strike in order to discredit his administration. If there are such, they are going to be sorely disappointed because the great majority of American labor are in this war to win and are fighting as hard as any soldier on the battle front to produce those things which are necessary to carry us through. Some day I hope to have the opportunity to give you a detailed report. Suffice at this time is to say, whether you approve of Mr. Roosevelt's labor policy or not, the record shows that no segment of our population is more patriotic, that proportionately they have furnished more boys to do the fighting than any other class, that they have suffered more casualties right here on the home front in mine and factory than the armed forces so far have suffered on the battle front, and that they have back of them, in spite of all criticism to the contrary, the greatest labor record ever made during any comparable period in the history of the world.

(C) INDUSTRY

Some day I hope to have the opportunity to give you the war record of industry. It is a great record. Oh, whether you approve of Mr. Roosevelt's production program or not, I am here to tell you that American industry is patriotic, that it has performed no less than a miracle in production, and can be depended upon to produce the tanks, planes, and guns necessary to bring the Axis powers to their knees.

(D) HOME FRONT

Oh, they tell you, "Yes, things are all right on the battle front, but my, my, how about the mess on the home front?" Now the American people, when they think this thing through, are not going to fall for that argument. You cannot, my friends, separate the fronts. The battle front depends, absolutely depends, upon the home front, and if the home front ever bogs down, and I want you to carry this thought home and ponder over it, our boys are going to be up against it on the battle front. Just stop and think: We have the best fed, the best equipped, the best cared for army in the world, and that army is supplied with the best implements of warfare yet devised and turned out. Now, the home front is furnishing the food, it is furnishing the equipment, it is furnishing the care, and it is furnishing the implements of war for the battle front, and in spite of all criticism, in spite of all abuse, I am here to tell you that the home front, under the leadership of our commander in chief, has done a splendid job and, because it has done a splendid job, the battle front has been able to do a splendid job.

(E) DOMESTIC POLICIES

Another thing I want to call to your attention. There are those in this country who do not approve of Mr. Roosevelt's domestic policies, and are constantly criticising and hammering on these policies, when they should be giving their time, their effort, and thought to the war effort. Whether you are for or against the domestic policies of Mr. Roosevelt, patriotism dictates that a settlement of these issues should not be mixed up in our war effort. We need unity, and trying to inject these domestic questions into the war effort is calculated to bring about disunity. Yet, some people, it seems, want to mix up a little of everything in the war effort except the fighting. What we should do is to keep everything out of the war effort except the fighting. Some things can wait, but we cannot afford to do anything that will hamper or delay our war effort. Let us keep our eye on the squirrel. The big thing is to keep the fighting going, and going in a big way, so we can speed up the victory and bring our boys home.

(F) FOURTH TERM

There are those who oppose a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. Of course, some of this opposition is sincere and honest. Most of it, however, comes from those who opposed even a first term for Mr. Roosevelt. And yet, had not Mr. Roosevelt been elected back in November 1932, it is hard to say what might have happened right here in free America. Those were dark ominous days. Fearful things were happening in other parts of the world and, remember, a hungry stomach in America will have about the same effect as a hungry stomach in some other country. Why, on the night of the day Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated, I heard a great independent Republican Senator say that it looked like Divine Providence had put Mr. Roosevelt in the White House, because, in his opinion, this country could not have carried on 30 days longer under Mr. Hoover. Who can say that the same Divine Providence did not put him back in office for the third term? Let us just pause for a moment and calmly contemplate what might have happened if Mr. Roosevelt had not been elected for the third term. What, my countrymen, would have happened to the five great, all important, measures that came before the Congress before Pearl Harbor? Yes, what would have happened to repeal of arms embargo, the draft bill, lend-lease, extension of the draft, and repeal of neutrality? From the record I have cited it is apparent that everyone of these measures would have been defeated and Pearl Harbor would have found us unprepared.

Oh, I hate to see Mr. Roosevelt drafted for a fourth term. I do not like third terms and fourth terms, and under ordinary circumstances would oppose more than a second term. But, my countrymen, my hatred for third and fourth terms is overcome by my love for America. I believe the welfare of my country—yea; the safety and security of my country—demand that we reelect Mr. Roosevelt. Why? Well, to begin with, Mr. Roosevelt has a better grasp of the war situation and world conditions than any other man in America. It would necessarily take a new man in the White House a considerable length of time to find out what Mr. Roosevelt already knows. Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt seems to be able to work with our allies. There, too, a change would eliminate Secretary Hull, Secretary Stimson, Secretary Knox, Donald Nelson, C. E. Wilson, and many others, all of whom have been doing a great war job, from the war picture. Now, if we make a change, I do not know how long it will take the new occupant of the White House to acquaint himself with our war effort and world conditions, nor do I know whether or not he could work with our allies, nor do I know whom he would put in the places of Hull, and Stimson, and Knox, and Nelson, and Wilson, and others. The change, to say the least, would slow down our war effort, probably seriously cripple it, and I do not want this to happen. Our war effort is clicking and I want to keep it clicking so our boys can come on back home. To me it would be just as sensible for England to turn down her Churchill, or Russia to turn down her Stalin, as for America, at this fateful hour, to turn down her Roosevelt.

Now, to those who, in connection with the fourth term hollo dictator, let me say this: I have heard that cry against Mr. Roosevelt for a long, long time, and to me that cry is as empty today as it was when his enemies first gave voice to it. So long as freemen can freely participate in a free election there is no fear of dictatorship.

Yes, my friends, America is fundamentally all right. There is no fear of dictatorship. Our war effort is clicking in the right way, and if these alarmists, the political faultfinders, these isolationists, these obstructionists, these Roosevelt haters will only "pipe down" for a little while and quit their alarming, their faultfinding, their obstrucing, their hating, under the leadership of our Commander in Chief we will keep them clicking until the dictators are crushed and our boys come marching back home.

My countrymen, I have given you the record and I have tried to brush away the rubbish. That record clearly shows that the leaders of the opposition, from the beginning, have either been isolationists or obstructionists, and, in war, one is about as bad as the other. And the record reveals another thing; namely, that the rubbish is being thrown into the campaign by the alarmists, the political faultfinders, and the Roosevelt haters, for, in my opinion, but one purpose, and that purpose to wreak their vengeance upon Mr. Roosevelt and bring about his defeat. Now, let me ask you a simple question or two: Are you willing to turn the further prosecution of the war over to a leadership with such a record? Do you think final victory will be speeded, so our boys can come on back home a little sooner, by making a change and turning the further prosecution of the war over to such a leadership, knowing that that leadership will put in high position new and untried men? The fathers and mothers of America, be they Democrats or Republicans, cannot afford to let prejudice, ill will, or anything else, lead them into making the wrong answer. With the best interest of that soldier boy of yours in mind, think it over, Mr. American Father, Mrs. American Mother, and may a just and righteous God direct your thinking.

PEACE

Now, my friends, I come to the other issue that is wrapped up in this campaign, world peace.

Under the matchless leadership of our Commander in Chief, we have the war won if we will only quit our bickering, stick together, and keep it won. Oh, I know there is much fighting yet to be done. Oh, I know that in the winning we have yet to pay an awful price in life and property. Cold, clammy sweat breaks out on me when I think of the fine American boys whose lives will yet have to be sacrificed to bring the victory. What I mean is this: By the grace of God we are no longer fighting with our backs to the wall; we now have the men and armament with which to win. How long it will last, what price we will have to pay, I know not. The time may be long, and the price may be high, but I am now persuaded that a just and righteous God will give us the victory.

Will we throw that victory away, as we did in World War No. 1, or will we use it, as the Master would have us use it, to usher in a just and lasting peace?

My friends, I would not only be false to my innermost feelings and emotions, but I would be withholding my views, which you are entitled to know, and which honesty demands that I make known, if I failed to frankly give you my thoughts on the great question which today weighs so heavily upon the minds, hearts, and souls of all thoughtful people: The peace that will follow the present conflagration.

Let me first announce my thesis and then, as I proceed, in support thereof, cite a few passages from the greatest textbook on government ever written: If this generation, upon which will fall, at the conclusion of hostilities, the colossal task of working out the peace, fails to base that peace upon moral and spiritual ideals and values, which alone can insure its perpetuity, then the blood of our loved ones will have been shed in vain, and down through the years, in the eyes of the righteous, we will be looked upon as the accursed executioners of the untold millions who hereafter fall upon the field of battle.

Mr. Chairman, men and women of the convention, laws and statutes which, at best, are but rules of action promulgated by man in an effort to command that which is right and prohibit that which is wrong, while they have their place in government, have never been able to breathe into government permanency and durability. Many of the nations of the past, whose works of grandeur and art corroding time has consigned back to nature, and whose only evidences of existence are found buried in the bosom of the earth or recorded in the archives of the past, had codes of laws that, while they still command the respect and admiration of mankind, failed to endow their governments with perpetuity. Why has it always been thus, do you ask? And I answer, because those nations, instead of being anchored to the Cross, were founded upon the sand. Be not deceived, if the history of the nations of the past teach one lesson that stands out above all others we may glean from the rise and fall of empires and kingdoms, it is this: No nation, no government, devoid of moral and spiritual ideals and values can endure. It is an immutable law, attested by both sacred and profane history, as unchangeable as the everlasting hills that surround us, that respects not smallness nor is awed by greatness, and to which the smallest tribal kingdom of the land of Canaan and the great Roman empire alike, fell prey. Yes, read the record of the ages and you will find that when national, moral, and spiritual ideals and values began to decay, laws and statutes became impotent to save, and the blighting, withering hand of death has been laid upon that nation. Now, my countrymen, treaties of peace are but agreements or covenants among nations and can only have such moral and spiritual ideals and values as the contracting nations breathe into them. And if the contracting nations are devoid of moral and spiritual ideals and values, how, I ask, can they give birth to these things in their covenant of peace? My constant hope, yea, my constant and earnest prayer is that our Government may be drawn close to God and will take the lead in seeing that the peace that follows this devastating war will be founded upon moral and spiritual ideals and values. If it is not, it matters little who the signatories to the peace treaty may be; the treaty, at best, founded as those in the past upon shifting, treacherous earthly sands, will be but another treaty, the prelude to another and greater and more devastating conflict.

Think not, because I am pleading for a recognition of moral and spiritual ideals and values, that I am advocating that visionary and utopian provisions be written into the treaty of peace. Just the contrary. The Master was no dreamer. He was no crackpot. He was no long-haired, visionary theorist. He was a tender, compassionate, though stern and just, realist, that had the spiritual stamina and moral courage to look facts in the face, and He preached the realistic doctrine of love and fair dealings that no man can violate and lead a free, full, and abundant life, no nation ignore and live. Yes, my friends, our every-day experiences prove that there is more hard common sense in the teachings of the Master than the philosophers and publicists ever dreamed of, or the warped, scheming minds of statesmen and diplomats, bent upon the advantage, ever perceived or grasped. In His teachings the Master clearly laid down two fundamentals governing the conduct of man. And, as a nation is but a people as an organized body politic, or, to put it more simple, an aggregation of people owing allegiance to a common government, these principles likewise apply to nations. Let me charge your minds with these two great principles.

Toward the close of the Sermon on the Mount the Master made a great summation in these words:

"Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Now, that is just plain common sense, because our human experiences teach that if we expect our fellow man to treat us right we must treat our fellow man right. And if this is true of individuals, it is true of nations, and it follows that if we expect other nations to treat our nation right, our nation must treat other nations right. Simple, isn't it? Yes, so simple that down through the ages it has confounded the wise.

On another occasion, in answer to a trick question propounded by some slick, hypocritical Pharisee lawyer as to which was the greatest commandment, He answered:

"Thou shall love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

"This is the first and great commandment.

"And the second is like unto it. Thou shall love they neighbor as thyself.

"On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

Just another plain common-sense answer. We all know that malice, and ill will, and hate, and envy are the poisons that engender most of the ills of the world. And our every-day human experiences teach us that if we love our fellowman, if we are considerate of his rights and manifest an interest in his welfare, that 99 times out of a hundred he will respond to our attitude and treat us in the same manner. Now if this is true of individuals it is true of nations, and it follows that if our Nation is considerate of the rights of other nations and manifests an interest in their welfare that they will respond to our attitude in like manner. Simple, isn't it? Yes, so simple that down through the ages it has confounded the wise.

Now I crave your attention while I recite the concluding words of the greatest discourse ever delivered:

"Therefore, whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock:

"And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock.

"And everyone that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand:

"And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the wind blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell; and great was the fall of it."

I have repeated to you the words with which the Master closed the Sermon on the Mount. Oh, my countrymen, following the admonition of the Master, may we become doers of the word; let those two great eternal moral and spiritual truths which I have cited, of love and doing unto others as we would have them do unto us, be the foundation upon which is erected the covenant of peace, and I defy the dwarfed, bigoted men that strutted upon the stage of action after World War No. 1—men whose intellects had been dulled by political passion and whose vision had become blinded by hate and ill will—to again bring on their hell-sent rains and floods and winds of ill will and political advantage. Anchored to such a firm foundation, it will withstand any assault that these moral and intellectual pygmies may be able to make, and will usher into a pilloried, plundered, wrecked, and ruined world a peace that will vouchsafe to our children and our children's children the peaceful habitation of a world prepared by God for the enjoyment of His people.

Now I come to the most serious question ever asked an audience in this country. What will America do? Will she act the part of the wise man, heed the teachings of the Master, and exert her influence and power to see that the treaty of peace has a moral and spiritual foundation, or will she again disregard the teachings of the Master, follow the leadership of moral imbeciles and intellectual neurotics and again build upon the sand? Upon that answer hangs the fate of a crushed, bleeding world.

Listen, my countrymen, while I depict, outside of the tragedy on Calvary, one of the darkest pages in the history of the world. A quarter of a century ago the fate of a war-torn world, eagerly, earnestly praying for peace, hung in the balances, the weight of America being sufficient to tip the scales either way; and the voice of Woodrow Wilson, truly an American prophet, was heard pointing the way. Yes, God in His wisdom had committed to our Nation, as if to test our moral and spiritual character, the decision of a great question, and He had raised up among us a great leader to point the way, and then what happened? Oh, I blush to record that in her hour of destiny America was found wanting and from the high spiritual plane the agonized prayers of our mothers and fathers, as they moaned the butchery and killing of their sons, and prayed that the fathers and mothers of succeeding generations might be spared the bitter cup which had been their portion, had lifted us, descended into a spiritual eclipse, and the fate of a frightened, distorted world was turned over to a vindictive few in high position who, forgetful of their trust to our people, yea, forgetful of their trust to the whole world played cheap ward politics with a bleeding, shattered world and paved the way for the present conflagration.

My friends, the echoes of that senatorial tragedy are the booms of the guns on the beaches of Italy and the islands of the Pacific as today they send forth their missles of death to mow down and kill the most precious flower of Christian civilization, American young manhood. But, I beseech you, place not all the blame upon those few vindicative, misguided leaders. Upon us, whether we relish admitting it or not, rests part of the blame. Had not the greater part of our people walked in spiritual darkness during those fateful, tragic days, American manhood and womanhood would have asserted itself and rendered impossible the betrayal by the vindicative few.

While the Master will not strive with men and nations forever, at the end of this conflict, I hope and pray He is going to give us another chance. What will our answer be? Oh, what will our answer be?

My countrymen, I charge you that with you and the other men and women of America rests the answer. And I am persuaded, and believe me when I say politics are not directing my thoughts, that if we re-elect Mr. Roosevelt we have taken a forward step in answering correctly. I say this because Mr. Roosevelt commands the respect and confidence of more of the peoples of the world today than any other man. I say this because pronouncements that have been made by him, or in which he participated, such as the "Four Freedoms," the Atlantic Charter, and the Mascow Declaration, have the right ring in that they are all based upon moral and spiritual ideals and values.

May God give us a speedy victory and then guide and direct us in the working out of a just and lasting peace, is the prayer I leave with you.

Message of Secretary Harold L. Ickes, Petroleum Administrator for War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the splendid message of Mr. Ickes, delivered by his personal representative, Mr. George A. Wilson, Director of Supply and Transportation, Petroleum Administration for War.

This address was delivered Friday, March 24, 1944, at the dedication exercises of the War Emergency Pipelines, Inc. These exercises were held at one of the 26 pumping stations on the line, or in other words at pumping station No. 22, at Rockwood, Pa.

Mr. Wilson said:

The Petroleum Administrator would have enjoyed speaking to you on an occasion such as this. Unfortunately, he was unable to be present. He has asked me, however, to convey his keen personal regrets and to deliver this message to you on his behalf.

The completion and commencement of operation of the Little Big Inch pipe line may well prove to have been the turning point in the stupendous and arduous task of providing transportation for the enormous quantities of petroleum and petroleum products required to meet the ever-increasing military and essential civilian demands of the eastern seaboard.

How narrow the margin of safety was in providing the heating oil necessary to keep homes warm in the East is amply illustrated by the fact that at the time this pipe line began to deliver heating oil early this month the New York, Boston, and Providence areas were down to less than a 3-day supply of this product.

This second large-diameter pipe line from the great oil-producing area of the Southwest to the eastern seaboard is a petroleum products pipe line, as distinguished from the crude petroleum carriers—the Big Inch. It is as much a direct military facility as it is a civilian project, for it is designed to and will transport both military and essential civilian petroleum supplies. Like its bigger and older brother, it is literally a new additional river of oil—truly the blood plasma of mechanized warfare—pouring oil closer to the European war front and swelling the volume that will help to bring the victory more surely and swiftly.

The War Emergency Pipelines, Inc., constructor and operator of both the Big Inch and the Little Big Inch, is a nonprofit company organized by the oil industry to act as agent for the Defense Plant Corporation in the construction of the facility and for the Defense Supplies Corporation in its operation. These latter two Corporations, subsidiaries of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and agencies of the United States Government, which owns the line, supplied the many millions of dollars required to finance this tremendous undertaking.

The petroleum industry made available without charge its technical facilities, experience, and knowledge for the designing, construction, and operation of the line.

The pipe line could never have become a reality without the priorities obtained from the War Production Board, with the full cooperation of the Army and the Navy.

The Congress of the United States is responsible in no small measure for the achievement of this new war project. Through its passage of the Cole Pipe Line Act, it gave recognition to the importance of petroleum pipe lines as essential instrumentalities of national defense.

This line will stand as an enduring monument to all those whose sweat and toil have built it. During the peak activity of construction on the 2 large pipe lines a total of 16,000 men was employed by the 19 contractors. Each of these men has played an important role in the victory that is to come, for we can assure victory by such instruments of war as this great pipe line and its older partners, the Big Inch—the superarteries for the fighting strength that is impotent in the ground of Texas but invincible when delivered, via the eastern seaboard, to the machines of war across the Atlantic.

And so once again to W. Alton Jones, to his fellow directors of War Emergency Pipelines, to all of their colleagues in the petroleum industry who are fighting the battle of oil transportation, and to everyone who has contributed to the building of this pipe line goes our deepest gratitude for another powerful weapon in our arsenal of democracy to supply the necessary fuel to our armed forces and those of our allies. Particularly is credit well deserved in the realization of this second large petroleum carrier because of the many difficulties and unfortunate accidents that plagued construction progress almost from the beginning and delayed starting of operations for several weeks. Despite these heartbreaking difficulties, however, the job has been done and the line has taken one of the foremost positions in our vast overland transportation system to the east coast.

Skill and hard work have brought the "Little Big Inch" and the "Big Inch" to reality. Now they speed precious fuel—fighting fuel—to our fighting fronts.

We have won another round in the battle of oil.

Office of Price Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a letter sent by Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, to a Mr. H. E. Bradstreet, who is the chairman of the War Price and Rationing Board at Butte, Nebr. I am also inserting Mr. Bradstreet's reply.

The Office of Price Administration is to be commended for asking the advice of a man like Mr. Bradstreet who is out there on the firing line and trying to do a good job in administering the Price Control Act. These volunteer boards are intimately associated with the administration of this act. It seems to me that the complaints made by Mr. Bradstreet are typical of those coming to other boards. The Office of Price Administration has been asking for information. They should follow the considered judgment and advice of the men who know the proper answers to the many difficult problems arising on the home front as it relates to the Office of Price Administration:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1944.

Mr. H. E. BRADSTREET,
Chairman, War Price and Rationing Board, Butte, Nebr.

DEAR MR. BRADSTREET: As you probably know, the bill extending O. P. A. authority is coming up soon; also, our appropriation bill.

In preparing our requests to Congress I feel that we should consult the men most on the firing line in contact with the public, our local board chairmen, as to what changes, if any, should be made in our plans and operations. I do not want a reply which just says we are doing a fine service to the people unless you sincerely think so. I want a real appraisal of our faults as well as our virtues.

Is or is not O. P. A. rendering a worthwhile service to the people of your community?

How could we do a better job?

Particularly, are there any changes in our powers which you personally would recommend to Congress?

A completely frank letter will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator.

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Butte, Nebr., March 17, 1944.

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter requesting an appraisal of the O. P. A., as to its value to the public and its methods of operation. Here are my conclusions taken from my experiences and discussions with other board members and Mr. John Q. Public.

First. I believe that the theory of O. P. A. is good. I believe that price control should have applied to labor as well as food, rents, etc., but as it is, it resembles the tail of a kite; it is being whipped to pieces by the kite (labor). O. P. A. has not been able to function as it should because of this fact.

Second. The regulations of the O. P. A. cover too much territory. Some of the rules cannot be enforced in some parts of the United States, since people live under different environments and circumstances. The climatic conditions also vary. In spite of these facts, O. P. A. officials insist on enforcing these regulations without exceptions from coast to coast and from border to border. Tires, for instance, are rationed according to the number of registered cars in any given county. This is far from satisfactory, because here in the Middle West people live greater distances from the towns or villages where they do their business and must travel over roads that are not surfaced as they are in eastern Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, and farther east, and they consequently use and need more tires because of these distances and road conditions. This will also apply to the consumption of gasoline.

Third. Absolutely too much waste of time and red tape. One-third of the personnel employed could be dispensed with and drafted for service, either in the military, defense, or other production plants. There is no need of one or more officials (or so-called experts) being sent here and there and elsewhere each week trying to explain to the local boards some new laws or the changes in the old regulations, without knowing too much about the matter themselves.

Procedure: A bulletin is sent out to all boards. In a few days an expert appears to explain the instructions. This certain expert tells you a certificate is not necessary to purchase a cook stove. In another few days another expert appears on the scene telling you a certificate is necessary from the A. A. A., the buyer drives to the A. A. A. office wasting gas and tires to obtain a certificate.

But to his disgust he learns that the A. A. A. never heard about such certificates. If the O. P. A. is so insistent on saving gas and tires let the so-called officials do less driving. It is a good motto to follow at any time: "Practice what you preach." Example speaks louder than words.

Fourth. The enforcement of O. P. A. rules have turned out to be a farce. Practically every application reads: "10 and 10 for any violation." From time to time a case is tried only as a deterrent. Hundreds of violations occur every day but they are ignored by the officials until the whole set-up has become a huge joks. If the O. P. A. is so necessary in every respect, then the enforcement of its regulations are also absolutely necessary. A law or a regulation without a sanction does not give sense.

Fifth. It has been said that the O. P. A. is unpopular because it takes something away from the individual. It is not the taking away that makes the O. P. A. unpopular but the inconsistent and red-tape methods used in doing so. Every local board I am sure is willing and desirious of assisting in any manner possible to carry on this program but I know some or most of them are quite disgusted with some of the procedure.

In conclusion every American I am sure would give his shirt to aid in any program that will help win the war but resents and will not tolerate his shirt being pulled from his back with impudence when his shirt is not needed.

In behalf of the local board of Boyd County, Nebr., we assure you of our continued cooperation and assistance in every manner possible regardless of the foregoing criticism.

Respectfully yours,

H. E. BRADSTREET,
Chairman.

War Production on the Home Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 21, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address which I delivered Sunday, March 26, 1944, over stations WSOO, Sault St. Marie, Mich., and WMAM, Marinette, Wis.:

In these broadcasts each week, I have from time to time brought you stories from the production front here at home. As frequently as my legislative duties will permit, I have made it a practice to visit our war-production plants. I have seen things which cause me, on the one hand, to marvel, and on the other, to learn the partial reason for our phenomenal successes on the fighting front.

Let me assure every mother, wife, father, sister, and brother that your fighting men are getting materiél—the best materiél that can be made by Americans, for Americans, and on most fronts in the quantities they need. Such has not invariably been true in the southwest Pacific.

A few weeks ago, I visited the great plant of the Cleveland Diesel Engine Division of the General Motors Corporation in Cleveland, Ohio I can best sum up the whole trip by saying that, while in this great plant, the thought kept recurring to my mind, "The war at sea is being fought right here in Cleveland." Even to a layman, uninitiated in the secrets of production, the feeling of achievement, gained through production genius, is sensed. Here I stood in the midst of a great organization, hundreds of men, countless machines, completely coordinated to one end—more and more Diesel engines for our Navy.

This story at Cleveland Diesel is really the story of one man—George W. Codrington, vice president of General Motors and general manager of the Cleveland Diesel engine division. This is a story which goes back almost 30 years; 30 long years of industrial pioneering; 30 years of heartbreaking effort, which only came into its own when our Nation stood with her back to the wall. I am told that the first Diesel engine was completed there in 1913. There were many obstacles to the general acceptance of this engine. But these courageous men at Cleveland were undaunted and went ahead, because they were convinced that the Diesel engine would play an important part in the building of America.

To show you how much these men have achieved in a comparatively short time, it will suffice to point out that in 1934, the first Diesel engine of American design, built in Cleveland, was installed in a United States Navy submarine. This event means much to us today, because our submarines have sent such a vast amount of enemy shipping to the bottom of the sea.

In the years between 1934 and 1940, the year in which we seriously started our defense program, these same men were hard at work building and perfecting the powerful engines which today are playing such an important role in the war.

Came 1940, and every industry in the Nation was called upon to put forth the maximum amount of effort to insure the necessary materials we would need in the event of war. Of course, at this time, we hoped we would not enter the conflict, but we did feel it was best to prepare.

When I went through this plant in Cleveland, I could reconstruct the history of the years from 1940 to today. Here was a small group of men with industrial "know how." They had developed a product and they knew its worth. It was left only for them to be called by their country and they could do the job.

At the beginning of the defense program, I am told that the plant facilities at Cleveland Diesel comprised only 240,273 square feet but, today, this floor space has been increased to 691,030 square feet—almost three times that of 1940.

Then, too, the personnel of the plant was increased 787.73 percent. Men were brought in to work. These were not highly trained technicians for the most part, but they were the corner grocery boy, the salesman, the farmer—in fact, any man who was willing to put his shoulder to the wheel and help in the gigantic task that lay before him. These staunch Americans realized that everything they held dear in life was at stake, and they were more than willing to do their parts in insuring our way of life.

I stopped and talked with some of these production workers. It was the same story repeated over and over—they felt they were doing their job. One man summed up the whole idea in these words—"Sure, we're giving it Hades because this is our war, too." This is esprit de corps of the highest type. In these few words is the explanation why this organization has not lost a single man-hour of work in their plants because of any labor difficulties. This is a great, magnificent, coordinated team and the team starts at the top of the organization and goes down to the newest man in the shop. You can't come in this plant and not realize that teamwork is the essence of this business. And the essence of that teamwork is the fact that when I walked through that plant with George Codrington, it was "Hello, Frank," "Hello, Charley," "Hello, Pete," and the answer invariably was "Hello, George, how's everything going?" In other words, George Codrington knows every man in that plant by his first name and they know him by his first name. You don't have labor disputes when you have a mutual affection such as that. George Codrington would fight for every last man in that plant, and every last man in that plant would fight for George Codrington.

It appalls me when I think how much was asked of so few. The few in this case were those men of management, upon whom fell the whole load of planning and producing. The courage required of these men is no less than that required of the soldier on the battlefield. These men of foresight knew too well that not only their own very existences were in the balance, but the life of every man who went forth under arms was just as deeply involved.

The marvel of this program lies not only in the work done in the plant of the Cleveland Diesel engine division of General Motors, but in the extensive subcontracting program that was undertaken. Chronologically, the story will read something like this:

The initial order for defense material was received from the United States Navy in June 1940. It was immediately evident that the Cleveland Diesel engine division would be called upon to produce an unprecedented number of engines to satisfy the demand. Expansion was the order of the day. This order demanded the widest expansion of engineering ability to available productive facilities.

Subcontracting was not a new idea to these people—but subcontracting on the scale that would be required if they were to meet the demand seemed almost perilous. Now, there was no time to debate the pros and cons of the issue, but the job had to be taken in hand—come what may. The Navy needed engines, and the only answer was subcontracting. The record will speak for itself and will prove the wisdom of the men who so courageously undertook the job.

Within one year from the date of the first defense order, production had been stepped up 12 times. By December 31, 1942, this figure had been jumped to 24 times. At the end of December 1943, production was, unbelievably, 40 times that of 1940. I present this record to the highest court in our land, the court of public opinion. This tribunal can only find one verdict—a stupendous task well done, the American way.

The full and entire story of this subcontracting story will never be known. It is too vast and, too, it again is a page of Americana. I saw a large map in the office of Mr. Codrington. It was a map of the United States, and that map was dotted. The dots extended from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It looked very much to me like the kind of map with which we were so familiar in peacetimes, the map that was used by every selling organization. And I was surprised that such a map would survive the ravages of war, but this was not a sales map. It was a map of subcontractors. I was told that these dots represented more than 400 subcontractors and that the total number of people employed by these subcontractors was more than 94,000. These 94,000 people are wholly or partially employed in producing material which ultimately will go into engines for the Navy. Translating this story further, it means that for every person working at Cleveland Diesel, almost 20 others are employed by subcontractors.

Still the full story of subcontracting has not been told. In many instances, the responsibility of the prime contractor, Cleveland Diesel, did not end with the allocation of the order to the supplier. No, very often, new buildings had to be built and the prime contractor saw to it that the buildings were built. From time to time, employment problems had to be straightened out and, again, the prime contractor handled the problem. Then too, the prime contractor is continuously assisting the subcontractors in the procurement of material. In fact, the prime contractor could very well be likened to a mother who could and would ease the burden of her troubled child.

I said earlier that the force behind this great production effort was George W. Codrington. I can best illustrate this by a story that was told to me by one of his associates. It seems that the Navy was in need of a particular type of vessel, but it was difficult to find a builder. Mr. Codrington was asked for suggestions and his answer was, "I'll build them myself." Again, the record stands, the boats were built in record time.

Very briefly, I have outlined the task that confronted these people in Cleveland. I have told you how that problem was attacked, and there is left only for me to point out the result. The result is that 1,393 vessels, powered with Diesel engines manufactured at this plant in Cleveland, were accepted by the Navy in 1943. This figure does not reveal any military secrets. In fact, if the enemy should learn that almost 1,400 vessels were powered by one plant in this country, they would get little comfort. They would know that America means business. And we're in there until the end—the end being the way we specify it

When I left these people in Cleveland and left their great plant, I bowed my head and said, "Thank God, I am an American, and that I live in America."

REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague from Missouri in expressions of deepest regret at the passing of Charley Keyser. The oldest newspaper correspondent in Washington, and for many years the dean of the Press Gallery, he has sent his last wire, and his copy this morning is marked "30." For something like 40 years—the most eventful 40 years in the history of the Nation—he represented one of the great newspapers of the country, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. In that long and useful career he rendered a notable service, not only to his paper but to his profession. During his service on the Hill here practically every local newspaper organization had its origin, and the very ethics which now govern the fraternity were largely developed, and in both fields he was an active and helpful participant. Perhaps the greatest attribute of a reporter—after the fundamentals have been provided—is fairness. Few realize the extent of the plenary powers exercised by the established newspapermen who cover the House. By a single irrelevant adjective, in an otherwise impeccably accurate account, a newspaper article may contribute materially to the dismissal of a Member from the House and conversely, by the bare mention of his name in strategic association, elevate him to national acclaim. Charley Keyser never took unwarranted advantage of this prerogative. He was always fair, generous, and—our greatest need here on the floor—charitable. He was a great reporter, a great friend, and a great man. He will have a byline on the other side. Peace to his ashes.

"Back the Invasion" Rally

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and pertinent speech delivered by the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TUNNELL] at Baltimore last Sunday at a "Back the Invasion" rally.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I desire to congratulate those who are responsible for this meeting. I desire to congratulate those who realize that production is necessary to the winning of the war. I desire to congratulate the mayor of Baltimore upon his broad and patriotic proclamation calling for a spirit of national unity and for support of the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy in order to assure victory for the armies of liberation. The mayor has touched the keynote of this whole situation. There are those who apparently assume that this war is being won without plan, without guidance, and from some I gather the impression that it is being won without patriotism. I saw an article a few days ago entitled "The Morning After." That is a very suggestive and thought-provoking title. I thought of the morning after Pearl Harbor. I thought of the efforts which the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy had made before Pearl Harbor to persuade the Congress of the United States that it was necessary to prepare for the coming inevitable struggle. I thought of the exposed position of our whole western coast after Pearl Harbor. I thought of our shortage of airplanes. I thought of our shortage of capital ships. Seven out of eight of our battleships at Pearl Harbor had been destroyed or at least temporarily put out of commission. I thought of the mental condition of our citizens all over this Nation who had been told that there was no danger of war. There could never be an invasion of the United States. Our Territories were free from possibility of attack.

On the morning after Pearl Harbor the territory of the United States, including the mainland, was wide open to attack. Submarines at once began destroying our commerce in the Atlantic Ocean. Those who had sneered at the warning which had been given to America by the Commander in Chief were now utterly dismayed. We had our America First lecturers who had spread the seed of dissension in America. That title America First was intended as an implication that those responsible for the operation of the Government were considering some other nation before they were America and in preference to America.

We had seen the great struggle which the Commander in Chief had made for selective service in order that the United States might have an army drilled for actual combat. We had seen the great struggle for lend-lease on the floors of Congress. We had seen the attempt of the isolationists, some for party reasons, some for factional reasons, and some from personal hatred of the President, who had fought the passage of lend-lease. This law enabled democratic countries to continue the fight against the totalitarian powers until the United States became a participant in the war. We had seen the struggle in Congress by the isolation group to prevent American ships from using the high seas to carry articles of food to Great Britain. We heard the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy called a warmonger, an interventionist, a man crazy with personal ambition.

The increase in airplanes in the United States by 500 had been fought desperately by the isolation group. The fortification of American territory was opposed and prevented by the same group. It can be of little satisfaction to the American people at this time to be told that those persons who opposed the preparation of the United States for the inevitable world struggle were conscientious. It matters little whether the persons who opposed these preparations were from the State of Ohio or the State of North Carolina. It matters little whether they were Republicans or Democrats. As a matter of fact there were some of each. Their attitude, to put it mildly, is proof of their lack of foresight. What America should know is where these people have been in the present struggle. While you have been producing, where have they been? The fence sitters, chairwarmers, and obstructionists now want to take charge of America. Had they been entirely successful in their former efforts there would have been little of America to defend.

The Commander in Chief came to the Presidency at one of the lowest ebbs in American history. Thirteen millions were unemployed. American industry had caused a concentration of population in the large cities where they could be in close proximity to the factories and workshops of America.

But the factories were closed. Men do not eat stones, mortar, and bricks. Bread lines were the rule. America was discouraged. The administration offered no aid or helpful suggestions.

I stood in front of the Capitol on March 4, 1933, and I observed the outgoing President and the incoming President on that date. I heard the incoming President state that what America needed was leadership. Where were those vociferous critics of the Government of the United States at that time? There was a business stagnation. During the years from 1929 to 1933, inclusive, there were 391,500 farm foreclosures. During the same period there were 979,900 nonfarm foreclosures During the year 1933 there were 95,200 farm foreclosures. During the year 1943 there were 5,802, or about one-nineteenth of the foreclosures in 1933. There were during the year 1933, 252,400 nonfarm real-estate foreclosures, and in 1943, 25,699, or about one-tenth of the foreclosures in 1933. The President told us that the only thing we had to fear was fear itself. America then had its leadership. America would have its recovery.

The total income of the United States in 1932 was less than $40,000,000,000. The income of the United States for 1943 was more than $140,000,000,000. I am not referring to the income of the Government. I am referring to the total income of the Nation. They tell us that we are spending in this war $100,000,000,000 a year. America is making all that it made in 1932 and $100,000,000,000 a year in addition

In other words, America is making its 1932 income in addition to the cost of the war in 1944. They tell us that this is possible because of the war. However, in 1940, a year before Pearl Harbor, the income of the United States had increased from less than forty billions to $77,000,000,000. This was not war. In fact, war conditions in Europe had curtailed in many respects our commercial output. The morning after March 4, 1933, America had a leader. American energy, American capital, American agriculture, and American labor have been victorious. The battle of the domestic front has been won. But the war clouds had been gathering over Europe.

Where were the critics of the American Government in 1932? They were less vociferous then. I'll tell you where they were. They were in their offices attempting to figure out their own solvency. Where were the businessmen who today shout about dictators? They were on their knees praying for loans such as that granted to the Dawes Bank in Chicago They were in the back rooms of their banks pleading for credit. They were in the offices of the sheriffs throughout this land begging for an extension of time before the sales of their homes and businesses.

In 1939, where were those critics? They had recovered their equilibrium then. American labor was employed. American factories were open. Smoke was coming from the stacks of American industry. American citizens were engaged in building homes, in buying automobiles, in educating their children, in building churches, hospitals, and all kinds of public improvements. America was in step. There were those who believed that there was no world outside of America. They were isolationists. Our banking system has been put upon a permanent basis. American citizens no longer fear to put their legitimate earnings in the commercial banks of America. Bureaus, mattresses, sideboards, and closets have ceased to be the depositories of America's earnings.

Under the new leadership America is safe, American savings are safe in legitimate channels. The S. E. C. protects people against swindling security operators. The N. R. A. of 1933 had given confidence that America could continue to exist from an industrial standpoint. The right of collective bargaining was guaranteed by the Wagner Act of 1934. The rights of labor were recognized by the Federal Government. Oh, we are told today that the Federal Government is being operated for the benefit of labor. They don't mean just this. What they mean is that the Federal Government is not being operated against labor. They mean that the laboring people of America are recognized as American citizens with right of petition guaranteed under the Constitution. And after all, the workingman of America constitutes a pretty large percentage of the people of the United States. We are told that by July 1 of this year there will be 53,400,000 of these people in America. They and their families constitute no small percentage of American citizens. The Truman report of February 7, 1944, estimated unemployment at 1,000,000 instead of 13,000,000. There are those who assume that these improvements in conditions were the result of some immutable law of economics. They don't think that this was the result of either intelligent planning or patriotic labor. The American Government is functioning for the benefit of the American people, and not for a limited number of its citizens.

But let us go back to the United States of America on December 8, 1941, the morning after. Our Regular Army had been allowed to dwindle between 1922 and 1933. Our Army had actually grown less by more than 11,000 men in the 11 years between those two dates. Our Navy at the end of 1921 had a tonnage of 1,304,513 tons of combat shipping. On December 31, 1932, the Navy consisted of 1,020,810 tons of combat shipping. If the number of tons of shipping under contract in each of those years is taken into consideration, the Navy had actually decreased 896,610 tons. Under the leadership of the present Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, every move for the increase of either the Army or Navy was fought by the isolationists until Pearl Harbor. But what is the condition now in America under the leadership of this same Commander in Chief? From an insignificant force of airplanes the Government expects during 1944 to manufacture approximately 10,000 planes per month. In 1944 the merchant fleet of the United States will reach 35,000,000 tons. Great Britain's Fleet will reach the total of 20,000,000 tons. The naval vessels of all sorts on July 1, 1941, numbered 2,136. On July 1, 1944, the naval vessels of all kinds of the United States Navy will reach the enormous total of 41,179.

In 1939 there was manufactured in the United States 53,000,000 tons of steel. In 1944 it is proposed to manufacture 93,000,000 tons of steel. In 1944 the manufacture of synthetic rubber will reach the enormous total of 850,000 tons. In 1939 passenger mileage on American railroads reached the total of 22,600,000,000 miles. In 1943 it reached the total of 85,000,000,000 passenger-miles. War plants constructed in America since the outbreak of the war totaled in value $20,000,000,000. We have between March 1941 and July 1943 furnished our allies with nearly $14,000,000,000 in either money or goods under the lend-lease law. We have today in all branches of the military service approximately 10,000,000 men, which will be increased by more than 1,000,000 during the present year. Agriculture has lived up to its requirements. It has increased between 1939 and 1943 by 24 percent. Agriculture has been able from year to year, notwithstanding the curtailment of its manpower, to increase production. Labor has produced its share of men in uniform and has produced as never before the world's requirements in food, war equipment, and the necessities of life. The tremendous accomplishment of America since December 7, 1941, can be only the result of unparalleled cooperation between labor and management, between labor, management, and government. I receive bitter letters of criticism against labor and labor unions. I receive bitter letters of criticism against the Government. I receive bitter letters of criticism against management of industry. I desire to remind those critics that things can't be entirely hopeless in America when we have come through as a nation since 1941 as no nation ever did progress before. No such progress could have been made without the intelligent cooperation of government, management, and labor. Yet, the progress of government even in this war has not been without constant, unremitting opposition. Members of Congress boast of their loyalty to the Government in time of war. They boast of the fact that they have voted for appropriations for war expenses. They voted for these belated appropriations, and then complained constantly to the American people because of the amount the Government is spending, because of the number of persons the Government employs, ignoring the fact that the Government must have more employees to handle the tremendous job it is handling at this time. They complain of the total indebtedness of the Nation when they have been the ones to vote the appropriations and to grant the power of expenditure to the Executive.

Within the last 3 months I have seen Congress pass legislation calculated to deprive American boys in uniform of their privilege of voting. These men and women in uniform constitute somewhere from a fifth to a fourth of the total probable voters of the Nation. Yet every imaginable argument was used which was calculated to deprive those boys and girls in uniform of the opportunity to vote. We have heard much about the State plan of voting and the Federal plan of voting. Senator EASTLAND, from Mississippi, who introduced a bill for the so-called State plan told the Senate that his purpose was to preserve white supremacy. Senator HOLMAN, from Oregon, another supporter of the so-called State plan, told the Senate that if the President of the United States would say that he would not be a candidate for reelection, the opposition to the Federal ballot would be withdrawn, and the Federal bill would be passed in 30 minutes. And we saw a combination of 24 Democrats and 18 Republicans pass the so-called State ballot bill through the Senate. Prior to the time this bill was passed in the Senate, the Army and Navy sent representatives before the congressional committees to acquaint the members of the committees with the fact that individual ballots sent to individual men in the armed service from the 48 States would have a very remote chance of being counted in the coming election. Those Senators who feared the colored vote in the South and those who feared the Roosevelt vote in the North combined to prevent the men and women in the armed forces from exercising their constitutional right of voting in an American election. There was no conflict between the Federal ballot and the State ballot. The Federal ballot provided that if a person voted both ballots, only the State ballot would be counted. In spite of this fact 15 Democrats from the South combined with 22 Republicans and 1 Democrat from the North and West to prevent as many as possible of the men and women in service from voting the Federal ballot which in all probability means the prevention of their voting at all in the coming election. The objective of these Senators had been clearly stated by Senators EASTLAND and HOLMAN some days before the vote. The purpose of preventing the vote to these service men and women is that there may be a government of a part of the people, by a part of the people, and for a part of the people.

A few days ago in the Congress an appropriation for the Federal Communications Commission was cut. It was asserted, without any real contradiction in the Senate, that the Federal Communications Commission was instrumental in preventing and detecting espionage; that it had saved countless lives of men in the service by its activities. The chairman of the Communications Commission appeared before congressional committees and explained the functions of that Commission. The President of the United States asked for a continuation of the appropriation, but the Federal Communications Commission has been attempting to prevent a monopoly of ideas in the hands of special interests in radio programs. Congress cut the appropriation, notwithstanding the war necessity, notwithstanding the fact that this decrease will in all probability lengthen the war and increase the number of American casualties. One of the recognized principles of international law is that where armed forces are responsible for the destitution of civilian population, there is an obligation on the part of those forces causing the destitution to aid in the relief of such conditions which would result in starvation, riots, and pestilence. The United Nations have formed an organization known as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The resolution authorizing an appropriation for this purpose was written principally by a member of the Foreign Relations Committee not a member of the President's party. When the conference report on this resolution came before the Senate it was opposed by 22 Senators because a useless amendment offered by a member of the opposition had been dropped in conference. These 22 men voted to recommit the resolution to the conference committee because of that omission. But this was not all. When the Senate refused to recommit, 9 members of the anti-administration forces voted against the resolution itself. By this vote they were opposing the relief of starvation in countries where such condition is caused by the forces of the United Nations.

Where are we going to be on the morning after the next election? This war is not yet won. Thanks to the management of Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek, it is being won. Under the American system of government who will manage this war after the next election? We shall have more than 11,000,000 men and women in uniform. In whose hands are we going to trust their lives? Are we going to trust them to those who opposed the war? Are we going to trust them to those who have voted to prevent their having the privilege of voting? Are we going to trust them to those who have while giving "lip service" to patriotism never hesitated to say or do the things that would arouse the greatest antagonism in America, and offer the greatest encouragement to our enemies? To whom is America to trust its tremendous business and war interests? Whom is labor to trust on the day after the November election?

In the third annual Truman report of March 3, 1944, we find the following language: "Labor has fought an up-hill fight to obtain recognition of its rights. These rights must be preserved, and it would be most unfortunate if they should be impaired by imposing upon labor Government regulations and restrictions." I don't need to tell this audience that the Congress of the United States is not at this time prolabor. The votes on the Smith-Connally bill and the vote on the requirement of labor organizations to file reports of their financial transactions discriminating against labor will show you not only the vote on labor but it will show you the personnel in Congress who are antilabor.

But where shall we be on the morning after an armistice has been signed? To whom is the world looking for cool management and intelligent foresight in after-the-war problems. Woodrow Wilson foresaw this war. He did all that it was possible for one human being to do to prevent the war. Personal animosities, factional hatreds, and partisan zeal after World War No. 1 guaranteed World War No. 2. We are paying in dollars, sweat, blood, and tears for those animosities, those hatreds, and that zeal. It requires no prophet to foresee World War No. 3 unless it is prevented by intelligent foresight. World War No. 3 will be guaranteed and assured if the American people stack the next Congress with isolationists and partisan zealots who prefer to fight their political opponents in America rather than totalitarian opponents in Europe.

Who is the man in America best fitted by experience, by knowledge of the history leading up to the present war to prevent its repetition? Unless America wakes to its danger, not only will the humanitarian laws of the United States, the laws providing for old-age relief, unemployment relief, and all of those humanitarian reliefs which come from social security be abolished, but all prolabor laws will be abolished; all laws for the uplift of America will be abolished or modified. Not only will these be wiped out, but World War No. 3 will be in its inception and well on its way toward consummation. If those who have consistently fought the preparation of the United States for war, have fought every act intended to strengthen the United States by expenditure of money, those who have criticized every move of the Commander in Chief in the war—if these men are placed at the head of the Government the morning after, we may as well resign ourselves to the sacrifices of an intolerable peace and the horrors of another general conflagration. But what can we do to prevent this situation? The only weapon which the American citizen has with which to preserve his rights is the ballot. The American soldier and sailor will in all probability be deprived of their ballots, to a very large extent. The rest of America, including the capitalist, the industrialist, the agriculturist, and the great army of labor will have an opportunity to vote at the coming election. In order to vote in most of the United States, one must be registered. Are you men and women registered for the next elections? Because of war conditions, thousands of men and women are in States far distant from their places of registration. It requires some sacrifice in order to register. You had better register. Without this registration, on election day and the morning after you will be helpless. The duty of registering and voting is one that you owe to yourselves, to your children, to your posterity, to your State, to your Nation, and to a war-torn world. Register and vote as your conscience may dictate for a continuation of intelligent management of the war, a continued production of the necessities for war, and for an intelligent planning for means of preventing a repetition of this World War. The duty is yours. The opportunity is yours. The credit or the blame will be yours the morning after November 7, 1944.

Washington, Mass., First Town in United States To Be Named After George Washington

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, from time to time claims are advanced on behalf of various communities in the United States which bear the name of Washington that they were the first cities or towns to be named for the Father of our Country. Most recently, this distinction has been advanced in favor of towns in Georgia, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Kentucky, as well as for the Nation's Capital. However, information has lately come to light which conclusively proves all such claims to be spurious. The fact is that the first town in the United States to be named after George Washington is Washington, Mass., a community of unsurpassed rural beauty which nestles in the heart of the Berkshire Hills in the western part of the Old Bay State.

Miss Marguerite E. Schulze, of Washington, Mass., who has done extensive research into the history of her native town, has uncovered evidence which shows beyond dispute that this lovely old mountain town was the first to honor the first President of the United States by taking his name as its own. She calls attention to the fact that in 1927, when the town observed its one hundred and fiftieth anniversary with a program in honor of so distinguished an occasion, a well-known writer for a Boston newspaper said without equivocation that Washington, Mass., was the first to be named for the Father of his Country. In connection with the claim, this writer pointed out that 6 days before the town was incorporated, April 12, 1777, General Washington was having difficulties in holding his little Continental Army together and had issued an order granting amnesty to deserters if they would return to duty by May 15. In these dark days, the faith of the founders of Washington in the Commander in Chief of the Colonial Army shone like a beacon light, and I venture to say that the general found hope and courage in this act of loyalty and confidence when the news reached him that he had been so honored.

The little town of Washington, Mass., is one of the most beautiful it has ever been my good fortune to visit. In the October Mountain Forest, the town possesses without doubt the most beautiful natural forest in the eastern part of the United States. Its climate, delightfully cool in summer, adds to its attractiveness to visitors, who return year after year to enjoy the peace and simple grandeur of this mountain hamlet.

I am taking the liberty to include as part of these remarks the following excerpt from an account of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary celebration of the incorporation of the town, which took place on July 4, 1927. The account is taken from the Springfield (Mass.) Union and I have selected those parts of it which are devoted to a brief but highly interesting history of the town as given on the occasion by Philip Mack Smith, then a member of the staff of the Library of Congress. The excerpt follows:

WASHINGTON, July 4.—On one of the coldest Fourths ever known in this Berkshire Hills town 2,000 feet above the sea level, so cold that even in the railroad station in the valley a coal fire was kept burning all day, and so windy on the hill that the Welcome banner was split in two, Washington, with its 231 inhabitants, successfully observed today the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its incorporation, April 12, 1777. Among the 500 visitors were people from Cleveland, Ohio; Knoxville, Tenn.; Paterson, N. J.; Washington, D. C.; Hartford and Middletown, Conn., while almost every town in western Massachusetts was represented, including quite a number from Springfield.

In his historical address, which was the main feature of the day, Philip Mack Smith, of Washington, D. C., of the Research Department, Library of Congress, portrayed the early struggles of the settlers of the town called successively Watsontown, Greenock, Hartwood, and, finally, Washington, the second town in America to be named for the Father of His Country. He told how the proprietors from Connecticut had to repurchase the land from the Indians owing to the trickery of Robert Watson, experienced trouble as to where the exact site should be, underwent a lawsuit with a candidate for the ministry when two ministers were called and accepted at about the same time, experienced a revolt of part of the settlers who wanted to be in a separate plantation, got into a row with town of Lee as to payment of the Province taxes, and suffered from the unrest caused by Shay's Rebellion.

But Washington, he said, emerged from its trials and at one time boasted 1,000 inhabitants. Though it now has only a little more than one-fifth of that number, Mr. Smith prophesied it will have an enviable record as a summer resort and even in agriculture and industry better times may be in store, he thought.

Mr. Smith portrayed the pioneer period of the town considering, first of all, the reasons why there was such a demand for the wild lands in the Berkshire Hills beginning about 1750. He showed the necessity which existed that the farmers of those days should have cheap lands where they could raise their large families. Hence the migration into western Massachusetts. The speaker noted that the wars that broke out, King George's War in 1744 and the French and Indian War in 1754 interfered with this migration but with the end of the French supremacy in Canada, western Massachusetts again became attractive as a homeland for young settlers. Such was the situation which led to the settlement of Washington.

Continuing, Mr. Smith said, "The trials of the founders of Washington were so unusual that they loom large in the records of the General Court. In 1757 Robert Watson, of Sheffield, bargained with certain Indians at Stockbridge for the purchase of their title to a large tract lying between Pittsfield and Becket and bordering west on the Housatonic River from Pittsfield's south line to the north line of Great Barrington.

"The same year Watson, assisted by his attorney, David Ingersoll, also of Sheffield, offered the tract for sale to Nathaniel Hooker, a banker of Hartford. Hooker and his friends purchased this tract as a speculation, and, arriving on the ground, were interrupted by the former Indian owners, who declared that Watson had paid only a part of the purchase price of the land. Upon investigation Watson was found to be insolvent and in jail; whereupon the proprietors repurchased the tract directly from the Indians for 179 pounds.

"The tract was now called 'Greenock' after a Scotch town of this name. Sixty-four lots of 100 acres each were laid out on both sides of the main street and along the northern boundary toward Pittsfield. There were 52 proprietors.

"In December 1760 the proprietors bound themselves within the next 10 months to clear 3 acres of land on each lot, girdle 7 acres, and build a log house 16 feet square. Before this could be done the provincial government at Boston informed the proprietors that the basic title to all wild lands was vested in the Province and not in the Indians. As a result, a payment of 800 pounds to the Province was necessary to establish their title. This was the third time that the proprietors had put up a substantial sum of money to maintain their title to the plantation. Arrangements for the payment of the money were made through John Walker, one of the leading proprietors, and the plantation was renamed 'Hartwood.' Other conditions also had to be fulfilled. Within 5 years 60 settlers must be living on the plantation and a learned Protestant minister settled. One lot must be preserved for the support of the ministry, another for the first minister, and a third for the support of 'schooling.'"

Mr. Smith gave the names of the original settlers of the town to whom in 1768, 25 acres were granted to recompense them for their early hardships and noted that these were the original founders of Washington. All of these were originally from Connecticut. Of the proprietors those from Massachusetts came chiefly from Westfield, he said. By January 1767 enough people were living in the community to make necessary the erection of a meeting house. But it was not until October 7, 1772, that the first meeting of the proprietors was held at the meeting house.

TOWN SUED BY MINISTER

Mr. Smith then noted that the lot for the minister on the main highway is now the site of St. Andrew's Chapel. He then told of the curious legal tangle which ensued when the town had to defend itself in an action brought by Rev. Aaron Bliss, of Springfield, called to be pastor in December 1773, but who found before he could begin his duties that Rev. William Gay Ballantine, of Westfield, had also been tendered a call to be pastor and had accepted. Mr. Ballantine was pastor in Washington for 46 years.

NEW TOWN NAMED

On April 12, 1777, after much delay, the General Court approved the bill incorporating the Hartwood tract as a whole, with the addition of the adjoining grants on the north. The new town was named Washington, in honor of the commander of the Continental Army, who had a few months previous redeemed the patriot cause from failure by his successes at Princeton and Trenton. At the time of its incorporation Washington possessed the largest amount of land in its history. In this large area there were living 750 people, according to the census of 1776.

Mr. Smith then related the circumstances attending the setting off of Lee, named for Gen. Charles Lee, and proceeded to describe Washington's contribution to the Revolutionary War and stated that the military services of no less than 75 Washington men have been identified. The difficult period of readjustment culminating in 1786 in Shay's Rebellion was described and the fact was noted that in spite of the troublesome times the migration from Connecticut continued with vigor.

Mr. Smith told of the havoc wrought by lightning in striking the old meeting house of 1792, and also the church erected in 1849, which was the victim of a bolt from the heavens in 1877. The speaker spoke of the present opportunity for worship on the hill through the gift by the Crane family in 1899 of the attractive stone chapel of the St. Andrew's Episcopal Society.

Reference to activities of Methodists and Baptists in the early days were referred to and the historian told of early schools and their records dating back to 1783. The opening of the Pontoosuc Turnpike was coincident with the period of Washington's greatest prosperity, it was stated, and due attention was paid to the sheep industry and the raising of fat cattle which were maintained with profit until after the Civil War.

LIST OF NOTED MEN

Due recognition of the migration of Washington pioneers to Ohio and other sections of the West and Northwest was given and in closing Mr. Smith told of Washington's part in later wars and concluded with a list of some of the men who have gone out from Washington to carve careers of conspicuous usefulness. On this point he said:

"Others more familiar than I am with the old Washington families can tell you of the many men who have gone out from Washington, achieved honor, fame, and fortune in other places. Among them were Amos S. Crane, a prominent railroad official in Boston; Edwin H. Eames, who was in the Engineer Corps in the Civil War; Robert M. Savery, well known for many years as deputy sheriff and court crier in Pittsfield; and John W. Crane, of Springfield, a successful businessman and gifted writer and speaker on the history of Washington. Much might be written of the prominent families of the town, the Eameses, Pomeroys, the Bills, the Chapels, the Congdons and Millikans, the Saverys, the Manleys, the Messengers, the Sargents, and others. Probably the most famous living descendant of an old Washington family is Robert A. Millikan, the distinguished physicist of Chicago and California.

"In the more recent past Washington has suffered severely from the loss of the farms in its western part which were absorbed into the Whitney estate. It seems likely, however, with the improvement of roads and trails through the reservation by the State, and with its wealth of natural beauty, Washington will eventually attain an enviable place as a summer resort town. Even in agriculture and industry better times may be in store. Forestry is an increasingly important occupation. Sheep raising may again become profitable. For all these and other reasons, those who attend the two hundredth anniversary of Washington 50 years hence, will find this old summit town transformed perhaps into a renowned summer or winter playground, but at all events a prosperous and happy agricultural community, still loyal to the best traditions of all who in the past have helped to make life in Washington pleasurable and worth while."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me over Station WMCA, Saturday, March 25, 1944:

Ten years ago our sleep was troubled with the knowledge that all was not well in the ailing corners of the world. We were fearful then that the isolated, seemingly unrelated, fires could blaze into an all-embracing conflagration, but apparently we had little difficulty in quieting our misgivings. We gave respite to our conscience by labeling the portents as "absurd," "pompous," "ridiculous." The color of shirts became a jest while Adolf and Benito screamed, spluttered, and postured.

Tragically, the absurd and ridiculous became real; signposts lined the road to hell, but we traveled along in their wake, unable and illtrained to see their meaning.

What lessons have we learned? That fascism and nazi-ism are infecting diseases that contaminate as they touch, that, if nurtured in one corner of the earth, they, like a cancerous growth unattended, spread and entangled in all directions. That its cure is effected only with the guns, the tanks, the lives of the young, and with heartbreak. If these we learned, if the signposts now can be read, why in the name of suffering, war-torn humanity are we silent and inert in the face of all evidence that the disease exists among countries and men we have not dared call enemy? We have shed and are shedding our blood to stamp out this dread, but suffer its growth within the Americas and within the Spain of Caudillo Franco.

Nobody has done more to explode the myth of Spain's neutrality than Franco himself. His official pronouncements, his public addresses, his state publications left no doubt of where his loyalty lay. He proclaimed again and again the decadence of the democracies, the mighty power of the Axis. If today his words are softer—his deeds are not—it is no change of heart; it is the expressed fear like that of many another quisling that he guessed wrong.

What does the record show?

1. Spain, Tangier, and Spanish Morocco are nests for a multitude of Axis spies, who note and report every Allied ship that passes Gibraltar.

2. Spain continues and permits exports to Germany of certain vital war materials, particularly wolfram.

3. The Blue Division of Spanish volunteers continues to fight against our Russian ally, this despite Spain's specific promise to remove all forces from the eastern front by December last.

4. The Falangists continue to pour pro-Axis propaganda into the Latin-American countries.

5. Until very recently certain Italian warships and merchant vessels were interned in Spanish ports, despite Allied pressure for release. At present one such vessel still remains so interned.

6. Spain has agreed to a financial arrangement with Germany, enabling Germany to avail herself of substantial peseta credits, which, of course, means that Germany can buy much needed material in Spain.

7. Spain has an arrangement with Germany whereby she can be called upon to supply the Nazis with manpower.

8. Spain is helping to recruit Spanish seamen for U-boat service.

9. While Spain not so very long ago held out promise of the dissolution of the Falange, the fact remains that Spain has granted the Falange an increase of appropriations from public funds.

The list of grievances is long. Franco insulted us, wounded our hearts by sending a letter of congratulations to Jose Laurel, Filipino head of the puppet government set up by Japan in the Philippines. He thus alined himself with the unspeakable Japs, guilty of horrendous atrocities against soldiers and civilians.

The farce of Spanish neutrality is broadly played. We paid for that brand of neutrality with wheat and with oil. We said we were thus keeping Spain neutral. We paid Spain for doing exactly what Hitler bade her do—stay neutral. There was much greater gain for Germany in keeping open the Spanish embassies in enemy countries. There was much valuable information to be gleaned from diplomatic circles in helping the influx of fifth columnists that would otherwise find entry a bit difficult. It is revealing to note that it was the clerk of the Spanish Legation in La Paz who acted as paymaster for German and Argentine agents in arranging for the Bolivian coup. While Franco holds power in Spain, Hitler's work goes on in Latin America.

It has occurred to more than one observer of the Iberian Peninsula scene that the defeated Nazi chiefs can easily move underground, and where better than in Franco Spain, where the welcome is certain and the soil prepared for such husbandry? Indeed, it has been stated that many a Spanish estate is now secretly owned by a Nazi big shot, ready to receive him in escape and leave him in peace to plot and arrange and devise a new order, destined the next time to succeed in establishing the boasted thousand-year reign.

The open appeasement of Spain has sickened the honest and the stout of heart. Let it be asked, What excuse of military expedience remains now? Africa and the Mediterranean have been cleared, our hold on southern Italy secured, and our control of the Atlantic increased by agreement with Portugal.

True, the State Department on January 29, after long years of treading gently lest Franco be annoyed, finally announced that the loading of Spanish tankers with petroleum products for Spain had been suspended, pending a reconsideration of trade and general relations. But what do we now learn? On March 4, it was revealed that a quarter-million gallons of high-grade Pennsylvania lubricating oil in 55-gallon drums have been loaded at an east-coast port to be shipped to Spain. A State Department official, when questioned, stated that the embargo never applied to packaged oil, the embargo applies only to bulk oil shipped in tankers. Neat, isn't it?

The time is now to strain every resource in the final dash for victory. The time is now to avow by deed and not by word that we are bent on unconditional surrender of every tainted, rotten Nazi or Fascist, be he in Germany, Italy, Japan, Argentina, Bolivia, or Spain. The time is now to call every knee-buckler to Nazi ideology by his right name.

There are, here and there, little stagnant pools that are badly in need of draining. If we have recognized and named them, we have half conquered the foe. Let us glance at a few unhappy monarchs, or a little pretender or two to lost thrones. In Mexico, ex-King Carol of Rumania, through the expert offices of a paid press agent, one Russell Birdwell, makes ready to groom himself into a persona grata to the good people of the United States. He sought recently to find the ear of America by broadcasting his regeneration under the auspices of the Columbia Broadcasting Co. That the station finally concluded not to let us have the benefit of his sales talk in no way discouraged the ex-King, who in 1939 had signed a trade treaty with Germany, who, in March 1940, accepted Hitler's pledge for security in return for a monopoly on Rumania's produce. Carol looks very strange so suddenly dressed up in democracy's clothing. It will be recalled that when France fell, Carol decided to ally himself with Hitler openly. He formed the "party of the nation" whose announced program was nationalistic, Christian, and racial, a direct steal from the Hitler propagandists. He imitated the Nurenberg laws of Germany by instituting anti-Semitic measures, barring Jews from political office and cutting the Rumanian Jewish population of 1,000,000 to a third that number. He established the Iron Guard, now infamous for its barbaric cruelties, and handed over Rumania lock, barrel, and key to Dictator General Ion Antonescu, long familiar with the art of butchery—and then Carol fled.

This is the manner of man who seeks entry into the United States, seeks to convince our people that our support is due him for his acts of kindness, charity, for his democracy, and for his friendship and love of his people. But the subtle fingering of a press agent on the public instrument will not avail. We are armed to resistance with the knowledge of the facts. We can recognize the totalitarian, Jew-bating, Nazi-loving Carol, despite his new trappings.

Of like ilk is Otto of Austria, pretender to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It seems to be the newest fashion to pay lip service to democracy. He asks us to disregard the facts that he, until recently, held court in his hotel suite, bestowing titles like the Order of the Golden Fleece, ordaining a court chaplain, demanding oaths of allegiance from his followers. The feudal, oppressive reign of the Hapsburgs, in its decadent governing, offers no recommendation for the restoration of another Hapsburg to a throne that had been so gladly dismantled by all factions.

Neither the Empress Zita, his mother, nor the flitting Otto can boast that their peoples are behind their efforts of restoration. It is not difficult to recall the abortive Austrian Battalion which was to enlist in its ranks as part of the United States Army those Austrians who sought to fight alongside the United Nations. When it appeared that it would operate with the blessings of Otto, only 29 volunteers showed up, 3 of whom were the brothers of Otto. American soldiers of Czechoslovak and other central European origin, who had been transferred to the Austrian Battalian, protested bitterly. Six months following the first announcement of its formation, the Austrian Battalion was quietly disbanded by the Army. But Otto and his cohorts are not easily abashed.

Moreover, it is the boast of Otto and Zita that the declaration on Austria was included in the Moscow agreements "to accommodate the Hapsburgs." In substantiation, they point to their recent audiences with Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt. Oh, yes; they know how to make political capital out of their associations. It was Otto and his gang that sought like the Cliveden set to build up the cordon sanitaire and isolate Russia. They dismally failed. Otto now seeks by word and deed to drive a wedge between ourselves and our gallant allies, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. Again he fails. He tries now in equal duplicity to placate Russia because he is another who guessed wrong.

Otto von Hapsburg drools in anticipation of a return to Austria. Carol of Rumania does his daily dozen of political handsprings to distract us from our contemplation of his immediate past. Franco, bigamous wooer of Allies and Axis, grows fat-bellied and sleek. We have not disposed of these papier mâché monarchs and pretenders. There will be plenty of empty thrones and a plethora of grasping aspirants. We must beware lest we have no choice but to place Otto on some sort of Austro-Hungarian dais. Carol might be reinstated in the Rumanian citadel. Don Juan might be rushed from seclusion in Austria to the Spanish throne, with El Caudillo attempting to act out the role of a modern Bismarck.

I have touched but briefly, here and there, on situations, intrigues and men that bear watching * * * if an armed victory is to spell peace, a true peace and for all peoples.

American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Where Light Is Needed," which appeared in the March 25 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

This editorial raises some pertinent questions regarding America's foreign policy—or lack of it—and I am sincerely hopeful, Mr. President, that immediate and continuous action will be taken by this Government to clarify these questions which are causing increasing doubt and concern, not only among our own people but among those other peoples of the world who look to us for sound and active leadership during the course of this war and in the peace which is to follow.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHERE LIGHT IS NEEDED

President Roosevelt's sarcastic reference to people who are wandering around asking bellhops whether we have a foreign policy hardly appears an adequate answer to the questions in the minds of many Americans about our Government's stand on certain vexing international problems.

Thoroughly commendable is the President's reaffirmation that "the United Nations are fighting to make a world in which tyranny and aggression cannot exist; a world based upon freedom, equality, and justice; a world in which all persons regardless of race, color or creed may live in peace, honor, and dignity."

But this high-minded statement of general objectives does not help materially to clarify America's attitude on specific issues.

The White House proposal that the free peoples of Europe and Asia temporarily open their frontiers to victims of oppression is measurably constructive. But, quite apart from its dubious effectiveness, it does not represent what most of us think the words "foreign policy" mean.

Even less impressive as a move in the field of foreign relations is Secretary of State Hull's demand that Hungary offer "firm resistance" to German forces of occupation in order to "regain the respect and friendship of free nations."

Considering that Hungary already has been overrun and dominated by Hitler's thugs this sharp call upon Hungary to resist is in conflict with reality. It seems more naive, in fact, than Secretary Hull's appeal to Finland a few weeks ago to throw off the Nazi yoke and get out of the war.

Furthermore, not much enlightenment on our foreign policy seems to have been obtained yesterday by the Republican Congressmen who conferred with Mr. Hull. Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, leaving the conference, asserted that "silence is still the settled policy of our State Department," although some of those present thought the air had been cleared a little.

But the American people should have more than a little clearing of the air surrounding their country's foreign policy, whatever it may be.

Our people are thinking, for one thing, about the Atlantic Charter, that misty adventure in idealism which will be 3 years old in August. They would like to know whether the Atlantic Charter holds good for all of the United Nations, whether it has developed serious inadequacies, and whether there are plans to revise it in the light of present realities.

They would like to know what the United States Government hopes can be done about France, Poland, Finland, the Baltic States, the Balkans, Italy and the Italian Fleet, Spain and Argentina.

They would like to know why, after its brilliant showing at the Moscow, Cairo, and Tehran conferences, American statesmanship has seemed to take a back seat.

They would like to know whether American foreign policy has come to be a "me, too" ratification of British or Russian policy. Certainly, at least, Premier Stalin has made it perfectly clear that he has a foreign policy which is, briefly, "Russia first."

The American people do not ask that their Government set all these questionings at rest with specified, detailed answers. All they want is some assurance that their leaders have definite policies, and that those American policies are being presented to other nations as clearly and as forcefully as possible.

Roosevelt Fourth-Term Political Strategy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert an article by John O'Donnell which appeared in the Times-Herald March 28, 1944:

(By John O'Donnell)

American misfortunes and losses in our ill-fated Italian campaign are inflicting deeper wounds in F. D. R.'s fourth-term ambitions than his political reversals on the domestic front or the mounting physical weariness imposed by sustained White House duties.

In the Italian campaign, the capture of Rome by Anglo-American arms has been the pet project of the psychological warriors. Trained military brains, schooled at West Point and skilled by a lifetime devoted to the science of warfare, didn't like the proposal—but it was stuck down their throats by the top-flight politicians and the self-appointed civilian masters of global psychology.

Original political theory was that F. D. R. would make his fight for the fourth term on the grounds that he and his New Deal Party deserved sole credit for United States victories on the field of combat. Seizure of Rome and Vatican City, at suggestion of Commander in Chief Roosevelt, was launched with the psychological whoop-dee-do that this would at once bring the predominantly Roman Catholic nations in Central and South America, Spain, Ireland, France, Austria, Bavaria, etc., rushing to get behind F. D. R. and Winston Churchill.

The skilled strategists, the men who have devoted their lives to the science of arms, shook their heads. They didn't like the idea of invading the so-called soft underbelly of Europe and advised against it.

But the great political rulers and masters of global psychology and reelection politics ordered the boys in.

Now, at long last, the story is coming out. It's too hot for censorship to squelch. And it may well hit as hard at F. D. R.'s post of political power as the Gallipoli campaign of World War No. 1 hit at Winston Churchill.

Gallipoli, and the British losses in the Dardanelles during the fateful year of 1915, the tragedy of Suvla Bay and Churchill's political end as First Lord of the Admiralty in World War No. 1, are beginning to cast their shadows over the political future of Franklin D. Roosevelt as a world-master of military strategy.

Yesterday the Allied commanders on the scene lifted the tight censorship. The official United States Army paper, Stars and Stripes, declared our effort to advance from Cassino had ended "in bloody failure."

The Canadian infantryman's paper, The Maple Leaf, echoes the frank report—that Allied forces are now fighting a defensive battle with heavy losses.

And correspondents coming back from the Anzio beachhead, where we landed January 22, are now permitted to send through their dispatches reporting we tried "too much with too little" and denouncing those far behind the front who "speak glibly about keeping elements of 18 or 20 German divisions occupied in southern Italy and the Anzio beachhead" where, in fact, after "2 months of costly fighting," front-line correspondent Homer Bigart could see "little or no ground gained."

But of far more importance is the willingness to place responsibility for the whole show on the political leaders and make it clear that they, not the military, are to blame for the whole idea. Fundamental objection of the military brains has been:

"Even if we do take all of Italy, what of it? What will it mean to the defeat of German armies in Germany? We're not going to invade Germany over the Alps from northern Italy."

Against this was the more potent psychological warfare argument of the "Great Brain"—the importance of the capture of Rome because of the psychological effect on the Catholics of the world.

Hence the landing in Sicily back last July 10; the bombardment of Rome over the protests of the Pope, 3 weeks later; the landing at Salerno September 3, the entrance into Naples on October 1, and then the long bitter weeks of frustration and hope deferred with tremendous losses for a political victory still beyond reach.

From London, in his cabled dispatch to Newsweek, Maj. Gen. J. F. C. Fuller, retired, of the British Army, asks the "statesmen and generals" who planned the Italian campaign "what was its aim?"

General Fuller states the "plea that Germans are being killed and reserves exhausted savors more to me like an apology than an explanation. * * * The lesson of all this is that the strategy is execrable. * * * We should never have embarked on the Italian adventure. * * * Prestige now leaps into the saddle and willy-nilly lashes us on * * * this duplication of the Gallipoli campaign."

Here in the Capital, the Washington Star, under the byline of Constantine Brown, who is privy to some of our leading military authorities and often reflects their thoughts, repeats his earlier charge that the Italian adventure of F. D. R. and Churchill was "conceived against the better judgment of the American strategists. * * *"

Apparently, Roosevelt and Churchill thought their inside political information assured them that the Germans would put up only a token defense, abandon Rome and the Vatican City prize to the invading armies and retreat to the defensive line along the River Po.

"The Germans, however, offered a much stiffer resistance than had been anticipated by the political men who mapped this military adventure," writes Brown.

Prevention of Industrial Accidents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article by Fred W. Perkins, a prominent columnist, dealing with preventable loss of life and injuries to workers in American industry during the war period.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREVENTABLE LOSS

(By Fred W. Perkins)

The United States Labor Department today talked up as an evil to be corrected the loss of manpower through preventable industrial accidents.

The Department's figures, sponsored by Secretary Frances Perkins, were that 180,000 workers are kept from their jobs daily because of injuries suffered in their employment. On the basis of a 300-day year, this would mean an annual loss of 54,000,000 man-days.

These official figures show that the impact on war production from accidents that need not occur is several times the impact from strikes.

"Nine out of ten industrial accidents are preventable," said Verne A. Zimmer, director of the Labor Department's standards division. "It is the lack of safety thinking and safety action on the part of too many industrialists and workers which retards production of war material.

"While management has the primary responsibility for safety on the job, the worker—and particularly organized labor—plays an important part in accident prevention. I am glad to report that throughout the country groups of union officials, stewards, and business agents are enrolling in safety training courses sponsored by the United States Department of Labor, in collaboration with the United States Office of Education."

John M. Fewkes, Chief of the Industrial and Safety Section of the War Production Board, places the industrial-accident toll higher than the Labor Department figures—at 270,000,000 man-days a year, which he says is 10 times the loss of man-hours from strikes. He compares the industrial casualties with those of men on the fighting fronts, as follows:

"Industrial accidents from Pearl Harbor to January 1, 1944, total 37,600 killed, or 7,500 more than the military dead, with 210,000 permanently disabled and 4,500,000 temporarily disabled, or 60 times more than the military wounded and missing."

What is being done about it? "In the past 3 years," said Mr. Zimmer, "a task force of 600 top-flight safety engineers brought safety service directly into 25,000 war contract plants. Seventy-five percent of the firms accepting this service have materially reduced their accident frequency. Every day we learn of industrial plants which have operated 1, 2, or 3 years without a single lost-time injury.

"And yet, despite these outstanding individual records, the total number of industrial accidents last year was the highest in history."

Jesse Cottrell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, by the recent death of the able and very reliable correspondent, Jesse Cottrell, the newspaper profession has suffered a severe loss, as have the people of South Carolina and other Southern States. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief editorial tribute to Mr. Cottrell, from the Greenville News, of Greenville, S. C.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JESSE COTTRELL

Readers of the Greenville News, who have been aided in following and interpreting news developments in Washington by the writings of Jesse Cottrell during the last several years, will join with this newspaper in its realization of loss in the death of its Washington correspondent.

Mr. Cottrell's career was one of distinction and broad achievement. His many years in public service, including diplomatic assignments, gave him a most valuable background for his work as a Washington correspondent for this and other newspapers. He had an unusually broad knowledge of public affairs and his reportorial and analytical dispatches were a contribution to broader public understanding of national affairs in this critical war period. In his death American journalism loses one of its outstanding members.

Problems of Demobilization in California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. TOLAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the Outline of Problems of Demobilization in California, ably prepared by the research department of the California State Chamber of Commerce, under the direction of its general manager, Mr. James Mussatti.

I deem this one of the most useful and timely reports I have ever read. I do present it to the Members of this House, and in particular to my colleagues of the Post-War Planning Committee and of the Committee on Small Business, and of the standing committees before whom legislation for the post-war period will come, as an able and comprehensive statement of problems which may be anticipated in the great State of California, which in the past 3 years has proved not only to be the granary and the orchard of democracy but a great contributor to the total war production.

Of course our first concern is to win the war in the shortest possible time, but this does not prevent us from thinking and planning in terms of the post-war period. Unless we do and the war should terminate suddenly conditions would be chaotic in this country. This report should be of invaluable aid as similar conditions exist in the defense centers of this Nation:

OUTLINE OF PROBLEMS OF DEMOBILIZATION IN CALIFORNIA

1. THE EFFECTS OF WAR MOBILIZATION

A. Shifts in employment—National

1. Most recent national estimates of changes in the labor force due to war mobilization are as follows:

	April 1940	December 1944
Armed forces	200,000	11,000,000
Federal war agencies	100,000	1,700,000
Munitions industries (manufacturing)	4,100,000	11,000,000
Transportation, fuel, utilities	3,800,000	4,300,000
Food and tin cans (manufacturing)	1,100,000	1,400,000
Textiles, clothing, leather (manufacturing)	2,400,000	2,800,000
Trade, finance, service	10,100,000	9,500,000
Construction and building materials	2,800,000	1,300,000
Agriculture, forestry, fisheries	8,500,000	8,700,000
All other	12,000,000	8,500,000
Unemployed	8,100,000	1,000,000
Total	53,300,000	61,500,000

Source: The Brookings Institution.

2. At the end of this year the shifts and increases will be as follows:

(a) 12,300,000 to the armed services and Federal war agencies.

(b) 6,900,000 to "munitions" or war industries.

(c) 1,300,000 to other groups, such as utilities.

(d) 20,400,000 total increase or shift.

3. This 20,400,000 increase was made possible by:

(a) 8,000,000 women, youths, and retired workers added to labor force.

(b) 7,100,000 reduction of number unemployed.

(c) 5,300,000 shifted from other industries.

4. Of this total, according to the recent Brookings Institution study, some 17,800,000 will face demobilization during the two and a half years following the end of the European phase of the conflict, possibly 6,400,000 during the period between that phase, and final victory over Japan, another 6,900,000 during the first 6 months after final victory, and the remaining 4,500,000 spread over the following year.

B. Shifts in population and employment—California

1. Shifts in population:

(a) Civilian population of the United States has decreased 4,021,000 since April 1940, due to withdrawals of men and women entering the armed services. All Eastern and Middle Western States have had decreases of from 1 to 16 percent, except Connecticut, Michigan, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

(b) 6 Pacific Coast States have increased 1,595,130 in civilian population since 1940.

	Apr. 1, 1940	Nov. 1, 1943	Increase
			Number	Percent
California	6,868,065	7,881,694	1,013,629	14.8
Oregon	1,088,284	1,172,674	84,390	7.8
Washington	1,719,143	1,905,239	186,096	10.8
Arizona	497,068	569,357	72,289	14.5
Nevada	108,761	130,637	21,876	20.1
Utah	549,722	583,572	33,850	6.2
Total	10,648,043	12,243,173	1,595,130	15.0

Source: U. S. Bureau of the Census.

(c) California has had an increase of 1,013,620 in civilian population in spite of the withdrawal of nearly 600,000 entering the armed services and the relocation of Japanese. Over 1,600,000 persons are now living here who did not live here in 1940.

(d) This increase of civilian population has been concentrated in war-production and military centers. Some 26 rural and mountain counties have had decreases in civilian population, ranging from 1.8 percent in Butte County to 59.5 percent in Mono. The areas showing largest increases are as follows:

Civilian population

County or area	Apr. 1, 1940	Nov. 1, 1943	Increase since 1940
			Number	Percent
San Diego	276,079	394,569	118,490	42.9

2. Shifts in the labor force and employment:

(a) In spite of the shift of more than a half-million men and women to the armed forces and the removal of 40,000 Japanese from the working population, the civilian labor forces in California increased from 2,905,000 in April 1940 to 3,435,000 in June 1943, an increase of 530,000. (Estimates of the California Division of Labor Statistics in cooperation with the State reconstruction and reemployment commission.)

(b) Employed wage and salary workers increased from 2,005,000 in 1940 to 2,993,000 in 1943, an increase of 888,000, or 44.3 percent. The number of men in this total increased from 1,460,000 in 1940 to 1,979,000 in 1943, a gain of 519,000, or 35.5 percent. The number of women wage and salary workers increased from 545,000 in 1940 to 1,014,000 in 1943, a gain of 469,000, or 86.1 percent.

(c) Most of this increase has been concentrated in the manufacturing industries, which rose from 409,000 in April 1940 to 1,145,000 in June 1943, a gain of 736,000, or 180 percent. Substantial increases also occurred in utilities and in government.

Total labor force	2,905,000	100.00	3,435,000	100.00	530,000

(d) Annual average total employment in California manufacturing industries including clerical, technical, and other as well as wage earners in plants increased from 381,000 in 1939 to 1,111,000 in 1943, a gain of 730,000, or 191.6 percent. Wage earner employment rose from 276,300 in 1939 to 878,000 in 1943, a gain of 601,700, or 217.8 percent.

(e) Of the 601,700 additional factory wage earners in 1943, as compared to 1939, 425,200 were added in 2 war industries, aircraft and shipbuilding, and 116,500 were added in all other manufacturing activities.

(f) In contrast to these figures for California the comparable national totals show 8,192,000 wage earners in manufactures in 1939 and 13,831,000 in 1943, an increase of 5,639,000, or 68.8 percent. Of this, the war industries increased from 2,978,000 in 1939 to 7,931,000 in 1943, a gain of 4,953,000, or 166.3 percent.

(g) By metropolitan industrial centers the disproportionate increase in employment in the major war industries has been more marked than for the State as a whole.

2. PROBLEMS OF DEMOBILIZATION

A. Termination of war contracts

1. Cancelation of contracts at the end of the war will tie up $15,000,000,000 of private working capital in special inventories, tools, and plants. Terminated contracts will have an undelivered value of $50,000,000,000 to $70,000,000,000.

2. California's war-supply contracts, cumulative through December 1943, are:

(a) Aircraft and aircraft parts	$8,775,213,000
(b) Cargo and naval vessels	3,670,889,000
(c) Ordnance	320,975,000
(d) Other supplies	1,107,014,000
(e) Total	13,874,091,000

In addition, $893,150,000 in project orders to governmental establishments such as navy yards have been placed in California.

3. Aircraft company prime contractors and thousands of subcontractors have most serious problems, complicated by low ratio of private working capital to total volume of contracts.

4. Major policies recommended by business groups:

(a) Creation of an over-all governmental agency for uniform direction of contract termination.

(b) Delegation of clear-cut authority to contracting agencies to make final settlements with contractors within the framework of policies established by Congress and this agency, subject to review by Comptroller General only in cases of suspected fraud.

(c) Enactment of legislation to establish a clear and simple avenue for appeals to the courts by contractors for settlement of disputed claims, and establishment of adequate legal machinery for this purpose.

(d) That contractors and subcontractors be granted the right under proper safeguards to obtain mandatory loans from the Government equal to a substantial proportion of settlement claims.

B. Disposal of Government-owned plants

1. Approximately $20,000,000,000 has been spent for new industrial plants since 1940.

(a) $15,700,000,000 by the Federal Government, $4,300,000,000 by private industries.

(b) Government and private financing of war plants.

	Investment since 1940		Percent Government
	Government	Private
Aircraft, engines, parts	$3,084,800,000	$241,800,000	92.7
Explosives, ammunition loading	2,856,400,000	11,800,000	99.2
Shipyards and repair facilities	1,991,500,000	95,000,000	95.4
Guns, shells, bombs, etc	1,869,700,000	227,100,000	89.2
Chemicals, petroleum, coal products	1,303,800,000	665,000,000	66.2
Chemicals			80.2
Petroleum, coal products			66.2
Iron and steel products	1,261,200,000	565,000,000	69.0
Nonferrous metals	1,126,300,000	302,100,000	78.8
Magnesium	430,000,000		92.0
Aluminum			50.0

(c) Government financed war plants in California represent investment of $848,626,000. Of this the Army, Navy, Maritime Commission, and R. F. C. have invested over $500,000,000 in shipyards, aircraft plants, the $100,000,000 Fontana steel plant, and other facilities. In addition, the Defense Plant Corporation has invested over $300,000,000, segregated as follows, as to major items:

Aircraft plants	$106,949,000
Chemical and synthetic rubber	50,897,000
Aluminum and magnesium	49,413,000
Gasoline plants	21,785,000
Iron and steel plants	14,919,000

(d) Government financed war plants in the 11 Western States represent a Government investment of $1,683,329,000, or 12 percent of the national total. Some of the major ones outside of California are: $146,628,000 for magnesium plant at Las Vegas, Nev.; $193,715,000 for steel plant at Geneva, Utah; $12,246,000 for gasoline plants in Utah; $14,190,000 for aircraft plant in Arizona; $68,929,000 for aluminum plants in Arizona; $212,907,000 for aluminum, shipbuilding, and iron and steel plants in Oregon; $284,935,000 for aluminum, shipbuilding, aircraft, machine tool, tank and engine, and iron and steel plants in Washington.

(e) By operating these plant facilities in the post-war period in competition with private industries in the same fields, the Government could completely throttle competing activities by private interests; by throwing them open to unrestricted purchase the Government might foster private monopolies, and by hasty disposal of them at salvage prices the Government would be forfeiting billions of dollars' worth of assets for which the taxpayers have not yet completed payment. Policies adopted with respect to the disposal or operation of these plants will be of paramount interest to the Western States.

C. Disposal of surplus war supplies

At the end of the war (or immediately in some cases) the Government will have on hand billions of dollars' worth of surplus stocks of war supplies, ranging from food, minerals, lumber, and other basic materials to finished products such as clothing, aircraft, or ships. It will also have for disposal surplus war housing, storage facilities, docks, warehouses, and real estate acquired for temporary use. The timing and method of disposal of these enormous surplus stocks will have a tremendous influence upon economic conditions.

D. Removal of economic controls

1. The timing and the method of removal of wartime emergency governmental controls, such as rationing of consumer goods, priorities on materials, manpower controls, price controls, and wage controls will be an important problem of the demobilization period.

2. There is general agreement that many such controls will have to be extended for some time after the end of hostilities. There are many different views as to which should be extended, the length of time, and the provision for their termination. Some views and suggestions expressed are as follows:

(a) The general view of businessmen in this State is that these war powers should be surrendered at the earliest possible date consistent with an orderly return to peacetime conditions, and that Congress should enact legislation placing definite time limits on their extension.

(b) Some economists, such as Dr. Benjamin Anderson, strongly advocate earliest possible removal of price (and wage) controls, in order that price levels may tell the truth and serve as a reliable guide to reconversion and readjustment by business management. Others fear that the combination of large liquid savings in hands of consumers, and scarcity of goods might led to inflationary price rises, unless rationing and price controls are continued.

(c) The recent Baruch report suggests advance planning for partial reconversion after end of war in Europe, with advance listing of priorities to be given different civilian needs in any opening up of civilian supplies; that highest priorities go to those things which contribute directly or indirectly to improved military efficiency; and as far as possible that all competitors be treated alike in the resumption of civilian production.

E. Demobilization, training, and reemployment

1. The general problem of maintaining high levels of production and employment in private enterprise during and after the transition period, of which the foregoing are key segments.

2. The specific human problems involved in actual demobilization, relocation, retraining, and reemployment of men and women released from the armed services and the war industries.

3. Demobilization of the armed forces:

(a) Reinstatement provisions for servicemen.

(b) Should war veterans have employment preference?

(c) Men and women have been drawn from all walks of life, and they must be helped to go back to or enter every sphere of economic activity. Limited programs will not be a solution.

(d) Education and training programs. The Thomas bill (H. R. 3846) provides 1 year of education or training at approved institution, with tuition, and $50 to $85 per month for subsistence.

(e) Mustering-out pay or bonus.

(f) Special information and other services. Surveys of skills and work qualifications.

(g) Controlling rate and order of demobilization. (Age and length of service, marital status, training, etc., are some suggested priorities.)

4. Transfer of war workers to peacetime jobs:

(a) Vast changes in the pattern of employment.

(b) Unemployment insurance—severance pay.

(c) Surveys of skills—potential job opportunities.

(d) Employment services.

5. The Carl Grey plan.

(a) Provides for the formal coordination of existing agencies into a broad organization, built around the United States Employment Service, but with operating control at the State level, and more localized controls.

(b) A research, reports, and planning department at the Federal level.

(c) Occupational counseling and the vestibule center are nerve centers of the Grey plan. Those not occupationally adjusted, for any reason, would go through "vestibule center" for occupational, educational, training, and apprenticeship guidance.

6 California's special problems of reemployment:

(a) Likely to be more severe than the national.

(b) Likely to be creeping unemployment, rather than sudden, but with sharper drop at end of war with Japan.

(c) Likely to have wave or continued migration to offset effect of youth going back to school, women withdrawing from labor force, and retirement of older workers.

(d) Seven hundred thousand to nine hundred thousand will be released from war industries, related services, and Government war agencies; 400,000 pre-war residents from armed services. Another 200,000 from immigrant inductees. Total of 1,300,000 to 1,500,000 to locate or relocate.

(e) Need for special policies based on peculiar status of this and other Pacific Coast States:

Encourage temporary out-migration?

Foster withdrawal of women?

Aid youth to return to educational institutions?

Promote redevelopment of trade and services?

Other steps to increase mobility of workers?

3. WHAT IS BEING DONE ABOUT THESE DEMOBILIZATION PROBLEMS

A. By the Congress

1. Senate Special Committee on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning (Rept. 539, pt. 2, Feb. 9, 1944):

Cancelation of war contracts.

Disposition and sale of surplus property.

Industrial demobilization and reconversion.

(a) Believes that an agency should be created by Congress to devote its entire attention to working out and coordinating all demobilization problems, under broad principles laid down by Congress. This Office of Demobilization to be subordinate to the Office of War Mobilization until end of the war.

(b) Collect information on factories that will be affected by war contract cancelation, their manpower, inventory, and machinery requirements both for war and peace production, make advance plans for disposal of inventories, rationing, and allocation of materials, etc., to keep the economy on an even keel. Survey the potentialities of Government-owned plants and make plans for their disposition.

(c) The Congress should not overlook the fact that however unavoidable is the delegation of its policy-making powers in time of war, it is quite another thing to delegate its primary functions to an executive agency in time of peace. It should retain in its hands the settlement of the broad basic problems of the demobilization program out of which the structure of the peace economy will arise. The nature of the economy of this country for many years to come will depend upon the policies and decisions which are to be followed in demobilization. Regional, State, and local considerations necessarily overlooked in mobilization for war cannot be overlooked in the reconstruction program for which we are now preparing. The economic life of this Nation must not be permitted to become dependent upon Washington directives for peace, as it has been for war.

(d) Paramount policy consideration in the handling of all demobilization problems should be the preservation and strengthening of the American system of free competitive enterprise."

(e) Government plants should be disposed of in such a way as to result in their greatest economic use, but the effect on the general economy should be first consideration. Plants suitable for production of peacetime goods should be sold where this can be done without creating ruinous overproduction. Leasing of plants should be authorized. No Government plant should be disposed of in a manner to create or strengthen monopolies. Authority should be withheld from any agency to dispose of plants in basic industries where Government holdings are preponderant until Congress has determined policy by express legislation, correlated with Nation's foreign policy. These include aircraft, aluminum, magnesium, shipyards, synthetic rubber, and steel mills.

(f) Surplus goods should be disposed of in manner to best utilize their economic value without unduly disturbing civilian markets. Should be kept out of hands of speculators and distributed through regular channels of trade.

(g) In settlement of terminated contracts the committee recommends that prime requisite should be speed and fairness, with advance payments, relaxation of traditional rules governing preaudit and payments of claims by the Government, strengthening post-audit and penalties for fraud, and mandatory advances or partial payments or guaranteed loans. Also, wherever possible, the filing of over-all company claims by contractors and subcontractors. Also provision for review and appeal of disputed cases outside the regular machinery of the courts, such as arbitration, umpires, or review boards.

B. By executive branches of the Federal Government

1. Office of War Mobilization—Baruch-Hancock recommendations:

(a) Getting us back to work in peacetime enterprise. Creation of new post of work director to work with Congress in development of a program of legislation and operations.

(b) Taking the Government out of business by quick settlement of terminated war contracts. Establishment of a joint contract termination board in Office of War Mobilization. Free working capital—remove surplus inventories.

(c) Centralize control and disposal of surpluses in a Surplus Property Administrator in the Office of War Mobilization, and creation of a Surplus Property Policy Board of heads of various war and Government agencies. Broad policies.

Sell as much as possible without unduly disrupting normal trade.

No sales, no rentals to speculators or promoters.

Use regular channels of trade.

No governmental operation of surplus war plants in competition with private industry.

No monopoly; equal access to surpluses to all businesses; preference to local ownership; but no subsidizing of one part of the country against the other.

(d) General tightening of Government war machine.

(e) Advance planning for X-day after collapse of Germany.

(f) Prompt extension of needed war powers.

(g) Tighten handling of cancelations.

(h) Encouragement of small business.

(i) Draft post-war tax law now, and make known the reductions in tax rates.

(j) Early engineering and planning of public works.

(k) "There is no need for a post-war depression. Handled with competence, our adjustment after the war is won should be an adventure in prosperity."

2. United States Department of Commerce:

(a) National economics unit is making studies of post-war markets and other subjects to aid business in post-war readjustment.

(b) Regional and district offices are extending these and other services of the Department to businessmen and commercial organizations.

C. By State and local governments

1. California State Reemployment and Reconstruction Commission:

(a) Coordination and stimulus of efforts of various departments and divisions of the State government to deal with problems of demobilization and reemployment. Advisory committees headed by Commission members, covering such fields as natural resources, agriculture, industry, trade and service establishments, readjustment, education, coordination of research facilities, etc.

(b) Cooperation with organized civic, commercial, and other groups, and with various interim committees of the legislature.

(c) Research by technical staff, cooperating with other State departments in State research pool, with general policy guidance from technical review committee.

2. California Commission on Interstate Cooperation:

(a) Dealing with problems, such as disposal and utilization of Government-owned plants, interstate compacts, trade barriers, unemployment insurance, and others in which there can be official cooperation between various western State governments represented in the Council of State Governments, western region.

3. Interim committees of the legislature:

Assembly interim committee on post-war rehabilitation.

Senate interim committee on post-war construction.

(a) Formulation of program of legislative action intended to remove obstacles to free enterprise and post-war development and of a State program of needed public works.

4. League of California cities:

(a) Seeking cooperation of business, labor, agriculture, and Government at the community level, in the development of community-action programs to meet post-war demobilization problems.

(b) Holding California community planning institutes in Los Angeles and Oakland during latter part of March, in cooperation with American Municipal Association and American Society of Planning Officials.

D. By private enterprise and by business-supported commercial organizations

1. National organizations:

(a) Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Committees on economic policy, on surplus war properties, on termination of war contracts, and on education have made studies, reports, and recommendations on many of the problems of post-war demobilization. Also has made Nation-wide consumer and industrial surveys, and is working cooperatively with local chambers of commerce throughout the country.

(b) Committee for economic development. Objective is to aid private industry, trade associations, and community organizations plan for maximum employment and production. Its research division is studying various questions as to governmental policy which will provide a "favorable climate" for operation of private enterprise, and has issued recommendations on termination of war contracts and other demobilization problems. Its field development division has organized community committees throughout the Nation and on the Pacific coast, in cooperation with local chambers, to study and act on readjustment and reemployment problems.

(c) National association of Manufacturers: Post-war committee has made reports and recommendations on major problems of the transition period from war to peace, on long-range maintenance of jobs, freedom, and opportunity for Americans, on post-war distribution of goods and services and on international relations. (All three of these principal national agencies are working closely together on many post-war problems, where their interests are parallel.)

2. California State Chamber of Commerce:

(a) Committee on post-war economics has completed a report and recommendations on governmental policies affecting free enterprise dealing with immediate demobilization problems such as termination of war contracts, disposal of Government-owned war plants and surplus stocks of goods, termination of emergency economic controls, and retraining and reemployment of war workers and servicemen, as well as longer term questions such as taxation, labor relations, and social-security policies. Permanent committees and departments of the chamber in the fields of natural resources, agriculture, industry, transportation and highways, social security, taxation, etc., are working on details of these problems within that general framework of guiding policy.

(b) Research and planning section and steering committees have been organized to develop research and technical data needed. Survey of post-war research and planning activities in more than 200 agencies has been made and is being published in directory form. Survey of research needs of industry is under way.

(c) Research department is undertaking studies by primary trade areas of Western States and of California along two major lines. One, a resurvey of the major economic factors in industrial plant location, such as raw materials, power, fuel and water, labor supply and prevailing wage levels, and markets and distribution facilities. The other, studies of the economic feasibility or opportunity for development of specific key industries, such as textiles, light metals, chemicals, and so forth.

3. Local chambers of commerce and trade groups. Out of the great variety of post-war survey or planning projects carried on by local chambers of commerce, and closely related C. E. D. community committees, the following are those most general:

(a) "Work pile plans," or surveys of deferred and prospective private construction, repair, and remodeling activities that will be available at the end of the war.

(b) Studies of needed public works projects, financing, timing, and the direct or indirect employment provided.

(c) Studies of employment, reconversion, and financing problems of manufacturing or other industries in the community. (For Pacific coast industrial centers, the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco is cooperating with C. E. D. committees and local chambers of commerce in the fact-gathering phase of this endeavor.)

(d) Plant inventories of the labor force in war-boom communities, to obtain both factual data as to changed composition in terms of age, sex, race, skills, source of migrants, and opinion data as to post-war intentions of remaining in the labor force and in the community. This is one of several necessary steps in determining post-war demobilization and employment problems at the community level.

(e) Survey and action programs to discover new or post-war manufacturing opportunities, and to promote industrial expansion and employment.

(f) Programs for strengthening and expanding business in the distributive trades and service establishments in the community, extending its trade area, and fostering sound development of agricultural or other primary industries which are the economic supports of the community.

(g) Programs for the reabsorption, reemployment, training, and care of returning servicemen. (Many small communities where there is no local office of the employment services are providing for this function through the local chambers of commerce.)

(h) Study and action programs relative to the disposal and utilization of Government-owned industrial plant facilities in the community.

Greek Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. HENRY A. WALLACE, Vice President of the United States, on Greek Independence Day, in Boston, at Boston Symphony Hall, on Sunday, March 26, 1944, the address being broadcast over local stations.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On Annunciation Day, March 25, 1821, Archbishop Germanos of Patras and a little band of Greeks kindled the spark that started a revolution against tyranny. That is why we celebrate the anniversary of the independence of Greece, a day worthy of remembrance everywhere in the world.

The road to freedom is a long road and a rocky one. The pledge solemnly given by Archbishop Germanos and those who stood beside him to fight until Greece was free was the outgrowth of the relentless efforts of Greeks to regain their independence. They revolted 18 times before freedom was won. When men under the Nazi yoke wonder whether the struggle is worth while, they remember that Greeks throughout 2,500 years of history have always believed that there is no life worth having except a life of freedom. Sooner or later throughout all history they have thrown off tyrannies of whatever nature by whomsoever imposed.

We will never forget that Greece, which wished to live in peace, resisted a treacherous attack by the Fascist empire of Italy in 1940. With her ideas and with her arms she astonished the world and crushed the attack. Fascist Italy never recovered and Mussolini's dream of empire came to an inglorious end.

To save themselves from utter destruction the Fascists betrayed the glorious memories of Garibaldi, Mazzini, and Cavour and put the Italian people in bondage to the Nazis. Hitler then started his blitzkrieg against Greece.

We shall always remember that Greece met the assault of the Nazi army with impassioned skill. Greece again lighted a flame as bright as that which lit freedom's skies over Thermopylae. She delayed the German attack on Russia for several precious weeks and gave Britain time to defend the Mediterranean. Greece aided in the winning of this war and gained our everlasting gratitude. She went down under the power of overwhelming numbers and modern mechanical devices. But the darkness into which Hitler plunged her now promises soon to be lifted. Greece cannot be permanently enslaved.

Even as I speak women and children are dying of hunger in Athens, in Epirus, and in Thrace. They are dying because they would not yield. These dead shall not be forgotten. The men who are responsible for their deaths shall face the bar of justice. They shall be judged by free people—by the free people of Greece.

The invaders are seeking to break the spirit of the Greeks by enforcing a policy of terrorism and systematic extermination, but up in the mountains grave men carry on a warfare with whatever arms they can find. The whole population of Greece has refused to come to any terms with the oppressors.

You are the kinsmen of the Greeks. You are Americans. It is my understanding that as a part of the celebration of Greek Independence Day each American of Greek descent is purchasing an extra American War bond. Your fellow Americans and your sons who are in the armed forces of the United States will recognize your accomplishment as further proof that you remember the heroism of your own soldiers and those of all our allies.

Democracy is not a finished job. Less than one hundred years ago part of our population were slaves. Years ago signs in taverns read "No Irishmen Allowed." Today there are still inequalities and injustices but we have been moving and we will continue to move toward real democracy.

We believe in and we fight for the dignity and freedom of man. We know in America that each race has something of value to contribute to democracy. We must give to the minority groups among us the best that we have and they must show their appreciation by helping wholeheartedly to preserve for America the best that is in the minority groups.

As Americans we believe that all people have a right to enjoy the blessings of democracy. Let us teach our children that racial and religious minorities are part of the very life blood of this country. There are people here whose parents lived in Greece, in Africa, in Russia, in England, in Germany, in Ireland, in Italy, and in many other lands. They are a strength and not a weakness to our Nation. No racial or religious group is inferior because of its heredity. Members of a race may be inferior for many years because they have not had economic opportunities or proper food or because they have not been educated but these inferiorities can be overcome in America. We believe not only in political and economic democracy but also in the education and opportunity which will make genetic democracy a reality.

The Nazis hate genetic democracy. They believe that every race in the world except their own is genetically inferior. They believe that every American belongs to an inferior race and that every racial and religious group except their own should be enslaved. We believe that the New World is a chosen land, not for one race, but a chosen land in which all of us living together can preserve a democracy free from bigotry and oppression. We believe this chosen land should become an example which the whole world will want to imitate.

The other day a German immigrant wrote a letter to the New York Times. He said, "Thanks, Uncle Sam. Today I became an American citizen. Every immigrant from Germany knows what despotism means because he has personally experienced the loss of liberty. He fights against the Hitler mind, against the schemer and the psuedo-intellectual who is a pathfinder for Hitler, and whose idiom he knows from bitter first-hand knowledge. By this experience he can accurately forecast what would have happened if America had not girded itself to resist and destroy Hitler and what he stands for. Every American would have been compelled to bow to the commandments of Hitler. A 'gauleiter,' taking his orders from Berlin, would decide whether he belonged to the master race. Every step in the process of living and dying would be fully ordered under the watchful eye of the Gestapo. Yes; it could have happened here."

That is the end of the new citizen's letter. That which he feared must never happen here. Demagogues in Germany inflamed majority groups against all minority groups. There are demagogs here. When we hear them say "America for Americans," we reply, "We, too, believe in America for Americans—America for all Americans of every race and every creed." This is the miracle of America—her capacity to make Europeans into patriotic citizens by the compelling power of her freedom-loving ideals. Sometimes I think first and second generation Americans know and appreciate America better than those of us who have lived here for seven generations.

Some people say that democracy is impossible because part of our population is shiftless, lazy, and incapable of self-government. They point to the slum dwellers and the sharecroppers as proof that many people cannot rise out of their misery. I have seen the Ida B. Wells homes where families from the slums have become self-supporting, healthy, and proud of themselves and of our country. Let me give you another example of the ability of people to advance in America. In 1937 100 sharecropper families in 1 community, 60 white and 40 Negro families, lived in abject poverty. Their average net worth was $28. Some of these people could not read and write and they were all, judging from their records of achievement, shiftless and no account. The Farm Security Administration bought the land, helped them build decent homes, made them loans for tools, and aided them in marketing their crops. At the end of 7 years, the average net worth of each family was not $28, but $2,170. They had purchased their farms, loan payments were up to date, and the United States Government will get back every dollar it risked on these so-called shiftless people. They are taxpayers now. This also is the spirit of America. Seventh generation Americans are not past redemption, no matter how low they sink.

We shall fight until the people of Greece, France, Holland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Norway, Poland, Belgium, China, and all the other countries which are under the tyrant's heel are free. Citizens of every land will again be able to say openly and proudly, "I am a Greek," or "I am a Frenchman," or "I am a Dane," or "I am a Jew." They will be able to do more than that. They will be able to say, "I am a person—I am a freeman."

Every man and woman has the right to earn a living, to live in good surroundings, to live in freedom, to live without fear. No man should be persecuted because he belongs to a minority race or a minority creed. We look forward in confidence and hope to the day when every child as he grows up will be proud that he and his parents are Protestants, Catholics, Orthodox, or Jews. Every child has the right to grow up feeling that he is a person, a unique and worth-while part of America and, therefore, part of a decent world.

Greek Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I am asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] to request unanimous consent for the printing in the Appendix of the RECORD of a speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] on the occasion of Greek Independence Day celebration under the auspices of the Greek community in Washington, D. C., on March 26, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the midst of this global war for human freedom it is well to pause for a moment to pay tribute to Greece—a nation small in numbers but really great in service to humanity in love of liberty and devotion to lofty ideals.

During this world-wide struggle nations have been tested. Some nations have faltered, hesitated and even followed what appeared at the time to be the easy road to security. Those nations led by Nazi-dominated governments chose to sell their honor in exchange for a promise of security under the wing of the German destroyer.

Not so with Greece! The gallant Greeks, true to their centuries-old traditions—the traditions of Thermopylae, Marathon, Salamis, and Missolonghi, chose the path of honor in this world conflict the issue of which clearly is freedom versus slavery.

Today we celebrate the one hundred and twenty-third anniversary of the beginning of the Greek War of Independence. The movement itself was a revolution against the old Ottoman Empire as well as against the dark despotism of the notorious Austrian Chancellor Metternich whose system of congresses and alliances between monarchs aimed at stifling every spark of liberty on the European continent and suppressing every liberal movement.

Naturally, the Greek Revolution of 1821 received the support of liberal people throughout the world.

In America, Boston, and Philadelphia, the cradles of the American Revolution, soon became centers of Friends of Greece. Money, clothes, and food were continuously sent to Greece. These contributions were usually sent to the London Greek Committee and from there transmitted to Greece. At times however, American ships, loaded with food and clothing, were sent directly to the shores of Greece under the charge of faithful agents, who were directed to distribute them to the people.

A great American friend of Greece of those times, Dr. Samuel Howe, an eye-witness, informs us that thousands were supplied. I quote Dr. Howe: "Thousands put up prayers to God for their benefactors, and their children learned first to lisp the name of America with a blessing. The news of the distributions extending all over the country produced a still greater effect by the encouragement it gave to the people, who saw that they were considered worthy of having a helping hand stretched out to them from across the globe."

Young and vigorous America's statesmen and orators, Monroe, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay and many others openly defended the Greek cause.

The magnificent deeds of such heroes of the Greek War of Independence as Kolokotrónis, Bótzaris, Canáris and his brave followers, amazed the world of their times.

Finally, the deeds of heroism and sacrifice of the Greeks, combined with the efforts of the liberal Prime Minister of Great Britain, George Canning, broke the shackles of slavery and freed Greece.

Greece once again finds herself fighting on the side of liberty.

Three years and a half ago the dictator, whose name no longer attracts admiration, of Fascist Italy attacked little Greece aiming at subjugating a gallant neighbor country.

As one man the Greek people arose for the defense of the honor and independence of their motherland. And the world stood in amazement as the brave Greeks inflicted defeat after defeat on Mussolini's vaunted Fascist legions.

Then Hitler, coming to the rescue of Mussolini, launched his attack. The world then witnessed the amazing spectacle of two great powers of a combined population of 120,000,000 attacking a peace-loving little nation of only 8,000,000 people, whose only sin was its love for freedom.

The Allies had carefully avoided any action which might have proved likely to embroil Greece in the war. As Prime Minister Churchill said sometime ago, "We have most carefully abstained from any action likely to draw upon the Greeks the enmity of the criminal dictators." But the criminal dictators were bent on conquest and enslavement of the overpowered peoples.

The mechanized Nazi hordes, then at the height of their might, struck ruthlessly, and overwhelming the tenacious Greek resistance, flooded the Greek mainland with the miserable "Roman jackal's" beaten army following behind the Nazi panzer divisions.

But the purpose of Greek resistance had been accomplished. The German timetable for the attack on Russia had been upset. The contemplated attack on Russia was delayed by at least 2 months, and thus Moscow was saved by the winter of 1941–42.

Greece is paying for this great service to the cause of freedom.

German officers are reported to have told the Athenians: "We're going to make Greece pay for the delay which cost us the loss of men and matériel as well as the serious military reverses in Russia. We are going to make you so feeble you won't even be able to commit suicide."

Deliberate starvation and persecution have followed in the wake of Greece's forced capitulation.

Many of the brave people of Greece are dying daily under the so-called new order of the Germans and their satellites, the Bulgarians. The lack of proper food and medicines have brought influenza and pneumonia, with typhus and dysentery following in their wake to plague those who have managed to escape starvation.

Innocent hostages are shot by the hundreds. Entire villages have been wiped out by the German and Bulgarian oppressors.

German agents travel through starving Greece dangling food and life before the hungry and their loved ones if the Greeks will go to Germany and work for the Nazi war machine. But despite threats and tantalizing false promises, the Greeks refuse to enter the Nazi slave gangs.

The totalitarian war lords have looted the country. They robbed the churches, temples, and museums of famous and priceless statues and other articles of classic antiquity.

Under the auspices of the American, Canadian, British, and Swedish Governments some food and medical supplies are being sent regularly to Greece. The United States Foreign Economic Administration last week released the actual figures in tonnage of food sent to Greece monthly. According to this report, Greece receives monthly 20,200 tons of food.

The allocations to Greece as of February 15, 1944, were: 15,000 tons of wheat—the gift of the Canadian Government to the Greek Government—2,700 tons of pulse from the United States, from where also are sent monthly 1,000 tons of fish products; 600 tons of milk; 300 tons of soap powder; 300 tons of high protein spaghetti, and 300 tons of vegetable stew mix.

The present scheme of relief to Greece, originally organized by the Swedish Government under the auspices of the mixed commission of the International Red Cross, is now conducted in Greece by a Swedish-Swiss relief commission. Ten ships under charter expenses of shipping were covered by the Greek Government and the Greek War Relief Association, and the latter has made a contribution of more than $2,000,000 covering certain expenditures not provided under lend-lease arrangements. Since January 1, 1943, the charter hire is being borne by Lend-Lease to the Greek Government.

But this help is far from being sufficient.

Yes, spring has come again to the golden land of Hellas!

Warm breezes play over pastoral Arcadia. The red poppies of Attica bloom beneath gray-green olive trees, and in Thessalonian orchards branches are heavy with buds.

But laughter, songs, and folk dances have disappeared.

However, the determination of the people to regain their liberty remains unweakened. In that respect their morale is very high. The Greek people continue to resist the invaders. Patriot bands on the mountain fastnesses of Greece continue to harass enemy garrisons and to cut communication lines while the people sabotage the war activities of the oppressors.

The Greek Navy is in the forefront of the battle against the forces of darkness. Greek submarines have been sinking Axis supply ships. The fates must have smiled a few months ago when Augusta, Sicily, was captured by a destroyer of the Greek Navy. Greek warships have attended to the Allied landings below Rome.

The Greek Army has fought valiantly in Africa and now is poised in the Near East for further missions of liberation.

Together with Greece the United Nations are fighting for liberty, justice, the dignity of the individual, and international decency.

American armed forces are to be found on every continent and every sea and sky of the world—fighting for human freedom.

The American people are wholeheartedly behind their armed forces. Every available dollar is invested in War bonds.

I am glad to hear that the American citizens of Greek extraction have been buying War bonds in great numbers and amounts. I am also informed that this year, on the occasion of Greek Independence Day and in honor of the American friends of Greece, many Americans of Greek extraction are buying extra War bonds.

Our men and women are working steadily and grimly in the war plants, forging the weapons of war that will break the shackles of enslaved nations like Greece.

My words today, will be broadcast to Greece. Let these final words reach the tortured land of the gallant Hellenes: We know of your honorable and heroic stand in this global war for freedom and we admire you for it. We are aware of your martyrdom in the clutches of the German and Bulgarian oppressors. Stand fast, gallant Hellenes. The forces of slavery will be crushed. Greece will once again be free in a world of the "four freedoms"—a world of justice and liberty.

The Omnibus G. I. Bill of Rights for Returning Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able address delivered by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on the G. I. bill of rights for veterans returning from the war.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Americans, on March 18, I reported to the United States Senate from the Committee on Finance the Servicemen's Aid Act of 1944, more familiarly known as the omnibus G. I. bill of rights for the returning veterans of this war.

It was my pleasure and honor last week to see this fundamental bill of rights to facilitate the reintegration of our fighting men into civilian life pass the Senate unanimously. I am proud I was privileged to have had some part in its successful legislative journey. All who are interested in the subject hope and believe that it will speedily have a passage of substantially similar unanimity through the House of Representatives.

In completing legislative action upon the G. I. bill of rights, the Senate has done common justice for the men and women who are offering their lives for the preservation of our Republic. But it has done more than that. It has struck a powerful blow for the preservation of the very future of our Nation.

The bill of rights will be costly, yet its cost is trivial compared to the billions of dollars that we have spent upon the shooting end of the war. And we view the cost of the veterans' bill of rights as true economy. None can deny that it forms a part of the bare-bones cost of the war itself.

We regard it as the best money that can be spent for the future welfare of this Nation. The men and women who compose our armed forces not only hold the safety of our Republic in their hands on the battle fronts today; they will hold its destiny for a generation to come.

To the extent to which these men and women can be speedily reintegrated into the civilian population, the consummation of all of our hopes and our prayers for national security, stability, and prosperity depend.

By the time this war is over, we are told, more than 13,000,000 of our finest men and women will have seen service in our armed forces. They represent the cream of our human resources, the very backbone of our Nation. This Republic can ill afford to lose their skills and their leadership.

Yet that leadership and those skills have been rudely interrupted by war. Education has been halted, the men to whom we must look for the future of business, commerce, industry, and agriculture have been torn from their civilian posts at the formative time; at the time when they were beginning to assume the characteristics that have made America great.

We must recapture those skills and that leadership. If the trained and disciplined efficiency and valor of these men and women of our armed forces can be directed into proper channels, we shall have a better country to live in than the world has ever seen. If we should fail, disaster and chaos are inevitable.

These men will be a potent force for good or evil in the years to come. They can make our country or break it. They can restore our democracy or scrap it. They can promote permanent world order or World War No. 3. But in a very real sense, the responsibility rests not on their shoulders but on ours. If we do not fail them they will not fail us.

And that is why I regard the G. I. bill of rights, passed by the Senate last week, and which I hope will be speedily passed by the House, as one of the most important measures that has ever come before Congress. This bill—which is in all respects in line with the President's program—will go far to solve this very pressing and immediate problem. I do not contend that it is the last word on the subject. But I do assert that it is a fundamental bill of rights for service men and women in facilitating their return to civilian life, and I assert that it represents as little as we can properly do, both in justice to the veterans and in enlightened self-interest for the remainder of the country.

In this measure, we have attempted to state comprehensively and clearly the rights and benefits to which our veterans will be entitled, and to state clearly and simply the way in which these rights may be obtained.

As I see it, there have been two basic goals which we have achieved in this bill.

The first has been to throw every possible protection about the veteran, to bridge the awkward gap between release from the armed services and reintegration into civilian life. We recognize that the burden of war falls heavily upon the citizen soldier who goes forth to become the armored hope of mankind.

We seek to preserve his rights, to see that he gets a square deal, that he is not imposed upon—to protect him against the injustices which result from errors and human failures inherent in a large scale, mass demobilization—and to protect the community as well, insuring its stability, which widespread despair, confusion, and dissatisfaction would destroy.

And the second goal is to see that the veteran is not penalized by reason of his service, that he is given a fair break, winning for himself those traditional American opportunities which he has defended and preserved for all of us here at home.

His most immediate need, perhaps, is the first classification, the "bridge the gap" part of the program. He must be guided as he leaves the service, he must be apprised of his rights, and aided in obtaining them. He may need hospitalization. He most certainly needs money to carry him until he can find suitable employment. And he needs a single place, one concentrated agency, to which he can go for the solution of all his problems.

And in the G. I. bill of rights we have provided all this for him. We have, first, declared the Veterans' Administration to be an essential war agency, and armed it with the priorities in personnel and material so badly needed to enable it to meet all of the veterans' needs.

And, having strengthened the Veterans' Administration, we have given it over-all control of all the activities and benefits affecting the veteran. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs will channel down through existing agencies in administering the program; but his will be the responsibility for its succes both to the veteran and to the Congress.

No longer may the wearied veteran be pushed from pillar to post among seven or eight Government agencies in a tragic search for his rights and benefits.

We have authorized and directed the Veterans' Administration to construct $500,000,000 in additional hospital beds, which will be badly needed when the flood of human casualties flows back home. We have provided that he may use suitable Army and Navy hospitals when they become available.

The Veterans' Administrator is authorized to place designated officials in Army and Navy hospitals to adjudicate disability claims of veterans about to be discharged; and the Army and Navy are directed, as well, to permit authorized representatives of accredited veterans' organizations to go into those hospitals to advise the veterans of the benefits available to them, and to aid them in preparing claims for compensation.

We have, we believe, included provisions that will make it impossible ever again for penniless, disabled, and discharged veterans to be left waiting for months before their claims are adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration and their compensation begin. The fact that little or no blame can attach to the Veterans' Administration for that delay has made it nontheless tragic.

And we have provided for boards of review, within the Army and Navy, to review the so-called blue discharges—discharges without honor—which have been given in far too many cases for trivial reasons. Men have been discharged without honor through no fault of their own other than what the Army calls inaptitude for military service. Beyond that we have provided that the benefits of the bill of rights shall be open to all veterans discharged under any conditions other than dishonorable.

We believe that we have thrown every possible protection about the men and women of our armed forces as they take the first steps into civilian life, and, through a generous scale of unemployment compensation or readjustment allowances, we have continued that protection through the difficult hunt for a job that will follow.

The bill of rights provides for unemployment compensation of $15 a week, plus $5 for one dependent, $8 for two dependents, and $10 for three or more dependents, for any 52 weeks during the first 2 years immediately following the last payment of mustering-out pay.

The veteran will be entitled to 8 weeks of unemployment coverage for each month in the service up to the maximum of 52 weeks' pay.

The unemployment compensation is generous, but it is hedged about with protections essential to the welfare both of the veteran and the community.

No man may collect pay who refuses suitable employment, as defined in the bill; though a veteran does not have to take any job that is offered to him. There is, as well, a just provision for disqualifications which would make the veteran ineligible for compensation under certain conditions.

Thus the immediate goal of amply protecting the veteran is accomplished. Next comes the problem of insuring to him a just share in the opportunities of American life.

The veteran may need education, vocational training, or refresher courses, beyond those already provided for disabled veterans. And the opportunity is here. Properly channeled, without stepping in any way on the toes of the States, the bill provides for 1 year's education for every veteran who has served 6 months or more; and for any veteran actually injured in service, regardless of his length of service.

Beyond the first year, the G. I. bill of rights provides for 3 additional years for those whose progress warrants it.

Tuition and fees not to exceed $500 a year will be paid; plus subsistence allowance of $50 a month, and $25 for dependents. Here, too, the provisions are limited by certain restrictions designed for the good of the veteran and of the public. Yet each veteran may pick his own school; and each school may accept or reject an applicant in accord with its own academic standards. Academic freedom is amply preserved and the Veterans' Administration has only the responsibility of a parent to provide the boy and the money.

Education is of vital importance to these men and women if they are to share in the opportunity of America to the fullest.

But of equal importance are jobs—and the small loans they may need to buy, build, or repair homes, farms, and small business properties The G. I. bill of rights provides for loans not to exceed $1,000 for these purposes; loans which, again, will use existing channels and agencies, public and private.

There will be supervision to see that veterans get full value for their money.

On the job front, the bill stiffens and makes more efficient and effective the veterans' placement service; which hitherto has been a virtual "stepchild" among Government agencies.

Stiff penalties are provided for States whose employment services fail to give qualified veterans preference in job opportunities; and the responsibility for administering this program is vested in a board of which the Veterans' Administrator is chairman.

The United States Employment Service shall assign to each State a veterans' employment representative, who is required to be a war veteran, responsible to the veterans' placement board. He will be responsible for the supervision of registration of veterans in local employment offices; assist in securing and maintaining current information as to available employment; promote the interest of employers in employing veterans, and maintain regular contact with employers and veterans' organizations.

In short, he will be the man who, on the State level, will see that everything is done to give the veteran preference in search for a job; and to see that the job is available.

And thus, in education, in employment, and loans we have done everything possible to give to the veteran an opportunity for a full share in America.

A word on the history of this legislation. It was first drafted by the American Legion, which drew on its 25 years of experience in veterans' rehabilitation. I introduced it early in January, on behalf of several other Senators and myself. It was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the chairman of that committee, Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, referred it to the subcommittee on veterans' affairs, of which he had done me the honor to appoint me chairman.

The committee held lengthy and complete hearings. Conferences were held with veterans' organizations, with other Senators, with various departments of government, and other interested persons. The bill was extensively amended. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] all made valuable and constructive suggestions. Certain technical amendments were suggested by the Army, the Navy, the Federal Housing Administration, and the Agricultural Department, as well as the Veterans' Administration itself.

At the same time, similar hearings were being conducted by the House World War Veterans' Committee, under the chairmanship of the Congressman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

I then reintroduced the bill as perfected in the committee and was joined in the sponsorship by 80 other Senators—an unprecedented number which attested the importance of this measure. It passed the Senate without a dissenting vote.

As I have said, it does not represent the last word on the veterans subject. But America may well congratulate herself that this measure of justice to our fighting men and women has been accomplished.

Unity in the War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article which was printed originally as an advertisement and which I think is one of the most telling arguments with reference to the present war. It was printed at the expense of the Harrisburg Steel Corporation, and is headed "When duty whispers low, 'Thou must!'"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN DUTY WHISPERS LOW, "THOU MUST"
—Emerson's Voluntaries.

The four greatest nations of this earth are waging a life and death struggle with those forces of evil bent on the destruction of man's greatest treasure—freedom. Three times during this, the most devastating war of all time, destiny has tested, through fire and ordeal, three of the four champions of liberty.

Take China. The barbaric Japanese have all but destroyed her material wealth, not to forget for a moment the millions of Chinese who have been wantonly killed by land and air attack. Cities destroyed, huge parts of their homeland under the despot's heel, millions enslaved without benefit of aid or even comfort, China has withstood every trial—supreme in her hour of travail—hoping, praying, and fighting. Truly destiny has marked ageless China as one of its very own.

Remember Dunkerque. Proud Britain almost at journey's end. Unarmed but unafraid, the miracle happened. Three hundred thousand soldiers of the Empire brought home in the face of incredible odds, by the folks back home. And then, that immortal "blood, sweat, and tears" promise of the war's greatest symbol—Churchill. England looked squarely at the finger of destiny and through a unity unparalleled met the issue and in all her righteous wrath rose to the pinnacle of her greatness.

Russia at Moscow. With the German hordes at the gates of the city, with large areas of her country conquered, her important cities in ruins, millions of her men dead or wounded, Russia dared to look at the finger of destiny pointed her way, and, by a united effort of her soldiers, her men, and women—yes, even her children—saved Moscow and saved Russia. Never in the pages of history has greater courage been matched so nobly by sublime unity of purpose.

Each of our allies has had its ordeal, and in each instance has met and conquered when destiny placed their very existence in the balance.

But what about the greatest of these, America? Her sons and daughters have gone forth to do battle in the cause of freedom. Their exploits, their valor, their courage, bring tears to the eye and exaltation to the soul. These fine young people—softies, as they were referred to by our enemies—have learned discipline, have mastered tactics, have forged a unity that gives notice to all of the stuff of which democracy is made.

And now the hour of crisis is here. That hour when the finger of destiny points at us, at America. Will we, the greatest Nation of all, meet our crisis as have our brave allies? Will we, soldier and civilian, be united there on the beachheads of fortress Europe? The next hundred days will write history for a hundred years to come. Can a nation of free men, who enjoy free speech, forget petty things for these hundred days of crisis and unite in spirit and in fact to meet our great test? Can we forget that we are Democrats and Republicans, rich or poor, Jew or gentile, worker or manager—can we be Americans—united as never before in our glorious history? This is more than a battle for beachheads. This is the real test of a system of government that the world has been waiting for. Can we forget, during this short but crucial period, everything but one—that we are united Americans? God grant us, all of us, the wisdom to see, the courage to bear, and the unselfishness to unite in one glorious effort for our country.

Destiny has saved us until last, and history will record these next hundred days as a period in which the final victory will have been achieved by circumstance or by a profound, unselfish unity. Can we meet this last great obstacle humbly, reverently, and unafraid, but most important of all, can we meet it?

Our youth replies, "We can."

Statements by Wendell Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I notice from the public press that Mr. Wendell Willkie, the author of the famous phrase as to the solemnity of his own utterances, who described his solemn protestations to the American people as campaign oratory, not once but several times in hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee on the lend-lease bill, has been undertaking to make it appear that someone had maligned him and tried to pin that phrase on him. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, no one but Mr. Willkie originated that phrase for describing his own speeches as being simply campaign oratory. He did that both in response to a question which I asked him and later in response to a question which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] asked him. Nevertheless, Mr. Willkie claims that someone should apologize to him for pinning such an expression on him.

Mr. Frank C. Waldrop, in yesterday's edition of the Washington Times-Herald, went to the trouble to dig out of the record what Mr. Willkie had actually said in applying the epithet—if it be an epithet—of "campaign oratory" to his own solemn protestations to the American people. He sets out in great detail all the circumstances. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT HE REALLY SAID

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Wendell Willkie has been stomping through lecture halls for some months now, getting away with something that we thought we'd clear up today, just for the record of accuracy.

He has been denying that he ever used the phrase "campaign oratory" to shrug off some of his 1940 remarks that jumped up in 1941 to bite him. He has even gone so far as to say that at least one United States Senator has apologized to him for ever saying he did use the fatal phrase.

Well, now, here are the facts:

In January 1941, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations called hearings on a bill (S. 275) entitled: "A Bill Further To Promote the Defense of the United States, and for Other Purposes." That was the celebrated lend-lease item.

Willkie, considering that he had run for President a few months before and had done a lot of talking, predicting, etc., was a natural to be called for testimony on the need for lend-lease, and so, in due time, he did appear.

Here, taken from page 892 of the committee record of hearings, is the first development in his "campaign oratory" remarks:

Senator CLARK of Missouri. "* * * In speaking of the President last November, you said:

" 'But I cannot follow the President in his conduct of foreign affairs in this critical time. There have been occasions when many of us have wondered if he is deliberately inciting us to war.'

"Is that still your opinion?

"Mr. WILLKIE. As to the statement about the President, in the course of the campaign I made a great many statements about him. He was my opponent, you know.

"Senator CLARK. You would not have said anything about your opponent you did not think was true, would you?

"Mr. WILLKIE. Oh, no; but occasionally in moments of oratory in campaigns we all expand a bit."

That was followed by a protracted wrangle between CLARK and Willkie in which Willkie said he didn't want to "rake over old coals" and have to discuss his 1940 campaign speeches in general or in particular.

Willkie was reminded that in 1940 he had said of Roosevelt such things as this:

"He (F. D. R.) has secretly meddled in the affairs of Europe and he has even unscrupulously encouraged other countries to hope for more help than we are able to give."

Willkie kicked all along at having this brought out.

Then, on page 905, Senator NYE (Republican), of North Dakota, takes up:

"Senator NYE. One more assertion of yours, that of October 30:

" 'On the basis of his (that is, Roosevelt's) past performance, with pledges to the people, you may expect we will be at war by April 1941, if he is elected.'

"Mr. WILLKIE. You ask me whether or not I said that?

"Senator NYE. Do you still agree that that might be the case?

"Mr. WILLKIE. It might be. It was a bit of campaign oratory."

In brief, Willkie in October 1940, in effect accused Roosevelt of the outrageous crime of deliberately leading America to war. In January 1941 he tossed that off as "campaign oratory."

Those plain words from the sworn record cannot be mistaken or misunderstood. There they are, as spoken and recorded.

But, of course, Willkie never expected them to fly up and bite him twice. And so, ever since the original happening, he has been bellowing that he never said it, or he was misquoted, or misunderstood.

For instance, in September 1941, Mr. Willkie was attorney for some witnesses before a Senate subcommittee investigating the motion-picture interests and war propaganda.

The chairman of that inquiry was Senator D. WORTH CLARK of Idaho, and Senator CLARK (page 388 of the printed hearings), offhandedly mentioned the "campaign oratory" episode, saying that Willkie had referred to some of his own "campaign pledges" as "campaign oratory."

Willkie denounced the Senator as a liar.

Senator CLARK promptly dug up the hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee and found there the exact words of Mr. Willkie as you see them in this column.

Thereupon, he went to Willkie and said he had made a mistake in using the words "campaign pledges." He explained that he should have said "campaign statements," and that is the extent of the apology of which Willkie boasts.

But Willkie, even when shown the printed record of his own statements, kept on bellowing, "You're wrong, you're wrong, you're wrong," until a crowd of newspaper correspondents had gathered.

When he had a sufficient audience, he clowned loud and long to prevent the Senator from reading the facts into the record again.

And ever since he has roamed America, shouting, "you're wrong, you're wrong," at people who ask him what about that "campaign oratory" crack.

In case he ever tries it on you, hereafter, you'll know the facts.

American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in the March 23, 1944, issue of the widely read and capably edited New York Sun there appeared an editorial entitled "Does the United States Really Have a Foreign Policy?" Some of the questions which have been posed in the editorial are so cogent, and the general treatment is such, that for the information of the Senate I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOES THE UNITED STATES REALLY HAVE A FOREIGN POLICY?

Secretary Hull's memorandum on American foreign policy is designed to give the bases of that policy. Its familiar round of soothing but shop-worn phrases presents more base than policy. This is discouraging. The administration is still explaining and apologizing and still stops far short of any sharp, convincing, and unequivocal declaration of our aims, our methods of dealing with foreign powers until the war is over, our plans for the post-war period. Thinking Americans had hoped—nay, had had the right to expect—that after floundering all these years the administration could take the American people into its confidence, could formulate at last a statement which the American people could understand.

Most of the 17 points with which Mr. Hull's memorandum deals are like the storied song of the katydid in that they say such undisputed things in such a very solemn way. All of us are agreed that our paramount aims must be to defeat the enemy and look after our true national interests; that international cooperation in a spirit of neighborliness is a good thing; that political differences endangering peace among nations are bad things; that a workable system of adjudicating international disputes is desirable; that future reductions of armaments must be sought by international arrangement; that excessive trade barriers should be avoided; that the sovereign equality of all nations under international law is admirable in principle; that each nation should have the kind of government it prefers—provided that it conducts its internal affairs in such a way as not to jeopardize the peace of other nations; that each nation should mind its own business and not meddle very much in the business of its neighbor; that liberty is worth fighting for; that the advancement of dependent peoples should be a prime care of independent ones. But platitudinous recital of these truisms does not get anybody very far ahead on the road to practical solutions of the practical problems of today, nor does their reiteration, in language however pious, serve as more than the merest adumbration of a foreign policy.

The memorandum did touch, but lightly and hurriedly, on the Moscow Declaration and the Atlantic Charter. If there is anything in the current rumor that the Moscow Declaration has rammed and sunk the Atlantic Charter, Mr. Hull either has not heard of it or does not consider it worthy of notice. It does seem a little singular, however, that he should have dwelt so fervently on the Atlantic Charter without taking cognizance of questions raised about it in the British Parliament, to the obvious embarrassment of our great and good friend, Prime Minister Churchill. Indeed, Mr. Hull's memorandum preceded by less than a day a statement by the Prime Minister that further clarifications of that document are necessary and that this must be a subject of renewed consultation among the Allies. What everybody on both sides of the Atlantic is most anxious to know, of course, is whether the Atlantic Charter means what it says about the rights of all states, small and large, or whether at the peace conference it is to be interpreted—in respect of some countries—in a strictly Pickwickian sense only. As long as we are fighting in Europe and the President is a party to the Atlantic Charter, how do we stand on the Polish borders and the Baltic states? Or do we stand at all, despite the charter? As long as the Secretary of State was talking about our foreign policy, it does seem that he might have taken a little time to explain this important matter to the American public. It was certainly not less important than what he said about spheres of influence, supervision of aggressor nations, and international finance after the war.

Has this country really a foreign policy? If so, nothing in the developments of the last 10 or 12 years indicates it. We scolded Mussolini about Ethiopia and we scolded Hitler about Czechoslovakia and Poland, but we weren't prepared to do anything about either. Earlier we had scolded Japan about Manchuria, but did nothing about that. On the contrary, we kept up a policy of appeasement toward Japan—coupled, however, with finger-shaking and stern admonitions—right up to Pearl Harbor. On October 5, 1937, President Roosevelt made the famous speech at Chicago which was interpreted as threatening a moral quarantine of aggressor nations. When a few—this newspaper included—asked how this was to be made effective, we got no answer.

In a speech at Boston on October 30, 1940—1 year and 37 days before Pearl Harbor—President Roosevelt said:

"While I am talking to you fathers and mothers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again. Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars. They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores. Yes; the purpose of our defense is defense."

What kind of foreign policy was it which at the end of October in 1940 either could not foresee, or else could not control, foreign developments that were to bring war upon us in December of 1941? Have we today a foreign policy that will work better for the United States, say, in another year and 37 days from the present moment?

If the Secretary of State would truly like to enlighten his countrymen in respect of foreign policy, he might take the public a little more into the administration's confidence. That public would like to know, for example, just what was—or was not—agreed upon at Teheran. It would like to know whether the off-again-on-again-gone-again policy pursued in respect of Darlan is again working in respect of the De Gaulle Committee and of King Victor Emmanuel and Marshal Badoglio. It would like to know what apple cart, if any, Marshal Stalin upset when he granted recognition to the Badoglio government.

It is the will of the American people that in time of war politics shall end at the water's edge. We should all be much more inclined to support the administration's foreign policy if only the administration would some day decide to tell us what that policy is. One good, informative speech, such as Winston Churchill occasionally makes in the House of Commons, would be more effective to that end than the whole flood of sugary words with which thus far we have had to be content.

Beryllium

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in recent years I have often called the attention of this body to a new metal and particularly to new alloys resulting therefrom. It has been mentioned as the "wonder metal of World War No. 2," a name it has earned at least to some degree. This metal is beryllium.

It aroused my interest back in 1939, when I was a member of the Temporary National Economic Committee, and it was under investigation by that committee. One reason was because it seemed to be working wonders in engineering practice and it was revolutionary to learn that copper with a small beryllium content could be tempered and made as hard as steel, that a small amount of this metal in a copper alloy would increase the tensile strength more than five times and that an alloy of beryllium and other metals would produce springs that would last millions of times longer than a similar spring made of steel, virtually warranting its right to the title, "a metal that never grows tired."

Besides being interested in this new metal, for other important reasons I also felt alarm. First, it was alarming to learn that there was any group in the United States so well entrenched in its metallurgical activities as to cause it, for purely selfish reasons, to be conniving to put such a valuable war and peace time discovery out of the commercial running because it was tramping on the toes of other less efficient alloys. Second, I was deeply concerned that such throttling of new and valuable enterprises were countenanced in this country where all are supposed to be free to develop new ideas and industries without finding giants in the way when sufficient success enables them to become a competing factor in any line of business.

I have watched the adoption of beryllium and its alloys from that time on. I have known when the first piece of this metal was used by the aircraft industry and I have seen those uses expand until today almost 200 parts containing beryllium are found in every plane that is built for war purposes. Probably I do not know all of them because many secret uses have been found, but I do know that the metal is vital in radio application, in gyroscopes and in other equipment where no known metal will do as well.

Despite these uses and the war emergency where all should be working for a common purpose, the Beryllium Corporation of Delaware, which made this metal what it is today, has been continuously stabbed in the back from inside of Government as well as from outside, until its progress has been slowed down and its efficiency impaired because of the fights it has encountered from the enemy within while it was doing its part to destroy the enemy from without.

While beryllium has been known and its value suspected for more than 100 years, it took $3,000,000 of cash, raised from numerous American citizens and spent judiciously by the management of the Beryllium Co., before its uses were developed to a commercial stage. Even now not a dollar has flowed back to those who furnished money to complete its development. Even now not a dollar has been earned by the corporation itself, except in the year 1943 when it did break out of continuous red ink and demonstrated its ability to show earnings if given just half a chance.

Since its uses became better known and the facts well established that it was really a competitive metal, those opposed to its successful development have apparently lost no time in throwing obstacles in its way and I have heard so many conflicting, and to my own knowledge erroneous, reports about beryllium that my suspicions are constantly aroused as to what next would happen to thwart its progress. Through governmental agencies I have heard that it was too rare a metal to be of any commercial or military value. I have heard at other times that it was of such strategic value that even its name should not be mentioned above a whisper. From still other Government sources I have heard and read that beryl ore was a drug on the market and if any foreign countries so desired no restrictions should be placed on the free exporting of this material.

While stories were coming to me about its lack of merit, I have seen the Government invest several million dollars to produce more of these alloys and instead of encouraging the company, which merited full Government support, I have seen its management violently attacked as incompetent bunglers and I have seen Government requirements placed in the hands of totally inexperienced groups who somehow, someway got the ear of Government agencies while the parent company was being eased into the discard.

Truly it has been a metal of controversy.

Such gyrations do not just happen, but are brought about as a rule by some selfish influence working in a subtle manner to destroy a coming enterprise for ulterior purposes, and I think it is high time to find out what is happening in this entire industry, else other new enterprises will lag if it becomes known that after fortunes are spent in process and plant developments, no protection is given to those who have carried the ball to that point.

The Beryllium Corporation discovered 10 years ago that Germany was pretty far advanced along this line and that patents were being taken out in the United States by Siemens & Halske and the Heraeus-Vacuumschmelze, a subsidiary. These patents were interfering with and were competitive to similar discoveries under development here and in 1934 a contract was made between the American and German concerns, granting to the American company the right to use all of the combined patents in the United States, and this, in fact, really started the Beryllium Corporation on its way to important commercial developments. This contract was for a period of 10 years and it expires today. The contract, however, contains a clause to provide for its extension, by mutual consent, for the life of the patents.

Our involvement in war makes that extension impossible to negotiate, except through the Alien Property Custodian, who has now properly taken over the German interests.

Congress has not as yet adopted a policy for the handling of German patents and the present administrative policy seems to be to issue nonexclusive licenses to those who desire them, thus nullifying any advantages or protection further accruing to those who have heretofore practically exhausted their capital in the laboratory and who have not had an opportunity to recoup such investments before being thrown into ruthless and destructive competition with existing trusts and monopolies and with the mushroom concerns lacking the know-how, all of whom have cunningly awaited this opportunity to put us back, probably, into the bronze age when we have actually emerged into the beryllium age.

I have no quarrel at the moment with the policy of the Alien Property Custodian, nor do I suggest that the policy adopted is all wrong, but I do object strenuously in this case to seeing the Anaconda Copper Co. and its subsidiary, the American Brass Co., slyly waiting at the door and, along with other similar interests, grabbing off nonexclusive licenses when for many long years that very group has been gunning for the life of this development because, first, it will use less pounds of copper to perform many useful operations; and, second, because regardless of the quantity of copper used it will excel in performance many articles made of bronze, which is an alloy so dear to the hearts of the copper industry.

To prevent such a calamity confronting the beryllium industry, which may easily result in snuffing it out entirely or burying it in a heap of confusion, as was the hope and efforts of this same group 6 years ago, and to clarify its standing in the world and insure its preservation for our future industrial needs, I have introduced a bill which I feel will offer some kind of relief to the Beryllium Corporation and prevent its slaughter and annihilation or else, and just as bad, its being turned over to a monopolistic group which will, in my opinion, fail to develop it for other than their selfish interests may elect

I feel sure, in the face of this pending legislation, that the Alien Property Custodian will not commit any irrevocable act and will hold matters in status quo until proper consideration is given this entire subject by the appropriate committee to which this bill will be referred.

This country has suffered because we have had no adequate way to encourage those who have made revolutionary discoveries or who have valuable ideas worthy of development by supplying Government funds for such purposes. It certainly behooves us to at least see that such discoveries, when important enough to pinch the toes of existing monopolies, should be protected against those who would, for purely selfish purposes, try to kill them aborning.

I also feel, in a case of this kind, that it is the duty of the Congress to assist the Alien Property Custodian in making a fair and just disposition of the beryllium contract.

If new metals, such as beryllium, are allowed to drift into the hands of known "killers" whose practices have heretofore been exposed, it will lose for our Nation this valuable discovery and impede the starting of new and daring enterprises—which, after all, have made America great.

America's Answer to the Civil Aeronautics Board

REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have extended in the RECORD remarks on aviation in the relation to aircraft. These extensions are Use of Aircraft in Connection With the Merchant Marine, March 9, 1944, and Post-War Air Transportation, March 14, 1944.

I am now extending my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on America's Answer to the Civil Aeronautics Board. As these problems are so vital to the post-war policies of the United States, I shall send copies of these speeches to the Secretary of State with the urgent request that they be considered by the State Department in relation to our post-war world with the hope that something may be done to enable the American merchant marine to meet the competition it faces in the post-war world and to overcome the terrible handicaps which confront it by reason of the policies and interpretations of the Civil Aeronautics Board which in my opinion are so completely at variance with the original intent of Congress, and with the best interest of its people.

AMERICA'S ANSWER TO THE CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD

Foreign commerce is being diverted from the American merchant marine to aeronautical commercial companies with the direct or indirect aid of our Government in a manner which augurs disaster for the maritime industry. The momentum of the political surge toward monopoly in international aviation is having present deterrent effect on our foreign trade. A baby industry, aviation, is gathering for itself all the new gifts an admiring and indulgent governmental parent can bestow, and the grandfather of our foreign commerce, the merchant marine, is being sabotaged as efficiently as the destruction of a single ship by inimical agents. A disservice to the American people will be accomplished unless immediate measures are now taken by our Government to prevent the demise of our merchant marine—America's greatest single instrument of foreign commerce and prime auxiliary of the Navy in national defense.

Prescinding from, but not unmindful of, the general overall perspective of our foreign trade relations with the nations of the world, the maritime industry notes with apprehension the proposals to allow the resources of our Government, financial and administrative, to be placed at the disposal of a single instrument of aviation to the exclusion of steamship company participation in aeronautics.

The question of the merits of a monopolistic creature of international trade, un-American as it is in theory, is secondary in importance to the fact that steamship companies have been deprived of the right to enter the aviation field, except under most unfortunate restriction limitations, imposed not by the words of a law but by an administrative interpretation of a supposed or alleged intent of Congress in enacting a particular section of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. Section 408 (b) of that act has been applied by a quasi-judicial decision of the Civil Aeronautics Board, which grows in strength and importance with each passing day, that Congress intended therein to rigidly delimit participation by steamship companies in the field of aeronautics. Such is not the fact and the decisions of the Civil Aeronautics Board in their restraint of the maritime industry and their refusal to recommend to the President, the ultimate arbiter of the issuance of certificates of convenience and necessity, the condition precedent for the right of any person to enter the aviation field, that steamship companies be allowed to enter aviation are given without citation of legal authority for the position taken by that Board. No steamship company can, under present law, appear before the tribunal of our Civil Aeronautics Authority and plead their cause, untrammeled by the prejudged prejudices of the Civil Aeronautics Board with respect to their right of steamship participation in aviation, so necessary to the life of the merchant marine.

The problem is one of monopoly through a chosen Government-owned or protected instrument against free enterprise with the maritime industry enjoying equality of treatment.

History proves that the merchant marine, plying trade routes through weather fair and foul, under financial conditions which would have extinguished the life of another industry, has built the structure of our foreign commerce. Our Government has spent millions of dollars subsidizing steamship companies to develop these routes which form the source of our trade with the nations of the world. Common sense would seem to indicate that our National Government would seek to protect that which it has created rather than to destroy its investment in foreign commerce and national security which it has through the offices of the United States Maritime Commission nurtured and protected. The merchant marine of this country must be aided, not deliberately harmed. It is inconceivable that any department of our Government, legislative or executive, whether it be the Department of State, Interstate Commerce Commission, or Civil Aeronautics Board, could so close its eyes to the present disaster which faces the merchant marine if it is not allowed to participate in aviation, that constructive planned assistance will not be given to the merchant marine in this all-important crisis of its existence. There will always be ships on the ocean. If they will not be American vessels, due to lack of governmental foresight, there will be foreign shipping taking from our shores the export commodities which are the life of our national commerce.

There will be no American ships carrying American passengers under the American flag unless the American maritime industry is allowed to carry its own passengers in its own aircraft in the same way foreign shipowners are now allowed to carry American passengers and freight in foreign aircraft under certificates of convenience and necessity issued to foreign interests by our Civil Aeronautics Board—witness the K. L. M., a Dutch company, flying from Miami to Curaçao and other ports over routes denied American shipping interests who have spent their industrial lives in their building. Such an un-American practice is to be deprecated. American public opinion, if it were informed, would express its sentiment that such treatment was, to speak colloquially, unsportsmanlike, and, to speak economically, a public financial fiasco.

This problem is not political. American public interest demands protection of its merchant marine. Men who do not know the intricacies of foreign-trade development through the instrumentality of the merchant marine are certainly not qualified to condemn its future by refusing the maritime industry equality among applicants before Civil Aeronautics Board for certificates of convenience and necessity. Men who know shipping and the problems of the industry are unanimous in the opinion that right to participate in aviation should be granted steamship companies.

There are presently pending before Civil Aeronautics Board applications for certificates of convenience and necessity filed by American Export Lines, Inc., Grace Lines, Inc., Moore-McCormack Lines, Inc., New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., and Matson Navigation Co. These companies have received the following accrued operating differential subsidies:

Company	Period	Amount
American Export Lines, Inc.	July 1, 1937, to June 30, 1943	$5, 647, 219. 10
Grace Lines, Inc.	July 1, 1937, to June 1942	3, 940, 451. 01
Moore-McCormack Lines, Inc.	July 1, 1937, to June 30, 1943	4, 841, 971. 66
New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co.	July 1, 1937, to June 1942	1, 775, 238. 61
Oceanic Lines connected with Matson Navigation Co.	do	2, 760, 948. 12
Total		18, 965, 828. 50

These subsidies were granted by the United States to maintain and protect its merchant marine as an instrument of commerce and national defense. The figures indicated do not include construction differential subsidies granted steamship companies for the same purpose. This money—public funds—was invested in public interest, not to help foster individual companies. The broad question of the public interest must be the answer to the question, "Shall we allow the merchant marine to be destroyed by the administrative rulings of the Civil Aeronautics Board?"

There can be but one answer. America needs and must have the strongest merchant marine in history, supplemented and aided by such aircraft as may be necessary to maintain its position in foreign commerce. The shipping industry asks no favors. It asks only equality of right.

McGregor Speaks in Behalf of Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, it is our duty as a Congress to develop a program to assure just and equal benefits for those of our armed forces. Thousands of boys and girls are being discharged each month. Many need hospitalization, many need education, many need homes. They need immediate attention and assistance.

Being a veteran of World War No. 1 I fully realize the difficulties encountered when we attempt to rehabilitate ourselves to civilian life after service in the armed forces.

We have two bills before us for consideration—S. 1767 and H. R. 4357—which are companion bills and known as bill of rights for veterans which I think incorporate the findings of careful investigation and thorough study. I believe these bills will be of great aid to the returning veterans and I respectfully urge, Mr. Speaker, that they be brought up for consideration and passage as soon as possible.

The records will show that I have consistently supported all equitable legislation providing just and reasonable benefits for our fighting men and women of all wars, as well as for their dependents, and I hope that when the committee has hearings on these two bills—S. 1767 and H. R. 4357—relative to veterans of World War No. 2, the committee will also give some consideration to the needs of the veterans and their dependents of World War No. 1. Let us give immediate aid to these groups of patriotic citizens.

Farm Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a news story from a recent issue of the Florence (Ala.) Times. It is a story of farm security brought about by the farm tenant purchase program of the Farm Security Administration. It is just one more case in justification of this program.

The article follows:

After an appropriate program at Florence State Teachers' College recently Thomas B. Chestnut, district supervisor for Farm Security Administration, presented to Mr. and Mrs. Grady K. Hammond, of Lauderdale County, their farm mortgage to the amount of $4,217. This farm is located in Grassy community in the eastern part of Lauderdale County. The opportunity for the Hammonds to own this farm home was made possible by the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, an act which authorizes the making of loans to worthy tenant farmers who cannot otherwise finance the purchase of a family-sized farm. These loans cover not only the purchase price of the land but they also set up at the same time funds to cover cost of construction of whatever farm buildings are needed.

Payments are made on the variable plan, that means on the basis of income after all necessary expenses are deducted. The Hammonds liquidated their entire debt in 3 years.

When Mr. Hammond moved on his farm in 1940 he had two good mules, one cow, two heifers, a wagon and plow tools—all paid for. However, he needed a crop loan of $400 to finance his year's operations. Now only 3 years later, his farm is clear of mortgage; he owns, besides his team, a tractor and equipment, an automobile, feed and seed and livestock worth over $4,000. How has Mr. Hammond made such progress? By hard work, good management, and the opportunity to get proper financing at a low rate of interest, as furnished by the Farm Security Administration. The Hammond family has contributed immensely to the war effort in the production of milk, eggs, chickens, hogs, and peanuts. His farm operations have earned for him 41 units and he is planning to increase the production of specific food crops so vitally needed to win the war.

Lauderdale County has 108 farmers who have taken advantage of the opportunity offered by Bankhead-Jones Act and have purchased family-sized farms. The near future will find others in the county achieving the goal that Mr. and Mrs. Hammond are enjoying today.

In connection with the presentation of the mortgage to Mr. Hammond a short program was conducted at Florence State Teachers' College, March 11, when talks were made by Dr. J. A. Keller, president; W. Herschel Walker, county superintendent of education; A. H. Barnett, county agent, and M. Thornton, teacher of vocational agriculture at Lexington High School.

Mr. Hammond was the first Lauderdale County client of F. S. A. to retire his indebtedness in full; the first in the State was a Limestone County farmer, who achieved that distinction last year. However, Mr. Hammond is the second farmer in the State to reach that greatly desired goal.

After They Leave the Fox Holes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following editorial entitled "After They Leave the Fox Holes," which appeared in the March 18, 1944, issue of The Pilot, published in Boston, Mass.:

AFTER THEY LEAVE THE FOX HOLES

Fathers and mothers have every right to feel optimistic about the spiritual welfare of their sons in the service. It is probably correct to say that never was so sincere and earnest an effort made to provide soldiers with the solace which religion signifies. In the service, religious opportunities vary with times and places. But parents may feel reasonably assured that, if their sons were well grounded in religious principle before they left home, they will not drift away—the church will follow them to camp, cross the ocean with them, and accompany them into combat areas.

But it is well to face sober realities. In the opinion of an experienced Air Force chaplain, an afternoon in a fox hole will not inevitably convert an atheist into a believer,

He notes that many soldiers turn to religion when they learn that a dangerous advance has been ordered. But "you don't find the same religious zeal or desire to learn after the danger has passed and the soldier is again safe in camp."

So the formula, "there were no atheists in the fox holes of Bataan," needs definition.

In the proximate danger of death every sane man is serious. He sees things in proportion. The money in his pockets is worth nothing; he cannot take so much as a penny with him. His decorations, the acclaim of his fellows—at this moment they are worthless, too. Then he realizes the infinite value of the prayers he found so little time to say, of the manly virtues he cultivated so ungenerously. He is rich, like the farmer of the parable, in things that do not count, because "this night do they require thy soul of thee."

Then the peril passes. This money, which he learned briefly to despise, is valid currency in the world to which he returns. His position means something once again; men respect it and want it for themselves; their envy warms him.

Can any man stand in the shadow of death and remain agnostic or atheist? Evading a direct answer, we can at least offer this comment: Many of such "conversions" fade with the danger which inspired them. The atheist in a fox hole is very liable to lapse into atheism when he leaves his fox hole.

This priest-chaplain has the highest respect for American soldiers. But he finds them religiously illiterate.

So the sound, inescapable conclusion is this: Generally speaking, Army life will not effect your boy's conversion to religion. But if he left your home well instructed, he has formed a strong affirmative habit. He will encounter temptations. But the priest is accessible. You have a reasonable guaranty that your patent work as parents, done in the years when your boy played with toy drums and leaden soldiers, will bear fruit. He will come back to you a stronger, manlier Christian than when you bade him good-bye.

The One-House Legislature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] has requested that I ask consent of the Senate for the reprint of an article on the subject, The One-House Legislature, by the Honorable George W. Norris, of Nebraska, appearing in The Annals of The American Academy of Political and Social Science for September 1935, which was placed in the RECORD on October 13, 1941, by the late Hon. Charles L. McNary.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ONE-HOUSE LEGISLATURE

(By George W. Norris)

A study of the history of civilization will convince any student of government that the legislature has come into existence as a curb upon the power of royalty. Originally there were no legislatures. As the people became better educated and as civilization advanced, various methods and means were adopted to curb the power of the king and to give the people some voice in government. Gradually, through the centuries, various devices were invented and tried with varying degrees of success. Eventually the legislature came into existence.

The first assemblies which had any resemblance to a legislature were called together by the king, usually for the purpose of advising with the monarch as to how best he could preserve all his authority from the demands of his people who were dissatisfied and who were complaining of alleged tyrannical acts. These assemblies had no representative functions whatever. They did what the king desired, and if they did not, their services were terminated. These assemblies were composed, of course, of single bodies, but they had no function that a democracy would confer upon a legislature as it is now understood. Gradually these assemblies, under various names, began to have some legislative functions, and the people had some degree of participation in their selection. They gravitated into two groups, one representing nobility and wealth, the other representing the people.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LEGISLATIVE STRUCTURE

In England, one group became known as the House of Lords, representing the nobility and people of wealth; the other became known as the House of Commons, representing the common people. Other countries had very similar experiences.

Although the American colonists rebelled against Great Britain and formed a government of their own, still, in setting up the new government they used the mother country as a model. At that time England was governed by a Parliament consisting of two houses, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. Each one of these houses had the same jurisdiction. The House of Lords, however, owed no responsibility to the people. Its members were appointed for life by the King. The two Houses of Parliament, therefore, represented two classes of people. They obtained their offices from entirely different sources. The members of the House of Commons received their source of power from the common people, while the members of the House of Lords received their authority from the King. Thus constituted, it was supposed that one would be a check upon the other, and the arrangement would prevent either one of these classes from getting any undue advantage in government.

When our forefathers adopted the Constitution, they placed the legislative function in a Congress divided into two branches, the Senate and the House of Representatives. Provision was made for the election of the House of Representatives by the people themselves. That is the only place in the Constitution, as originally agreed upon, where the people had a direct voice and vote in the selection of any Federal official. Provision was made that the legislatures should select the Senators. In the main it was intended that the House of Representatives, like the House of Commons, should represent the people and that the Senate should be elected from the wealthy, aristocratic class, to represent the aristocracy. This remained the fundamental law for more than a century, when the people amended the Constitution and provided for the direct election of Senators by the people.

It is worthy of note in this connection that Great Britain, as her people have become more democratic in their ideas of government, has gradually taken away from the House of Lords most of its legislative authority. In 1911 the House of Lords was shorn of practically all its legislative functions, and today Great Britain, for all practical purposes, is operating under a unicameral or one-house legislature. It is important therefore to observe that the pattern used by our forefathers in the formation of our Government has been abandoned by the mother country. We still adhere to the ancient form, while the substance of legislative authority has been entirely changed by the country after which we modeled our Federal and State Constitutions.

UNICAMERAL FEDERAL LEGISLATURE IMPOSSIBLE

In advocating the adoption of a one-house legislature by our States, I am often asked why I do not advocate a change in the Federal Constitution, providing for a one-house legislature. To this question there is an easy answer. Regardless of the merits or the demerits of a one-house legislature as compared with a two-house legislature, it is impossible under present conditions to secure a one-house Federal legislature.

The Constitution of the United States provides that each State, regardless of size or population, shall have two Members of the United States Senate. This gives to all smaller States an advantage over the larger and more populous States in the Senate. Delaware, with its small area and comparatively small population, is entitled to as great representation in the Senate as is New York. Little New Mexico, having a vast territory but not enough population to entitle it to two Members in the House of Representatives, is equal in the Senate to the State of Pennsylvania.

An amendment to the Constitution of the United States must have, before it can be submitted, a two-thirds vote in the Senate and also in the House of Representatives. The smaller and less populous States, which under our Constitution have an advantage in the Senate, vastly outnumber the more populous States. It would be an impossibility to secure a two-thirds vote in either House to submit the necessary constitutional amendment. But even if such an amendment were submitted, it would require approval by three-fourths of the State legislatures to make it effective, and it can easily be seen that securing such approval would be an absolute impossibility. It is therefore only a waste of time to attempt to secure the adoption of such a Federal constitutional amendment.

DUPLICATION OF LEGISLATIVE BRANCHES

Members of the two branches of our State legislatures are elected by the people of the several States and from the same class of people and are given the same legislative authority. There is no division anywhere in the Union along aristocratic lines, and there is no qualification of wealth or property. There is no reason to give the two branches of our State legislatures the same authority to do the same thing, where they possess the same qualifications for office and where the work of the two bodies is identical. Our legislative system provides, insofar as the legislatures are concerned, that the work shall be done twice, requiring identical action by each branch, although each branch has the same jurisdiction. Such unreasonable and illogical action is not required in any other governmental activity.

This illogical procedure is well illustrated by what happens in our courts of justice. A case in court may involve a lifetime of savings. It may involve the liberty of one or more of the litigants. It may even involve human life. But, however important may be the issue, it is unnecessary to have more than one trial. Under the guidance and control of the presiding judge, each side offers all the evidence deemed important or relevant. When all the evidence is in, the attorneys argue the case to the jury. When the argument is over, the judge instructs the jury. The jury retires, and after deliberation, renders a verdict. The judge renders judgment upon this verdict. This determination of the issue is then settled. It is ended, unless the jury or the judge has violated some constitutional provision, in which case the entire trial is set aside and held for naught by the appellate court.

This same check would exist in legislative matters if we had the one-house legislature.

If the legislature exceeded its constitutional authority in the enactment of any law, it would be set aside by the Supreme Court. There would also exist the veto power of the Governor and referendum provisions of the State constitution, so that the people could by such referendum nullify any law passed by the one-house legislature, as they have the power to do now.

PRESENT LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

Let me illustrate the method of passing laws by a two-house legislature.

A bill is introduced, let us say, in the House and by the House referred to a committee, whereupon the committtee holds hearings at which all persons interested on either side of the controversy have an opportunity to be heard. When the hearings are finished, the committee debates the question in all its phases. After it has concluded its consideration and deliberation, it reports the bill to the House. Under the rules of the House, the bill comes up for discussion and debate. All Members of the House have the right to be heard. The bill is argued in all its phases, and then the House votes upon it. If the bill is passed, the House sends it to the Senate. The Senate refers it to the standing committee, and everybody again has the right to be heard. As a rule, the same people who have been heard by the House committee come again at their own expense and at a sacrifice of their time and are heard by the Senate committee. After they have exhausted the subject again, the Senate committee considers it and deliberates upon it. Then they report the bill to the Senate, and there the Members of the Senate debate it. They consider it from all angles. They go over practically the same ground that has been gone over by the House. Perhaps they amend it in some particular, and in this form they pass the bill.

The bill is then returned to the House for action upon the Senate amendments and, usually, as a matter of form, the House rejects the Senate amendments, and the bill is sent to conference. Practically all legislation over which there is any controversy goes to a conference committee. The conferees, usually three from the House and three from the Senate, take up the bill for consideration. As a rule their deliberations are held behind closed doors. There is no roll call. There is no provision of law for a record of any of the proceedings of the conference committee. The conference committee perhaps writes a new bill. The conferees modify it without any hearings, without any publicity, and without any record vote. If they agree, they report it to the House and Senate.

The conference bill comes up in the House and Senate, and it must be voted up or down without amendment. There is no such thing as the amendment of a conference bill. Members of the House and the Senate may find in it provisions which they think are wrong. They cannot move to strike them out. If good provisions have been left out by the conference committee they cannot move to insert them. They must accept the evil in order to get the good. If they want to reject the evil, they must likewise reject the good. This places the Members of the House and the Senate in a very unfavorable and unfair light. Modifications or changes in a bill, which have been made without public discussion, without the knowledge of the public, without any roll call, and without any record, must be approved as a whole or disapproved as a whole. If the House or the Senate reject the conference report it goes again to conference, and in the last days of a session especially, this means death to the bill.

THEORY AND PRACTICE

It is contended by those who oppose the one-house legislature that rules could be made for governing a conference committee by which a record could be kept of its proceedings and by which the proceedings could take place in public. It is also contended that the power of the conference committee to write any provisions into any bill can also be restricted by parliamentary rules.

In theory, under general parliamentary law, the conference committee is limited in its jurisdiction to actual disagreements between the two Houses. In the Federal Congress the rules of the respective bodies provide that if a conference committee writes any provision into a bill that is not in either the House or the Senate bill, or strikes out any provision which is in the same form in both the House and Senate bills, the report of the conference committee will be subject to a point of order. Similar rules prevail in some of the State legislatures; but I understand that the conference committee is not thus limited in a great many of the legislatures, and the practice often is to write an entirely new bill. In fact, it often happens that one House strikes out all of the bill after the enacting clause and inserts an entirely new bill. Of course, the effect of this is to put the entire bill into conference.

These parliamentary provisions are often the means of defeating legislation. Points of order are made on conference reports, and if the point is sustained, the bill goes back to conference. Thus delay takes place, and delay often results in the complete defeat of the legislation, in the end bringing about just the situation that is desired by the lobbyists who are trying to defeat the legislation.

It would be possible, by constitutional amendment or perhaps by statute, to provide that conference committees should do their work in public, and that a record should be had of their proceedings. This, however, has never been done, so far as I am aware, in the history of the world. No public record of the work of any conference committee, either in the Federal Congress or in any State legislature, has ever been made or kept. It is safe to say that no attempt ever will be made to keep such a record, because it would at once show to the public that the conference committee is in reality a third house, and that it is the most powerful one of the three.

It must be borne in mind, also, that a conference committee is not under the control of either one of the Houses. Either House can control to a degree its own conferees, but neither one of them alone can adopt any rules that will result in any control of the conferees of the other House.

I am not objecting to the conferenec committee in any legislature consisting of two Houses, because I know of no other method that has ever been devised that can handle a disagreement between the two Houses. I do not object, either, to the fact that the conference report cannot be amended. If amendments were permitted, such procedure would nullify the real intent of a conference committee and would make an agreement between the two Houses absolutely impossible. There is no way to get rid of a conference committee and its necessary evils except by the establishment of a one-house legislature.

CONTROL BY SPECIAL INTERESTS

In a one-house legislature there would be no such thing as a conference committee. There would be no such thing as legislation in the dark or legislation without a public record. Opponents of the one-house legislature claim that a two-house legislature makes it more difficult for special interests and monopolies to control legislation than would be the case with a one-house legislature. Experience shows exactly the reverse to be true. It must be observed that special interests, monopolies, and combinations do not as a rule propose legislation. They are interested in the prevention of legislation which in any way restricts or modifies their powers, and they employ shrewd and often corrupt lobbyists to defeat any legislation to which they object.

To prevent legislation it is not necessary to control both the House and the Senate. All that is necessary is to prevent action by either House, or, what is much easier, if the bill is in conference—and it usually is—to control the conference committee. Lobbyists are experts in such procedure. Where there is no public record and no way to tell just what happens, they are able to handle the conference committee so as to prevent action. Let us see how this can be done.

A conference committee of six, let us assume, has been appointed on some bill. Three of the members are appointed by the Speaker of the House and three by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. In order to get any agreement out of a conference committee, the House and the Senate conferees must agree to the same identical provisions. The three members from the House control the House vote in the conference committee. The three members from the Senate control the Senate vote.

All that is necessary to prevent action is to be able to control two of the Senate conferees or two of the House conferees. Either will prevent an agreement, or result in the laying down of conditions which will necessitate an agreement along lines desired by the two objecting members of the conference committee. These two members can insist on putting into the conference bill those provisions which are satisfactory to them, and can bring about the rejection of other provisions which are not satisfactory to them. Thus, either we have no conference report, in which case the bill is dead, or we have a conference report with a modified bill which is agreeable to the monopoly opposing the original bill.

But this is not the only place where special interests can prevent legislation. If, at the beginning of the session, they are able to control the election of the Speaker, it is possible to influence and sometimes actually control the appointment of all conference committees. It is a well-recognized fact that at the beginning of almost every legislature there is a contest over the election of the Speaker of the House. The public as a rule does not know all the in's and out's of the controversy and does not often understand what, if any, agreements have been made in secret that have brought about the election of some particular individual as Speaker of the House.

We, see, therefore, that special interests desiring to control legislation in a two-body house have several opportunities to accomplish their purpose: First, by control of the Senate; second, by control of the House; third, by control of two members of the conference committee representing the House; fourth, by control of two members of the conference committee representing the Senate; fifth, by control of the Speaker; and sixth, by control of the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

ADVANTAGES OF ONE-HOUSE LEGISLATURE

Nothing of this kind could happen in a one-house legislature. There would be no such thing as shifting responsibility from the House to the Senate, or from the Senate to the House. There would be no such thing as shifting responsibility to a conference committee. There would be no importance attached to the election of a Speaker. After the bill had been introduced and considered by the committee, after hearings had been held, after the subject had been exhausted in the one-house legislature, a vote would be taken. Any amendment which might be offered would there be fully discussed and voted upon. The vote would be in the open. Pitiless publicity would reign supreme.

Constituents of every member would know next morning when they read the papers, or that afternoon when they heard the radio, just what the record of their public servant was. It would not be necessary to follow the action of the Senate, the House, and then the conference committee. The constituents, without any great effort, would be able to see and understand every legislative step which took place. Not only would they be able to punish the unworthy servant, but they would also be able to reward the one who had been faithful. And we should realize that not only is it important that we punish public servants who have failed to do their duty, but we should be equally anxious to reward those who have done their duty. With a one-house legislature the voters would be able to do this without any difficulty, whereas it is almost impossible to do either under the two-house legislative system.

It is perfectly apparent, therefore, that instead of one house being a check upon the other, the double-barreled system is a shield for corruption, concealing the record of unworthy representatives, making it impossible for a critical public to know just what the record is. In every two-house legislature, after the close of the session, if we post the checks and balances we shall find that the politicians have the checks and the special interests have the balance.

We must not overlook the fact, also, that the one-house legislature would save vast sums of money to the taxpayers. This would be done even though we increase (which in most cases we should do) the salary of the individual legislator. In many cases we could double the salary of the individual legislator and still save large amounts of money on the salary item alone.

IRRESPONSIBLE LEGISLATION

But this item of expense is probably one of the least. The truth is, there are a thousand ways in which a legislature will appropriate money for different political jobs in a two-house legislature, which are deemed necessary, especially if the members are elected on a partisan basis. The closing days of a legislature in practically every State in the Union disclose most disgraceful practices in the matter of making laws for the government of our people. Conference committees come in every few hours; members know that if a conference bill is defeated in the late days of a session, it will mean the complete defeat of the legislation. The inclination always is then to vote for the conference report. In this way, jokers innumerable get into our laws. Laws which the people of a State want are either omitted entirely or couched in such language, sometimes purposely, that the Supreme Court will hold them unconstitutional. Laws which the people want, which have been passed by one house, are indefinitely postponed or otherwise defeated in the other house, without a record vote.

Thus the tracks of unworthy legislators are covered up and no public record made. Log-rolling and the shifting of responsibility from one house to the other is a very common occurrence. Nothing of this kind could occur in a one-house legislature. Greater deliberation would take place, and yet less time would be consumed, if we take into consideration the time spent in the two houses and also in the conference committee.

Responsibility always makes a person more deliberate, more logical, and more careful. The same individual would be a much better legislator in a one-house legislature, where responsibility could not be shifted and where every official act must be performed before the eyes of the public, than in a two-house legislature, where all kinds of opportunities are offered to shift his responsibility, to share it with others, or to conceal his official acts from the public gaze.

EXPERIENCE OF OTHER COUNTRIES

There is no more reason for a State to have two branches of its legislature than there is for a wagon to have five wheels. The experience of our neighbor to the north demonstrates that the one-house legislature has given eminent satisfaction. The Dominion of Canada contains nine Provinces. All these Provinces except one have one-house legislatures. They have found that they get better laws at less expense, while the activities of corrupt lobbyists are cut to the minimum.

The little Republic of Finland has been so well governed that it is the only European power that has the financial ability to meet the installments of war loans due the American Government. Finland has had a one-house legislature for 17 years.

Announcement has been made by the public press that the Government of the Philippine Islands, the newest republic of the world, whose ship of state is being launched upon the governmental sea under the auspices and direction of the American Government, is to have a one-house legislature.

NONPARTISAN LEGISLATORS

Not only should the legislature of a State be confined to one house, but its members should be elected on a nonpartisan ballot. Our great parties are divided according to the beliefs of our people on national issues. The tariff, the League of Nations, ship subsidies, and a hundred other things could be cited to demonstrate this proposition. With these national questions the legislatures of our States have nothing whatever to do. They should be elected on State issues, which may be entirely different from national issues which divide our political parties.

Under present conditions we elect a member of the legislature because he bears the label of a national party, and those who vote their ticket straight vote for members of the legislature on the same ticket, regardless of the fact that the voter may not agree with the candidate on any of the State issues over which the legislature will have jurisdiction. We are therefore likely to have a legislature which does not represent the sentiment of the State's own people. Such an illogical condition could be avoided if the members of the legislature were elected on a nonpartisan ballot. They would then be free from the issues of national politics. They would not be subject to the influence of political bosses and party machines. They would not be responsible to any party on a false issue, but would be responsible to their own people upon issues which have a direct bearing upon the official duties of th members of the legislature.

A State should be a business institution and not a political machine. Its government should be conducted on business principles. It should transact its business much as does a great corporation, with the Governor as the president, the legislature as the board of directors, and the people as the stockholders. If politics were eliminated, the members of the legislature would not be handicapped by partisan considerations. Under present conditions, the sessions of nearly every legislature in the country are fraught with the game of politics from beginning to end. We cannot expect our legislators, if elected as partisans, to close their eyes to the power and influence of the party machines.

Most States elect their judges and their county and State superintendents of schools on a nonpartisan ballot. Why should we elect legislators because they give adherence to a particular party on an issue which has nothing to do with their official duties, and then elect judges, who interpret the laws enacted by those legislators, on a strictly nonpartisan basis? Why do corporations have but one board of directors? Why should not a city have two boards of aldermen? Indeed, why should we not have two Governors of a State instead of one?

To ask these questions is to answer them. Such a method would be illogical and unreasonable, and would make it possible for special interests to control legislation and make it impossible for the people to know just who was responsible for their laws. It is a fundamental principle of a democracy that we are sufficiently civilized and educated to govern ourselves. We should have servants who will carry out our will, and we should have a system by which we can tell whether our public servants serve us loyally or whether, instead, they serve special interests. The one-house legislature would clear the atmosphere and bring us nearer to the ideal of a democracy.

LEGISLATURES TOO LARGE

If every State is to be a business institution, if the evils of partisanship are to be eradicated from State governments, if the legislature is to be a real board of directors, if the people are to have an opportunity to know just what is being done by their public servants, then the legislature must not be so large in membership as to be unwieldy. Upon this question there will be a difference of opinion among honest men, but it is safe to say that the membership of a legislature should not be so large that it would be necessary at any time to confer upon a committee or a small number of members the right to guide or control its proceedings. If this principle is adhered to, it will be found that most of our legislatures are too large.

The important thing is that the members of the legislature should be responsible for their acts. There should be no way to shift their responsibility. There should be no way to cover up their tracks. If the membership is comparatively small, it will be easier for the people of the State to follow their work. Their positions will become more important, their individual power will be greater, and they will take a greater pride in seeing that their duties are well done and that their record is above reproach.

Burma: One of the Keys to Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the news from India and Burma is disturbing. The Japanese drive into India is more dangerous than reports from that area would seem to indicate. It marks the first invasion of India proper since the middle of the eighteenth century and its psychological effect, in the Far East, is of tremendous value. After 2 years of great effort in solidifying our defenses and in sending men and material to that area, we find that the forces of Nippon are not only invading India from Burma but making steady headway as well. What will be the effect of this on our gallant ally, China, and the restless populations of India and other countries in that part of the world?

We can be sure that Tojo will play down his defeats in the Pacific and publicize to the utmost this indication of Japanese strength and Allied weakness. He will give added strength to the puppet Indian Government which has recognized and, in that way, further the spirit of unrest which exists in India today.

There has been too much delay and too many excuses in the Burma campaign since Pearl Harbor. On the basis of results to date it appears that our allies expect American forces to carry the brunt of the attack in Burma, and possibly the defense of India as well. The only effective assistance that we have received has been from China and today, Chinese and Americans working and fighting together are pushing the building of the Ledo Road, landing air-borne troops behind Japanese lines in Burma, and clearing the skies over China. Under Chennault in China and Stilwell, Boatright, and Merrill in Burma we have been doing magnificently a difficult job in one of the toughest land areas on the face of the globe.

We must have the full assistance of all our allies to win this war. The United States has not the resources or the manpower to carry on operations all over the earth and we might just as well face that fact now. To avoid this fact is to lay the groundwork for obstacles which we will have to confront sooner or later. Pious wishing and empty phrases, charters, and declarations will do us no good, but solid thinking and realistic planning will.

The Indian policy has been a disappointment from the start and the relegating of old and defeated generals like Wavell and Auchinleck to command there has failed. Even Mountbatten, after a glorious publicity start, has not shown the promise expected. Allied military policy will have to be overhauled if we are to overcome mistakes and if we are to achieve success in the shortest possible time.

The Japanese invasion of India is not only a blow to us; it is also a blow to China, which has been fighting so magnificently for 7 years. The Chinese have done more than anyone ever expected of them, and with pitifully small resources. We cannot afford to continue to let China down and to relegate the Far East to a secondary status, because to do so will only lengthen the war and raise the cost of victory.

In the Far East we have many thousands of American prisoners to free. They are holding on grimly waiting for our arrival, and we must not, under any circumstances and no matter what cost, let them down. We have a brutal and a vicious enemy to defeat, and a terrible war to win. Time is not on our side in the Far East but, instead, helps the enemy. Let us, therefore, have a realistic policy about our war in the Pacific and the Far East and know that to win it will take everything we have.

The first step in such a policy is to drive the Japanese out of India and Burma, reopen the transport arteries to China, send in the needed supplies to China, and from there, using it as a base, bring about the final defeat of our enemy, Japan.

Why Organized Labor Opposes the National Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Matthew Woll, president, Labor League for Human Rights, reprinted from the New York Times:

The readers of our metropolitan press are accustomed to look to it for a consistent and able defense of the constitutional freedom of the press. They must be all the more perplexed, therefore, by the readiness of the New York Times and other papers of national circulation to endorse the proposed violation of another constitutional freedom—that of the person. Your editorials on the question of a National Service Act omit consideration of every vital question it raises; but no omission is so remarkable as that of even a passing reference to the fact that such an act would be in direct violation of the thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, which prohibits involuntary servitude.

Instead, your editorial welcoming the proposal fallaciously assumed an exact analogy between conscription of the individual for military service in defense of his country and his conscription for employment in privately owned and controlled industry. The duty of the citizen to fight for his country is discharged under the direct command of its military organization, with the President as Commander in Chief. For labor conscription to be analogous, the Federal Government would have to nationalize war industry, in order that the conscripted worker might produce under the direct command of his Government, with no profits from his labor accruing to private individuals.

VIEWED AS COERCIVE MEASURE

If the proposed National Service Act means anything at all it means coercion. It means that the Government shall be empowered to decide where and how every American required to register for service shall be employed and that the individual shall be forced to accept the work assigned at the wages fixed without regard to his personal interest or preference or his previous capacity to learn. And since there was not included confiscation of war industry among the conditions precedent to a National Service Act it means also that the conscripts would be forced by Government to work for private profit.

But forced labor for private profit is involuntary servitude, and has been repeatedly recognized as such by the United States Government. For example, when this country took over the Territory of Hawaii it was found that many laborers there were held to service by contracts. Therefore a clause was inserted in the Territorial Act declaring "null and void and terminated" all personal-service or labor contracts containing a time element. Another clause provided that there should be no remedy for breach of contract for personal services or labor other than a civil suit for damages.

Again in 1912 the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Bailey against Alabama rendered a decision clearly indicating that no man could be held to labor against his will even by indirect action on the part of the State. In 1929, in declaring its adherence to the International Slavery Treaty, the United States Government made the reservation that because of its Constitution it did not agree to a clause permitting forced labor, even though limited to public purposes.

CONSTITUTION HELD VIOLATED

Thus has the Government of the United States in the past upheld the constitutional provision prohibiting involuntary servitude. Now we see the Government coming before the Congress to demand a law in direct violation of that provision. One would expect such a demand to be supported by arguments of the most urgent and persuasive kind—of danger to the state, of peril to our armies and the whole war effort due to a total breakdown of the productive process.

Is it not reasonable to assume that if there had been more urgent and convincing arguments for a National Service Act they would have been adduced? After all, it was demanded that the American people be deprived of their constitutional freedom of the person in the field of labor. Not opinion, but proof was required that the surrender of their freedom was necessary to a speedy victory; especially since the available facts about American opposition for war all point in the opposite direction.

The fact is—and it is no secret to anybody—that free American labor has already so far outstripped the slave labor of the Axis that some nine billion dollars of war contracts have already been canceled and unemployment has succeeded labor shortage in certain areas. The fact is that the War Manpower Commission has already reported that the worst of the manpower shortage is over. The fact is that such high Government officials as Under Secretary of War Patterson and Donald Nelson of the War Production Board have borne testimony to the tremendous productive power of free American labor. The fact is that when our ally Stalin raised his glass at Teheran and toasted the American machines without which the United Nations could not have won the war he was toasting the achievement of free American labor.

The fact is, too, that Secretary of Labor Perkins has stated that wartime employment had reached its peak and that the coming months might bring a progressive decline in the total number of workers engaged in manufacturing.

With all the facts clearly proving that free American labor has outproduced the slave labor of the Axis countries it is astonishing and alarming to be confronted with this proposal to reward the American people who have wrought this miracle by depriving them of their constitutional freedom of the person on the ground that enslavement will make them more productive.

We have a fair sample of the way in which such a law would be administered in the doubtfully legal "job freeze" order of the Manpower Commission, which gives employers in essential industries the right to penalize quitting workers by refusing to grant them certificates of availability, without which they are debarred for 60 days from taking other employment.

That order has encouraged the hoarding of labor by firms with cost-plus contracts. It has deprived many workers of 2 months' wages, and the war effort of their services. Although the worker denied a certificate is supposedly protected by his right to appeal to the War Manpower Commission, the protection is theoretical, for it is the worker, not the employer, who forfeits his living while the Commission is making up its mind.

EXPERIENCE IN ENGLAND

But, it is argued, a National Service Act will prevent strikes. The argument is specious. The labor conscription which the British people accepted 3 days after the fall of France, and under threat of imminent invasion, has not ended strikes. On the contrary, England had more strikes in 1943 in proportion to its working population than the United States.

It is unjust and misleading to try to make organized labor the scapegoat for the confusion and unrest which have been created among our working population by the Government's failures in the fields of price, wage, and manpower control; its vacillation and confusion which have permitted living costs to soar; its improvisation, self-contradiction, and maladministration in dealing with labor. The leaders of the A. F. L. and the C. I. O. have adhered to their no-strike pledge. They have neither ordered nor condoned a single strike. At the same time, they have justifiably criticized the miserable failure to hold down prices while insisting that wages, instead of being tied to the price index, be governed by the arbitrary Little Steel formula.

The failure justly and competently to use more power than the American people have ever entrusted to their Federal Government has unquestionably impaired the national morale. In spite of our military successes, in spite of our industrial miracle, there are confusion, bewilderment, and discouragement in the United States today. It will not be removed but deepened by condemning the American people to involuntary servitude. Not slavery but a clear proof of governmental good faith is needed to restore American spirits.

The assumption characteristic of those who fail in the exercise of power, that the remedy for their failure is more power can lead the American people into the totalitarian slavery against which they are embattled on all the fronts of this global war.

But what about the principle of universal responsibility for winning the war? The answer is that a free people does not have to be forced to discharge that responsibility by totalitarian methods—and 60,000,000 working Americans have proved it. They have bought War bonds, they have accepted a heavy burden of taxation, they have manned the production lines under conditions which often mean severe hardship. And they have done all this voluntarily.

VIOLATIONS OF FREEDOM

The Times speaks of the obligation "to do war work at home, in comfort and security." The picture looks quite different to the worker in an overcrowded defense center, living in a trailer or a miserable shack, or traveling 30 to 50 miles to and from work, because of the housing shortage; suffering from the breakdown of sanitation and an almost complete lack of medica. and hospital facilities. Note the Labor Department's recent anouncement that more than 2,400,000 persons were disabled by work injuries in 1943—the highest figure for any year in the past decade. Our total casualties on the battle fronts have not yet reached anything like that figure.

The Times has seen fit to criticize the leaders of organized labor for their opposition to involuntary servitude.

The leaders of American labor are proud to defend the constitutional guarantee of freedom from involuntary servitude, knowing that in so doing they are defending not only that guarantee but all others, including freedom of the press, of which the New York Times is rightfully jealous. Freedom of the press and freedom of the person are guaranteed by the same Constitution; and the person who condones violation of the one must be ready to bow before violation of the other. It is the nature of power to grow by what it feeds on; an axiom amply proved by recent history. Mussolini and Hitler began their totalitarian regimes by destroying the free labor movements of Italy and Germany and abolishing all guarantees of freedom of the person. And neither freedom of the press nor any other freedom survived.

Appeasement and Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of March 23, 1944:

APPEASEMENT AND PALESTINE

Palestine is to be closed to all Jewish immigration April 1, 1944, ending hope for many of the persecuted people still left in bleeding Europe. Thus the last major act of that British appeasement which took place under threat of the Axis, the White Paper of 1939, will become completely effective.

The United States has never given approval to the closing of Palestine. Without approval, such closing violates a treaty (1924) between the British and American Governments. The White Paper does not merely interpret the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which called for the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish homeland. The White Paper wrecks that declaration, which, incidentally, was unanimously endorsed by Congress in 1922.

That, in brief, is the background of the White Paper; also, it is the reason why there are resolutions before Congress (sponsored jointly by men of such divergent political views as Wagner and Taft) asking that the British Government rescind the White Paper and remove the restrictions on Jewish immigration into the promised homeland.

Arabs and Jews were both beneficiaries of British promises in World War No. 1 after they helped Britain defeat Turkey, an ally of Germany. Largely by British arms, a million square miles were wrested from the Turks, six Arab kingdoms were set up. So the Arabs were pretty well rewarded. What the Jews got was only limited rights in tiny Palestine, containing 10,000 square miles.

Even this annoys the Arabs. They don't want their fellow Semites, the Jewish people, to have even equal rights or equal population in Palestine, although Arabs themselves are welcome, not only in the million square miles taken from the Turks, but in a total Middle East and north African area of more than 7,000,000 square miles.

The White Paper appeased the Axis-inspired Arabs by limiting Jewish immigration into Palestine to 75,000 (29,000 adults) from 1939 to 1944, when it is to cease unless the Arabs consent (which they won't) to further immigration. Jewish land purchase is limited to 2.6 percent of Palestine's area; that means 260 square miles or a little more than Milwaukee County.

The Arabs have made no appreciable contribution to the global war effort—except to the Axis. An Arab legion now fights with the Wehrmacht, the Mufti of Jerusalem is in Nazi territory helping Hitler, several Arab states have been held in line only by Allied arms. Yet the Arabs are rewarded. The Jewish people all over the world assist the Allied cause; 30,000 Palestine Jews (equivalent, proportionately, to 8,000,000 persons in the United States) have enlisted in Allied armies and are fighting on many fronts. Yet the Jews are penalized.

The Arab press threatens us, hints that our desire for Arabian oil will make us forget Jewish claims in Palestine. When President Roosevelt stated, recently, that the United States has never approved the British White Paper, the Arab Union of Cairo sent him a message saying, "Such repeated statements might give rise to tragedy which would by no means be advantageous to the Allied nations."

British censorship delayed publication of Mr. Roosevelt's statement in Palestine, and even Churchill's speech praising Palestine Jewry's war effort. That is how far Arab intimidation of Britain still goes. Military men, with a job to do, including General Marshall, do not want the White Paper torn up now. That is understandable. They fear sufficient Arab reaction to increase the war task.

Meanwhile hundreds of thousands of Jewish people face death, though many might be saved if Palestine—their promised homeland—were open to them.

We do not say when, but certainly as soon as is militarily possible, Palestine should be opened to them. They ask no help to defend themselves. If Arab threats should ever become action, Palestine is willing to defend itself. The Jews who would immigrate to Palestine ask nothing but the chance to live—and, if necessary, to fight to live.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD an editorial by Mr. Manchester Boddy, editor and publisher of the Los Angeles Daily News. I trust that this editorial will be read throughout the country because I consider the subject matter to be of vital importance. I have heard Mr. Boddy lecture at length on this subject and I can assure you it is not a passing fancy with him, as he has given considerable thought to this subject.

Before reading this editorial, we must bear in mind the fact that the war has definitely upset the economy of this Nation. In my opinion, it is idle folly to think we can revert back entirely to pre-war conditions. To meet this inevitable post-war crisis, we must begin thinking now of overcoming some of the obstacles which faced us after the last war and during the depression. This subject matter is handled very well in this editorial.

VIEWS OF NEWS

Yesterday we reported how fact, the dictator, had compelled the biggest landlord in the country—Uncle Sam—to collect rents from his tenants on a percentage basis; that is, to require a tenant to pay out for rent a percentage of his income rather than a fixed amount.

Fast, the dictator, is at work on other fronts, too. A news bulletin from Chicago advises us that the city of Flint, Mich., is adopting a new "uniform pay plan," based on the city's ability to pay.

This is not an emergency wartime measure. "Depending upon finances and conditions," says the report, "the rate of pay may be raised or lowered uniformly."

All corporations should pay dividends and retire capital investments on a percentage basis. Many do now. Common, and frequently preferred, stock pays out a percentage of earnings—not a fixed number of dollars. Only the "gilt edge" securities require payment of a fixed number of dollars over a future period of years regardless of war, depression, or any other circumstances.

Such debts have done more to force business, industrial, and utility concerns into bankruptcy than all other economic factors combined.

Life-insurance concerns should provide for benefits to policyholders exclusively on a percentage basis. Under such a system they would invest their funds in common or "percentage" securities instead of "gilt edge" paper that "guarantees" a fixed number of dollars through future years that may or may not permit such payments to be made.

All wages and salaries should come from a percentage of gross income.

All mortgages should be paid from a percentage of the mortgagee's income.

When all debt is thus but on a flexible basis there can be no such thing as ruinous depression or Nation-wide bankruptcy. There will be ups and downs. Our economic system must be like that because it is subject to the law of supply and demand, and by its very nature is always dynamic.

The very essence of capitalism is the employment of capital. But capital alone cannot run the whole show. It needs labor—skilled and unskilled. Suppose labor were to demand a fixed return—in terms of a specific number of dollars paid on specific dates over a period of 10, 15, and 20 years—regardless of anything and everything that might occur in the dynamic world of the future. And suppose in writing its contract, labor were to insist that in the event of failure to pay the property itself would be seized.

Well, that is precisely the deal that capital gets when it makes a "gilt edge, fixed payment over a period of years" contract.

When a man hires his money out on such terms he is betting that nothing will happen during the future term of years to upset his plans. That makes him fight change; it makes him a conservative—and unwittingly an enemy of progress.

Strangely enough, the very people whose money is invested in long-term, gilt-edge, fixed-payment securities are the very ones who are now pretending to fight regimentation. As a matter of fact, the very system they live by demands regimentation—freezing of the status quo—as the only means whereby their future returns can be protected against change.

The fixed-debt system has created one kind of regimentation which begets another kind that seeks to guarantee such things as social security.

The country can have complete regimentation or none at all. It cannot exist half regimented and half insecure.

Complete regimentation means a socialistic state. It means totalitarianism, collectivism, and dictatorship; it means a form of government unlike anything traditionally American; it means a governmental system precisely like the kind we are fighting in Europe and Asia.

To prevent all of this we must eliminate the regimentation that now exists. That means liquidation of the system that makes debt—or invested capital—a sacred cow whose entire future is guaranteed 5, 10, 15, and 20 years in advance.

To preserve the capitalistic system and avoid state socialism we must have a completely flexible capital and wage policy. We must allow the country to ride the waves of our dynamic economic sea.

MANCHESTER BODDY.

Prices of Gold and Silver in Foreign Markets Induce Confidence in United States Advance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Nevada State Journal, Reno, Nev., of March 23, 1944:

PRICES OF GOLD AND SILVER IN FOREIGN MARKETS INDUCE CONFIDENCE IN U. S. ADVANCE

California gold-mining interests, according to the Wall Street Journal, have been keeping close watch on gold quotations in the few remaining markets where price limitations do not exist. Chief attention has been directed toward Cairo and Bombay.

In recent transactions in Egypt, handled through the Bank of Cairo, purchases and sales of bullion bars have taken place at levels as high as $73 to $79 an ounce in U. S. equivalents, as compared with the fixed price of $35 in the United States.

The Cairo market, contrary to the belief held by many speculators, is neither a black market nor a truly "free" market.

Dealings are perfectly legal and are a necessary part of commerce in that paper money frequently will not be accepted for goods transferred in the eastern Mediterranean, and consequently debtors must pay a premium for gold with which to settle their obligations.

On the other hand, bullion may not be exported without a permit, so that prices paid in Cairo do not necessarily reflect world opinion.

Another indication of the relative permanence of higher gold prices outside the United States is the 1942 annual report of the largest gold producer in India, with an average output of 100,000 ounces a year.

The average price received for that year was equal to $44.54 U. S. on the basis of the then prevailing cross-rates for exchange. In September of 1943, gold sold at $58.50 per ounce in the Indian markets, and since then has advanced to as high as $70.

Incidentally, recent silver quotations in Bombay were on the basis of 95 cents an ounce as compared with 71.11 cents paid by the United States Government to domestic producers for newly mined silver and the 35 cents paid for foreign silver.

California, normally, is the largest gold producer in the United States and in addition is one of the chief technical and management centers for the world's gold-mining industry.

In 1941, the last year for which approximate world figures are available, the total world gold production was about $1,287,700,000, of which the United States produced $208,433,000.

British Empire production in that year amounted to $812,000,000, of which British Africa contributed $564,000,000; Canada, $187,000,000; Australia, $51,000,000; and India, $10,000,000.

Light on O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the March 17, 1944, issue of the Boston Daily Globe:

LIGHT ON O. P. A.

Providing light ranks high in the services possible for a man to render. That is exactly what Mr. Chester Bowles, head of the Office of Price Administration, did at the Capitol before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, explaining the importance of extending the price-control law which will expire June 30 unless renewed.

That there is such a wartime measure is known to one and all. Yet there is much confusion concerning it. People buy a good deal of food and some other articles, with ration books in hand and an eye on price ceilings conspicuously posted. From time to time there are shifts in point values and other changes in the regulations. Rumors, explanations, speculations, and scraps of information and of misinformation have abounded. Charges of black-market operations have been frequent.

The natural disinclination of Americans for regulations affecting their daily doings has been stirred repeatedly by criticism and complaint. At times it has seemed that the favorite national indoor sport would be "crabbing."

To this murky atmosphere Mr. Bowles has brought light. His business experience in making complicated matters clear with facts and figures made him adequate to the occasion. On a 7-foot easel set up at the head of the committee table he exhibited specially prepared show cards big enough for everyone to see.

Comparison with World War No. 1 revealed how prices had risen in that period, bread from 6 to 12 cents, butter from 34 to 78 cents, sugar from 5 cents to 26. The upward spiral made a $2,000 income worth only $960.

During the 53 months of this war, prices have increased 25.9 percent, but much of that change came before price control was set up. With no such thing in 1917–18 the rise in prices was 65.9 percent.

While we have been at war this time, production has increased amazingly. On the farms it is up 21 percent, instead of 5. In the factories it is 131 percent, instead of 25. Yet industrial prices, which went up 78 percent in the other war, have been held to a 25-percent advance.

The demonstration was impressive and had a profound effect on a company of seasoned Senators who are never easy to move. They went out to lunch but returned afterward to ask more information. Mr. Bowles continued to give it for an additional 3 hours.

During the proceedings he freely admitted there had been many faults in O. P. A. administration. He also outlined plans for more effective management, with changes announced well ahead of time and more power in the enforcement division.

Many of this select audience came out with warm praise of the skill of the man who was presenting the work of his agency to them. He was asked to take his charts into the Senate for the impending debate and also to provide graphic information concerning the purpose and operation of subsidies when that question is put forward, as will come to pass when an attempt is made to get rid of them.

During this trying period, when participation in total war has brought new and strange restrictions into American life, there has been an enormous amount of fog in many minds. People felt they should cooperate with the official demands, but they heard many whispers suggesting that some were not necessary. There were also, it must be admitted, those who made charges and circulated rumors based only on political dislikes.

Much of the difficulty might have been avoided had there been among the administrators the skill which Mr. Bowles has shown in turning on the light. Legislators would not then have fallen out so easily with those in important new positions created by and for the emergency.

Mr. Bowles has given convincing evidence of the necessity for price control. It may be that this measure was safe before because of the support of the principle announced by Republican House Leader JOSEPH MARTIN, who has called on his party to hold the line.

But more than that is needed. If Mr. Bowles has marked the way to intelligent cooperation of Congress and the various agencies, he has set up a beacon that will do much good.

Who Is Seeking To Fool the Soldier?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial from the Idaho Statesman of March 23, 1944, containing some pertinent comments and conclusions on the soldier-vote controversy:

FOUR ACES

In his question to the Governors of the 48 States, it is our opinion that the President was putting them on the spot and making another of his astute political moves. You don't have to take our word for it; we'll present some facts and statesman readers can draw their own conclusions.

First we'll quote from that great Democratic organ, the New York Times (March 12): "Behind the trouble in arriving at a simple voting system for servicemen most observers saw a struggle for partisan advantage. President Roosevelt and other administration leaders, confident that the soldiers would vote for their Commander in Chief, have fought for the widest possible soldier participation in the election."

In short, it is politics, and every candid person admits it. The President wants those millions of votes, many of them from men so young they have never known any President but Roosevelt. Roosevelt wants to win a fourth term, the Republicans want to defeat him. All right, that's politics, that's fair enough. But if Roosevelt had got the kind of Federal ballot he wanted, he would have held four aces, and his opponents at best would have had a couple of deuces. Here's a part of the evidence that proves it.

THE FIRST ACE

Of all potential candidates, the one who probably would stack up best against the President in his bid for soldier votes is General MacArthur. Recently the Army War College Library recommended that the soldiers read an article about MacArthur that appeared in the American Mercury. Declaring that the article was "a comprehensive and objective appraisal of the general as Presidential timber," it offered to our millions of fighting men a picture of MacArthur which, to say the least, was a vile attack on his character.

The article says, for instance, that "the worst elements on the political right, including its most blatant lunatic fringe, are whooping it up for MacArthur." What more than that would the soldiers have to read to decide that between Roosevelt and MacArthur they would take the former? Would they vote for a man who was objectively presented as the candidate of the reactionaries and lunatics? Well, hardly. The Army War College Library, then, is the President's first ace because the opposition has no way to recommend reading to soldiers.

THE SECOND ACE

Various books are being distributed among the soldiers at the expense of the taxpayer. One of them is a book by Louis Adamic who is generally regarded as a Communist. Another is a Pocket History of the United States written by two left-wingers. At least 50,000 copies of this book have been distributed among our soldiers; so let's see what it says.

We quote: "In 1930 the Democrats swept the congressional elections, and in 1932 they prepared to take over the Presidency. The Republican Old Guard, which had learned nothing from the depression, defiantly renominated President Hoover, who appealed once again to 'rugged individualism' for a solution to the national crisis. The Democrats presented the brilliant and magnetic Franklin D. Roosevelt who as Governor of the Empire State had revealed himself as a resourceful, courageous, and humane leader. One of the most heartening things about American democracy is that it has always managed to find great leaders in time of crisis."

We are still quoting from this book, at least 50,000 copies of which are now in our soldiers' hands, paid for by public taxes: "It can be asserted that few of those who so hopefully voted for him realized that in Roosevelt they had a leader who as spokesman for democracy and nationalism was the peer of Lincoln, as a leader toward a better world order the peer of Wilson." Well, if he's a greater President than Lincoln and Wilson, the soldiers would naturally vote for him, wouldn't they?

Now let's digress for a moment. Language is a powerful thing. You will observe the choice of words in the foregoing, as well as in what is to come. It reminds us of a Wisconsin election a few years ago. It was decided to smear and discredit a candidate, and so a reporter went to him and asked, "Is it true that you were drunk and discovered in a certain location with another man's wife the other night?" The man said absolutely no, it was not true. So the next day the propaganda came out in this headline: "Mr. Blank denies that he was drunk and caught with another man's wife." That licked Mr. Blank.

THE THIRD ACE

To millions of our servicemen no news from this country is sent except through O. W. I. Proof of that is a matter of record in the hearings of Sherwood before a Senate committee. Keeping that in mind, let's take a look at some of the "news" O. W. I. has been sending our men. In regard to the veto of the subsidy bill, we quote:

"Congress upheld the veto on the food subsidy bill—or, on second thought, it agreed with the President." It did nothing of the kind. It simply couldn't muster a two-thirds vote to override. Again we quote the "news" as sent to our men by O. W. I.: "Laws are made in the United States by joint action of the Executive—the President—and the legislative—the Congress." The President has nothing to do with making the laws—but our soldiers are being told that he has. O. W. I. presented the whole Barkley incident as nothing more than a slight misunderstanding between Barkley and the President that was quickly settled.

THE FOURTH ACE

With his eye on the soldier vote, Roosevelt put Congress on the spot. With his eye on the same vote, he is now putting the Governors on the spot. All that the soldiers abroad hear of the matter will be what O. W. I. sends them—and you can be sure that its wording will make it crystal clear to our servicemen that Congress and the Governors were against them and the President for them. The opposition party has no way of sending any material to our men abroad or of presenting their side of it at all.

So in this fight for millions of votes, who holds the aces? We have presented the facts and you are the judge.

Brand Names and Trade-Marks, Their Value in Our Economy, and Reasons Why They Must Be Preserved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over the Columbia network, from Washington, D. C., on March 25, 1944:

I want to talk with you briefly about an ominous threat to the quality of everything you eat, everything you wear, everything that goes into your home. This threat is an insidious campaign to destroy our time-honored system of brand names and trade-marks under which manufacturers produce with pride, stores sell with satisfaction, and purchasers buy with confidence. Broadly speaking, it is a threat also to our democratic way of life.

This danger of which I speak is the product of a certain cynical belief that the social and economic system under which we Americans live and under which this Nation has grown great has been worn out and must be supplanted by something else; and so there has been set in motion an attempt to chop that system away and, under the guise of reform, replace it piece by piece.

Now, at the outset let me urge that if our social and economic system be wrong, we proceed first with our No. 1 national job, which is the winning of the war. Then, with the war won, if our system does need doctoring, we can amend our National Constitution.

That, I submit, is the American way.

We can't do two major jobs at once. We can't win the bitterest and bloodiest conflict in our history and at the same time overhaul our home-front way of life.

To the war's successful prosecution, we Americans have dedicated all that we have and all that we are. In the fighting-front achievements of our Nation's naval and military leaders, we find reason for pride. Under the strictures of the emergency we stand ready to sacrifice many of the things with which in peacetime our lives have been enriched.

But meanwhile, we are less than true Americans if we stand silently by while forces inimical to individual freedom and opportunity—however sincere those forces may seem to be—unnecessarily encroach upon our liberties. We must resist the creeping advance of influences that would wrest from us our freedom of choice in the market place, impose upon us dictatorial standards for what we shall buy and eat and wear, and destroy the means by which we have become accustomed, traditionally, so to guide our market-place buying that for every dollar we spend, we get a full dollar's worth of value.

Let's examine these forces more closely. It isn't necessary, nor have I the time to review for you all the words and all the works of those who in recent years, from behind the scenes in Washington, have undertaken to master-mind governmental policy. For our present purposes, I shall remind you that one of these heavy thinkers, a highly placed spokesman for these forces, bewailed, in print, the fact that we Americans stubbornly adhere to what he called the theory of the value of competitive enterprise. He seriously proposed that the Government of the United States engage upon a comprehensive program of testing products that are to be used by the public and educating the public—and that means you and me—in how those products are to be used.

I should like to remind you, also, that repeatedly these destructive forces within our gates—these forces that threaten your freedom of choice in your daily buying—have attacked what they call the profit motive. In passing, I ask you to observe that they call it, not an incentive, which is a respectable word, but a motive, which connotes something bad.

Over recent years I have seen them strike at our American economy in the same two spots—the trade-mark and the advertising of that trade-mark. And why always at those same two spots? Because the mentalities behind these forces have realized that if they could obliterate the trade-mark and strangle advertising, they could close the door to the opportunity for profit by crippling the whole economic system.

The workings of these forces disclose themselves in many places. As a member of a special congressional committee, I have observed their effects in the actions of a key Federal agency—the Office of Price Administration. In that one strategic sector of the wartime governmental front, I have seen revealed results deeply dismaying.

Now, of course, it is self-evident that no intelligent businessman, no sensible consumer, will so conduct himself as to bring about inflation. But, with my colleagues on that special committee, I have heard businessmen—producers of goods sadly needed on the fighting fronts and on the home front—testify about their bewilderment under the impact of Federal regulations and directives and edicts, and tell of their frustration as, doing their best to continue their production, they have labored, also, to obey their Government's capricious commands.

And here enters your interest as consumers. I have heard businessmen testify that if they are to comply with the regulations and grade downward the quality of their goods to the levels of arbitrary, Federal gradings, then common honesty and a decent regard for their responsibilities to the public will demand of them that they throw their trade-marks out the window.

Now, involved here, of course, is an issue of simple justice. In the establishing of their trade-marks, in the advertising of those trade-marks—advertising designed to identify their goods in your minds—American businessmen have invested many millions of dollars. Quite properly, and acting upon the age-old principle that "a good name is better than riches," our American courts have ruled that trade-marks are property, respectable property in the possession of which the owners of the marks are entitled to the law's protection.

Morally, even legally, the destruction of a trade-mark's value by Government action is wrong. And no amount of pseudo logic can make it right.

But involved, also, is an issue far broader—an issue of public service and of public well-being. And I mean your well-being and mine.

Over the generations, we Americans have become accustomed to look upon trade-marks and brand names as our direction signs to wise buying. We have come to recognize each of these marks and names as a pledge, behind which stands the integrity of one of our countrymen—a countryman who, of his own accord, has set his standards high and, also of his own accord, upholds them.

As a consequence, applied to the things we buy, trade-marks and brand names recur to us as readily, almost, as do the well-remembered names of tried and trusted friends. Think of hats: and straightaway there come to mind two or three brand names that we recall with respect—and thus with underwear and shoes and hosiery and shirts.

Such as these, then, are the pledges, the signposts, that always have guided us in the spending of most of our money. And now it is proposed by these mentalities that we tear down the signposts and tear up the pledges.

I ask you to consider the prospect. I ask you to visualize with me what would happen if manufacturers, in all lines or in any great number of lines, should abandon the reputations and the brand names that over the years they have been establishing. Assume that as substitutes for their well-known, high-quality goods, they brought out unknown, unidentified, except by alphabetical labels, governmentally imposed.

What then?

I'm sure you know the answer. Across this country, in thousands of retail stores, hundreds of thousands of items of merchandise that now stand honestly upon the retailers' shelves would become faceless nonentities.

Now, I may be old-fashioned. But I believe I speak for millions of other American consumers when I say that under rationing, I am willing, of course, to be told how much I may buy of this world's goods. But I object—and most strenuously—to being told what and of what so-called grade.

In recent years we have heard a great deal about what is called "grade labeling." By those who would obliterate the privately owned brand name it has been proposed that there be substituted a system of grading, governmentally imposed, by which all products within their respective groups would be produced to, say, three levels of quality and then labeled, respectively, A, B, and C.

All of which sounds absurdly simple. In certain areas of the United States the women know about grade A eggs. They know that grade A eggs are dependable. And so women wonder—or some of them do—why this same simple scheme of grading and labeling cannot be applied to many kinds of merchandise.

The answer lies in a fundamental difference between a hen and a manufacturer. For a hen, as someone before me has observed, an egg is a whole day's work. Furthermore, as far as the hen is concerned, an egg is a day's work that, when finished, is forever and irretrievably done. Let's say that, with all her heart, she hopes that what she produces will turn out to be grade A. But if fate and the uncertainty of mankind's system of distribution cause that egg to be a little late in reaching your table, then there's nothing either now or through all eternity that the hen can do about it. That egg is laid.

Now, consider the manufacturer. His product, unlike the egg, is a blending of materials and processes and skills that he, exercising a range of choice in the matter, can prescribe.

And throughout years of economic history, experience has demonstrated that, given the leeway so to do, producers have preferred to set their own standards and to set them higher than any law might demand and to constantly improve them.

Furthermore it has been found repeatedly that grade labels, however carefully devised, often fail to mean what to consumers they seem to mean. I have seen the results of a survey conducted to test public sentiment. Consumers were asked whether they thought it would be a good idea for the Government to grade all canned foods. Of those who answered "Yes," only one-fourth indicated any realization at all of the highly important fact that grading is not an index to vitamin content and general nourishment.

Let the Government establish standards for foods and for other kinds of goods that we consumers use, and you and I know what will happen. Those standards will remain frozen. Improvement is stymied.

And here's the other side of the picture. Under our freely competitive system mass-production methods—which serve a mass acceptance that has been created mainly by advertising—have cut production costs; and at the same time standards of quality and performance have risen higher and higher.

About the continuance of the competitive process under which this wholesome development has been permitted to unfold, I have found reason, fairly recently, for renewed hope. There are signs, encouraging signs, that the people of this country are learning to reassert their sovereignty.

I have said if our system be wrong and we desire to change it, then as our primary post-war job let us call a constitutional convention and adapt our Constitution to our national wishes. But I urge that before we scrap it we examine our system closely. Lest we forget, it is a system that has bestowed upon this country's people the world's highest standard of living. It is a system that over the years, so fostered and developed our national industrial plant that when war came to our shores our Government, in search of the implements with which war was to be waged, was able to turn to that plant and find in it a veritable arsenal of democracy.

As I look back over the way we have come, as I think of the social and material progress we have achieved, I cannot believe that Americans knowingly will forget all that they have gained and turn aside to follow any economic will-o'-the-wisp.

Our people have pledged themselves to win this war. Let us pledge ourselves, also, to this: That while our soldiers fight on foreign soil, here at home the American concept of democracy—including economic democracy—shall not perish from the earth.

As Americans we can do no less. And less than that, the American people, whose voice is being heard at last in high places—less than that the American people will not do.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article, which appeared in the Democrat-of-the-Month column of the March 1944 Jeffersonian, published in Boston, Mass.:

DEMOCRAT OF THE MONTH

EUGENE T. KINNALY, SECRETARY TO MAJORITY LEADER CONGRESSMAN JOHN W. M'CORMACK

Washington's dean of secretaries, Gene Kinnaly, has seen them come and go in the Nation's Capitol for 27 years.

That was in 1917, the first year of the United State's participation in World War No. 1, and through the intervening years as secretary to Congressman James A. Gallivan and later to Congressman JOHN W. MCCORMACK, he has won an enviable reputation among members of the Washington secretariat. "A secretary's secretary" is the tag admiring co-workers place on him.

Newcomers, "greenhorns", to the busy capitol secretarial field have no fears after meeting the genial Gene. They lay their problems upon the broad shoulders of this veteran and come away smiling. He has a tremendous capacity for work and can accomplish more in one day than the average man can in 1 week. He's at his never-ending task 7 days a week, and yet still finds time to train many boys and girls who come to him for counsel. Many of these youngsters benefited by his training have gone far on the road to success.

Gene has a genius for remembering faces and names; knows all the heads of Government departments by their first names and shows a keen interest in their transfers and promotions.

His busy schedule does not keep him from taking a very active part in church affairs. He is prominent in the Affairs of the Massachusetts Society.

Our Democrat of the Month is a native of South Boston, where his family still resides. In addition to his other accomplishments, Gene is a brilliant lawyer, member of the Massachusetts bar and is entitled to practice in all the Federal courts.

Denies G. O. P. Upswing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication from the New York Herald Tribune of March 26, 1944:

DENIES G. O. P. UPSWING—CONTRIBUTOR THINKS GAINS IN CONGRESS DUE TO TECHNICAL DISFRANCHISEMENT CAUSED BY WAR

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Now that the echoes of the Barkley rebellion have died away in the distance, it might be profitable to examine in some broader perspective than the kaleidoscopic present scme of the implications of the widely acclaimed rebellion of Congress against Executive tyranny. This perspective is findable in the pages of history, and the lessons which it enforces are not ones easily findable in the press, nor are they, it must be added, ones which the average American, always prone to applaud rebellion on impulse, is likely to be keenly aware of in a period of confusion like the present one.

The present Congress, it must be said, is a default Congress, which owes its Republican strength to the technical disfranchisement of millions of soldiers and migratory workers. This fact has been established statistically by the Gallup Institute, and I mention it only to deflate at once the much touted Republican upswing which, if probably operative, is weaker than we have been allowed to imagine. That the power so arrived at is being used and will be used to advance political fortunes is, of course, both obvious and natural and within proper limits a normal feature of our political system.

It has, however, its proper limits, and even within them it has its definite perils to national destiny. Twice in the course of our brief history great historic wars have been brought to successful conclusion only for the post-war handling of their issues to be botched tragically and with lasting harm to the Nation. Each of these botchings, be it noted, was the work of a "rebellious" Congress; each ditched an Executive program which history has ratified as wise and judicious; each time the ground was laid for rebellion a considerable length of time before the full outbreak occurred and gave us one of these periods of congressional government of which the unreflecting are so admiring.

That the Republican leaders in Congress were prepared for war to the knife on Lincoln's wise and moderate plan for reconstruction, even before the bullet of John Wilkes Booth made Andrew Johnson, not Lincoln, the target of their wrath, is, of course, known to all readers of history. It has even been bruited that some of these men connived at or were privy to the assassination, a notion which, however preposterous, does at least accord with the intensity of feeling which actuated the later impeachers of Johnson. Out of this quarrel, of course, sprang the tragedy of the Reconstruction Era with its army of Federal carpetbaggers, and its permanent legacy of sectional feeling.

We turn now to World War No. 1, when the first note of national disharmony made its appearance with the promulgation of the famous Senatorial round robin intimating that Wilson and America were distinct entities and that Presidential commitments commit no one.

It is results that count and we often find in history that curious legerdemain by which first the handle of the knife is replaced with a new handle, then the blade, and without realizing it we have a wholly new knife, utterly unlike the original one. This, it seems to me, is a fair account of how a Nation, which by and large approved our entering the League of Nations, was imperceptibly led down a path which ended with the scuttling of the Versailles Treaty and inaugurated the now noisome era of normalcy followed by the Hoover tariff, the scuttling of our Navy, and a number of other tragic blunders whose fruits we are now reaping in the costliest war of our history. It can be said, of course, that emotional reaction played its role here; that Wilson and Wilsonism suffered the historic fate of Aristides; that the pendulum always falls back, and a number of other things of like tenor.

History is an affair of long interests. Political elections are affairs of short interest. To the anti-new dealer it needs to be said that we owe the New Deal to the botching of the problems left by and created by the close of the First World War. Whether domestically or internationally, the administrations between Wilson and Roosevelt piled up a load of unsettled problems so massive, so basic, so widespread in implications that from them came first, the worst depression in history; second, the New Deal; third, the costliest war in our history. To suppose, therefore, that ousting the New Deal will settle anything is to be guilty of short-sightedness, both hind and fore.

We took the wrong road in the twenties and we took our first step down that road in the congressional election of 1918, which, like our last congressional election, was radically affected by the absence of millions of voters. When we took this road we were undoubtedly, as has been said, actuated by weariness; we wanted to try the other side of the pillow. We did. And as Wilson informed us we would when we did, we finally discovered our error, and under the sledge-hammer blow dealt Pearl Harbor, awakened to the realities of our position.

There is no law written anywhere which forbids us to repeat this error.

The Presidency is a monarchy, the most powerful perhaps in all history. Each of our great Presidents has incurred vituperation as a would-be dictator; each in his lifetime has been a target for unmeasured hatred and vilification. This is inherent in a democracy, pehaps, where envy is always more rife than in a more stratified social system. It has its perils, however, and they need to be seen and recognized.

It was not Wilson who lost in 1918 and 1920. We did. Those who unseated him are today forgotten. The war he predicted as the fruit of their victory rages on every ocean. We shall do well to remember this in the days ahead as groups and politicians contend for position.

The whole is greater than any of its parts. Upon the proper ordering of the world hangs our domestic as well as our international felicity. If we forget this we may turn down the road we took in 1918.

C. R. GARRETT.

The New Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL WILSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. Samuel B. Pettengill, from the Huntingburg (Ind.) Independent of March 24, 1944:

PETTENGILL, "THE GENTLEMAN FROM INDIANA" INSIDE YOUR CONGRESS

The new Bill of Rights

Mr. Roosevelt has just announced that every man has a right to a remunerative job, decent home, medical care, social security, education, etc. Does he mean that the doors of opportunity must be kept open to acquire these things, by giving value received?

If so, there is nothing new about it. America has been, and must be kept, the land of opportunity. Evidently he means something else. It can only be that every man has a right to all these blessings, whether he earns them or not.

If it is true that everyone has a right to a decent home, etc., whose duty is it to furnish it? There is no right without a duty.

Let us examine this new doctrine. A baby is born. He is helpless. Against his mother he has a right to his first food. God sees to that. Against his father he has a right to a home, medical care, education, and the things needful to make a boy into a man.

The boy grows up. Year by year his rights against his parents lessen, and his duties increase. He must help with the chores, run errands, begin to pull his own weight in the boat.

Eventually, he is 21. He is a voter. He reads Mr. Roosevelt's speech and announces to his family, "You must continue to supply me with a job, a home, medical care, security. F. D. R. says I am entitled to them."

His father answers, "Son, when I was 21, my father said to me, 'You are on your own from today on.' My grandfather said the same thing to him, and so on back to Adam. From now on, I have the right to save for the old age of your mother and myself. In an emergency, we will help you if we can. But this will be a matter of love, and not of right. You have no further 'rights' to assert against us."

Now if a grown son has no "right" against his own father to continued care, what right has he against other fathers? Or mothers? Or taxpayers? What Mr. Roosevelt is saying to this young man is simply this: "The world owes you a living."

This is false, no matter who says it. It is universal law that each individual must provide for himself. Witness the ant who "provides her meat in the summer," or the spider who "taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces," as the Good Book says.

There is of course a brotherhood among the human family to help those in undeserved distress. We are our brother's keeper. The strong have helped the weak and the well the sick, since society began.

But if Smith has a "right" to a home, job, etc., which he can assert against Jones, then why hasn't Jones the same right against Smith? If so, who is going to do the chores?

The Bible says, "In the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread"—not in the sweat of another man's brow.

Nothing is gained by removing the spur of incentive. "If any would not work, neither shall he eat." Relief wages in time of unemployment should never equal the normal wage. The inducement to get off relief for better pay must always be present. Otherwise, we encourage social parasites—"those who would vote us into earning their livings for them," as Booth Tarkington puts it.

All men have a duty to afford every man the opportunity to work and bring the bacon home to his wife and children. The right to work is the right to live. It is society's duty to secure that right to its weakest member against all monopoly, exploitation greed, fraud, or theft. When society does that it is up to the individual to do the rest.

The world's work must be done. No one has a "right" to have it done. But there is a duty to do it, or go without, and the duty rests on every man, according to his strength.

The Negro and the New Deal

In the special congressional election in New York City, the Negro vote in Harlem left the New Deal and voted Republican for the first time in 12 years. The same thing happened in a Negro ward in Philadelphia last November. Similar defection is to be noted elsewhere.

There are a number of reasons for this. One is that responsible Negro pastors and leaders see no hope for their race in nothing but relief. They witness its demoralizing influence on their own people, as illustrated by the following true conversation with a Negro maid in a Detroit hotel:

Question. How long have you been making beds?

Answer. I's only been makin' beds at the Statler six months now. I never worked before comin' here. Me and my husban' has always been on Mr. Roosevelt relief, an' Mr. Roosevelt wants us folks to work durin' the wah. Mr. Roosevelt he gonna put us all back on relief again and he don't want us folks to work no mo' after the wah.

Question. Doesn't your husband work?

Answer. No, Sah—we alls been married 9 years and we all been on Mr. Roosevelt's relief since we got married.

Question. Didn't either of you ever work at anything?

Answer. No, Sah; we folks don't have to work just so long as Mr. Roosevelt's livin' but he wants us to work durin' the wah—den he puts folks on relief for keeps. Dats all we have to do, jus' vote for Mr. Roosevelt and all those same kind of Democrats Mr. Roosevelt is.

Question. How do the Democrats know you vote for them?

Answer. O, dey knows. A white man he come 'round and show us how to vote every now and then. This white man he a Democrat too, but he works for Mr. Roosevelt—Mr. Roosevelt sho' one rich man—he likes us folks. He wouldn't ask us to work only for the wah. That's all we have to do, just vote for Mr. Roosevelt and those people who works for him.

Question. Don't you know it is the Government that pays the relief money and not Mr. Roosevelt?

Answer. No, Sah; youse is wrong—Mr. Roosevelt gives the Guv'ment the money for payin' to us folks—we all knows dat—youse never been on relief or you would know dat Mr. Roosevelt pays de relief money to us folks. I'll sure be glad when the wah is ovah—Mr. Roosevelt says soons the wah is ovah we all can quit workin'.

Question. How did you put in the time during the years you and your husband were on relief?

Answer. O, we jus' sit and muse an' loll around and I do a little cookin' and sweepin'.

Question. Did you get enough relief money to live on?

Answer. O' yes; Mr. Roosevelt he gives us mo' than enough—Mr. Roosevelt one rich man. We sho' likes that man, everybody had to work before Mr. Roosevelt come.

Question. Was there enough money to get a drink of gin now and then?

Answer. I'se a beer drinker—my husban' drinks beer and likker. Mr. Roosevelt brought likker back and he says it all right for us to have a dollah or two a week out of our relief money for likker and beer. When we votes for Mr. Roosevelt and his Democrats next he gonna pay us folks two times mo' relief money than we been gettin'. Mista, I can jus' hardly wait to vote fo' him because we all will have lots of money for nothin' jus' as long as Mr. Roosevelt's livin' and no work no mo', mmmm-mmmm!"

Issuance of Priorities to Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters and affidavits:

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1944.

Hon. NORRIS POULSON,
House of Representatives,

DEAR MR. POULSON: Upon reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 20, 1943, the letter written to you by Mr. Dan C. McKinney, secretary of the California Cattlemen's Association, we called your office and advised you that we were having this matter investigated. This was in connection with the charge by Mr. Loren Bamert, president of the California Cattlemen's Association, that in filing an application for a small gas engine with the farm machinery rationing committee in the San Joaquin County Agricultural Conservation office, he was required to signify his intentions to participate in the A. A. A. program as a condition for receiving a recommendation for the engine.

We asked Mr. Dave Davidson, chairman of our State committee in California, to make a thorough investigation of this situation. His report is rather lengthy, consequently, we will attempt to cover the situation in this letter. However, before going into details of this report we wish to state definitely that the policy and instructions issued from this office and A. A. A. State offices in the western region have never indicated in any way that participation in our program would have any bearing on any farmer's application for farm machinery. In fact, until this incident was called to our attention the thought had never entered our minds.

Mr. Davidson, as well as communications to the California Cattlemen's Association from various county agricultural conservation committees, points out that our farm plan was used as a means of recording information that is necessary to the rationing of any farm equipment; 1943 and 1944 acreages of various crops and livestock numbers are recorded on this farm plan as part of our arrangements to help all farmers work out their 1944 operations in a way that will be of the greatest assistance in our war food program. This plan is also used in assisting farmers to determine the best production practices in the 1944 agricultural conservation program for increasing production or conserving the soil on their farms. From the standpoint of efficiency you can see that it is desirable to use the record on this farm plan for as many purposes as possible. If this form were not used for recording information needed in farm machinery rationing, it would be necessary to develop and obtain Budget Bureau approval for an additional form, as well as increase our cost of operation in the county offices. Even though the farm plan has been used for many purposes, it must be emphasized that participation in our program has not been required in connection with the farm machinery rationing program. We wish to quote parts of a communication to Mr. Dave Davidson from Mr. George H. Clever, chairman of the San Joaquin County committee in regard to their use of this farm plan:

"The War Food Administration assigned the job of securing the 1944 farm plan WR–806 to the county U. S. D. A. war board. The local county U. S. D. A. war board assigned this job to the county agricultural conservation committee. It was agreed that the source of all farm data pertaining to acreage of land farmed and livestock numbers should be filed on the 1944 farm plan (WR–806) since this was the only form approved by the Budget Bureau on which to secure farm data. It has been the policy of the county committee to ask farmers to file the 1944 farm plan, WR–806, when the farmer calls at the county A. A. A. office regardless of the purpose of the farmer's trip to the office. The farm rationing committee was asked to ration farm equipment on the standards of need for the equipment in relation to size of the farm operation and amount of old equipment the farmer had on hand. Due to the scarcity of equipment the total requirement of all farmers could not be supplied. The farm rationing committee have always required a complete outline of the farming operations before they considered a request for a purchase certificate.

"The San Joaquin County committee and the U. S. D. A. war board have insisted on a policy of service to agriculture and farmers. At no time have we subjected ourselves to political approaches or devices to attain any objective. We have assigned many farmers on subcommittees who have volunteered many hours of their time to assist in carrying out the various programs. The resolution No. 3 passed by the California Cattlemen's Association has been reviewed and the complaints referred to in this resolution certainly are not in keeping with the services these committees are rendering to farmers. Since we have many committees throughout the county assisting in the various programs none of them has indicated that any of its approaches or discussions with farmers have been predicated on any mandatory prerequisite other than supplying the committees with a complete history of their farm operation and equipment owned so that accurate and fair distribution of ration equipment could be made by the committee.

"Growers who feel that our decisions have not been just have always been invited to meet with the committee and discuss their problems. We shall continue with this policy and are always glad to invite anyone to our meetings who wishes to make suggestions.

"Since Mr. Loren Bamert, president of the California Cattlemen's Association, has endorsed their resolution No. 3, we are inviting him in person to attend a meeting of the county agricultural conservation association committee so that he may become personally acquainted with the services we are rendering farmers and the procedure necessary to render this service. You will receive a letter explaining the results of this meeting with Mr. Bamert in the near future.

"Attached to this letter are the statements from the county office personnel who assisted

Mr. Bamert during his visit to this office and letter received from the San Joaquin County Farm Bureau livestock department.

"On behalf of the county office personnel who assisted Mr. Bamert during his call at the San Joaquin County office, we are submitting the following statements:

"On or about November 26, 1943, Mr. Loren C. Bamert of Ione, Amador County, Calif., was in the San Joaquin County Agricultural Conservation Association Office and requested authority to purchase a 1½ horsepower gas engine. Mrs. Partridge, an employee of this association, waited on Mr. Bamert and on being informed by Mr. Bamert that he operated approximately 1,200 acres of land, all being in Amador County except 121 acres which is a part section of the whole acreage and lies in San Joaquin County, suggested that he apply in Amador County for his engine as most of his operations appeared to be in that county. Mr. Bamert said he would like to apply for the engine regardless.

"Mrs. Johnson, who works with the Machinery Rationing Committee, took the application (on Form E-1 War Food Administration, July 1943) on which Mr. Bamert stated the engine would be used in San Joaquin County on the lower Jones tract to pump water for about 300 head of stock. After completing the application, he was asked to sign a 1944 farm plan. He signed this (Form WR-806 War Food Administration), completing part of it himself and a clerk, Miss Maravek, assisting him with the completion of the form. He did not appear to be unwilling to sign either the application for the engine (Form E-1) or the 1944 farm plan (Form WR-806). It was not our intent to infer to Mr. Bamert that if a farm plan were not signed, he would not be eligible for the equipment nor that the Rationing Committee would not consider his request but only that it would be of assistance to the committee to know the farm operations involved when making their allocation.

"MARY JOHNSON,
"LEDDY ANN PARTRIDGE,
"MARJORIE MARAVEK,
"Office assistants.

"JANUARY 4, 1944."

As an example of the appreciation many farmers and livestock producers express for the many different services of county committees we are furnishing you the following copy of a letter:

DECEMBER 29, 1943.

Mr. GEORGE CLEVER,
Chairman, Agricultural Adjustment Agency,
Stockton, Calif.

DEAR MR. CLEVER: The swine, dairy, and poultry departments of the San Joaquin Farm Bureau Federation, at a joint meeting on December 22, passed a resolution commending the county committee, Mr. Charles Cooper, secretary, and the staff of the San Joaquin Agricultural Adjustment Agency for their efforts in aiding livestock producers ordering feed wheat.

Hoping your organization will be able to continue this worth while service to local livestock producers, I remain,

Very truly yours,
FRANCIS GRUPE,
Chairman, Swine Department,
San Joaquin Farm Bureau.

You may already be familiar with the fact that the California Cattlemen's Association furnished our county offices with copies of the resolutions adopted by them in San Francisco on December 8-9, 1943. Several of our county committees have taken exception to this resolution and have written the cattlemen's association; we quote from a letter by the Santa Cruz County committee:

"The 1944 Santa Cruz County committee takes exception to your resolution No. 3, ranchers' priorities conditioned upon participation in A. A. A. program. We affirm that, insofar as Santa Cruz County is concerned, your accusations are absolutely unfounded. Neither this committee, nor any previous committee, nor war board, nor the secretary, nor any office employee has ever insisted that any farmer or cattleman register under the agricultural-conservation program in order to receive recommendation for application to purchase farm or ranch machinery and equipment, or for any other reason. At all times registration under the A. A. A. program in this county is, and has been, entirely voluntary.

"It is not unreasonable to expect the farmer or rancher who is applying for the county committee recommendations for purchase of new machinery to supply the committee with precise information about his farm or ranch, so that the committee may determine each individual's need of the proposed equipment. In the event that a farmer or rancher does not intend to participate in the A. A. A. program for any year, the information concerning his farm or ranch may be supplied on the registration form, and the statement that he intends to cooperate or participate in the program may be deleted from the form before he signs. This certainly cannot be construed to suggest that coercive methods are being applied in farm registration procedure."

The following is quoted from a letter to the California Cattlemen's Association by the Alameda County Association:

"However, we were rather startled by the contents of resolution 3. We, of course, do not know how other county associations operate, but we wish to state that we have in no way ever coerced any farmer by forcing him into the A. A. A. program in order that he might obtain any assistance from us in helping on a priority problem. We do, however, in certain cases, ask for some facts regarding farmers' operations. This must be done under any rationing program, or at any time when critical materials must be allocated. This is necessary so that any committee can intelligently pass on the needs of applicants when they are competing for small supplies or available materials, and/or equipment."

From the Yuba County committee: "The committee disagrees very definitely with the statements made in resolution No. 3 and regrets the harm that might be done by the expression of such erroneous statements and by the action taken by the California Cattlemen's Association.

"The first statement in this resolution is not true since it has been determined that none of the county agricultural conservation associations in this part of the State have used any pressure or coercion whatever to induce farmers or cattlemen to sign a farm plan for cooperation with the association. Such action in any A. A. A. offices is the exception rather than the rule. It is the policy of this office first, to be of service to farmers in every way possible, and second, to secure their willing cooperation with the A. A. A. program. But any form of coercion is never permitted in this office, although a complete record of each farmer's operation would be a great help in giving him priority and other assistance.

"The third premise in this resolution which reads in part, 'Many thousands of farmers are of the opinion that the program is unsound, wasteful, and used for political purposes and social reform,' is a general misstatement which would be very difficult to verify if it were true. A large majority of the cattlemen and farmers in this county are willing cooperators in the A. A. A. program."

From the Riverside County committee: "For your information, a farmer can have a farm plan on file even though it is not signed. This gives us a record of his farming activities and his application for farm machinery and equipment can be considered at once. This farm plan is not a contract with the Government and is in no way binding. As the majority of farmers who file a farm plan follow their original plans, it gives us a rather accurate idea as to what crops to expect for the ensuing year. In the event he has not submitted a farm plan and we do not have a record of his farming operations, it is necessary that we make a field investigation before his application can be considered. Sometimes a week or 10 days will elapse before these investigations can be made as our county is approximately 200 miles long and some of these farmers are farming in out-of-the-way places.

"We believe that you have been misinformed when you state that this association is using coercive methods which are nothing short of blackmail in forcing the farmers and cattlemen to subscribe to the A. A. A. program or discontinue their operations. This may hold true in some isolated cases, but we are sure that in the majority of cases you will find that the Agricultural Conservation Association is working to full capacity with and for the farmers of their county."

We have not yet had a report from the San Joaquin County committee regarding Mr. Bamert's reply to their invitation for him to discuss this resolution No. 3 with them. Mr. Loren Bamert is no doubt rather familiar with the fact that participation in our program is voluntary, inasmuch as he participated in the 1940 A. A. A. range program, and his father has participated in our program each year from 1939 through 1943. We understand that Mr. Loren Bamert and his father own range land jointly but operate separately, one with cattle and the other with sheep.

We hope that this information is sufficient to allay any misunderstanding regarding the operation of our county committees, and we shall be very glad to discuss this with you further if you believe it desirable.

Sincerely yours,
G. F. GEISSLER,
Director, Western Division.

CALIFORNIA CATTLEMEN'S ASSOCIATION,
San Francisco, Calif., March 2, 1944.

Hon. NORRIS POULSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. POULSON: For the sake of the record which now contains the report of the California State A. A. A. committee to Director Geisler of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and for your use as you see fit, we enclose affidavit by Lewis W. Armstrong, chairman, Santa Clara County U. S. D. A. War Board.

The statements of the San Joaquin County A. A. A. committee as recited in Mr. Davidson's report, are not in keeping with the facts as set forth in Mr. Bamert's affidavit previously furnished you, nor with oral admissions freely made to Mr. Bamert during his personal conference with that committee.

Neither do Mr. Davidson's statements as contained in his report agree with oral statements made by Mr. Davidson and members of his committee to Mr. Bamert and the writer upon the occasion of our conference with them last January 26, in the committee's office in Berkeley. Upon that occasion, Mr. Davidson and members of his committee freely admitted the truth of Mr. Bamert's statements as to his experience in San Joaquin County. They made no attempt whatever to deny the facts as we have presented them to you, but did say that the fault was probably that of a minor employee in the county A. A. A. office.

In our opinion, much of the trouble lies in the use of the war-food program form for the several purposes of securing information as to a farmer's operations and a pledge by him to cooperate in the so-called war-food program, a hodgepodge of production goals having little resemblance to an intelligible program of any kind; in securing identical information and a pledge of intention to participate in the soil conservation program, and in securing this same information in connection with farmers' applications for priorities for the purchase of machinery, supplies, and equipment.

In not only sanctioning but requiring the use of this form for the latter purpose, authority for requiring the applicant to sign it is inferentially given—otherwise the form is not complete. If it is not to be signed, then any blank piece of paper would serve the stated purposes just as well.

One of the first questions usually asked of applicants by employees of the A. A. A. committees is, "Have you signed a War Food program form?" When he signs it the applicant has signed either one or all of three different documents, depending upon the interpretation, which may at the time or later, be desired by the A. A. A.

This matter was discussed with Mr. Davidson and his committee by Mr. Bamert and myself. While they deny that any such unethical use is or has been made of the forms, they do admit the possibility of it, due to the multiplicity of uses to which the form is put.

It is our recommendation, that for securing the information required from applicants for priorities, a form be designed for this specific purpose, and approved by the Budget Bureau, such form to be so designed as to prevent its use or interpretation as a pledge, or in connection with any War Food program or Soil Conservation program.

We thank you for your interest in this matter, and assure you that our purpose in it is solely to see that the A. A. A. is administered ethically and within the intent of the law.

Sincerely,

DAN C. MCKINNEY,
Secretary.

AFFIDAVITS

To Whom It May Concern:

I, Loren C. Bamert, a resident of Ione, Amador County, Calif., own and operate ranch properties situated in both Amador and San Joaquin Counties. In addition to the properties owned, other properties are operated by me under lease from the owners. These properties are devoted to the production and fattening of beef cattle.

On the 26th day of November 1943, being in need of a water pump for furnishing water to cattle on certain lands leased by me in San Joaquin County, I located such a pump in the hands of the Turner Hardware Co., in Stockton, San Joaquin County, Calif. To enable the hardware company to replace this pump I was instructed to obtain and furnish to them a priority for its purchase.

On the above date I proceeded to the office of the San Joaquin County Agricultural Conservation Association where I made application for the priority. After completing the regular application forms I was instructed to sign another form called War Food Program, 1944 Farm Plan, Form WR 806, War Food Administration. This form required that I state my intention to cooperate in the 1944 war food program. Examination of the form indicated 1944 war-food program to be actually the original A. A. A. soil-conservation program in effect before the war. I so stated to the office employee who was requesting my signature. She confirmed, as a fact, that these programs are one and the same. I then expressed my objections to signing the contract. She informed me that unless I did so no consideration could be given my application for a priority to purchase the water pump. I then signed the contract, at the same time informing the office employee that I had no intention of participating in the soil-conservation program and was signing the contract under duress and only as a means of obtaining the necessary priority to avoid hardship and damage to my cattle.

After this experience, in order to determine whether my case was exceptional, I conducted an investigation among other cattlemen and farmers of San Joaquin County. Among the many whom I contacted, I found that all who had applied for priorities for the purchase of equipment to the office of the San Joaquin County Agricultural Conservation Association had been required, as I was, to sign the war-food program contract. This investigation disclosed that, as stated by the employee in the office of the San Joaquin county committee, the requirement was generally applied.

I swear that I have examined this statement, that it is made in good faith, and that to the best of my knowledge and belief it is true and correct.

LOREN C. BAMERT.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
County of Amador, ss:

On this 2d day of February in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-four before me, M. F. Brooks, a notary public in and for the county of Amador, State of California, residing therein, duly commissioned and sworn, personally appeared Loren C. Bamert, known to me to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument and acknowledged to me that he executed the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal in the county of Amador the day and year in this certificate first above written.

M. F. BROOKS,
Notary Public in and for the County of Amador, State of California.
My commission expires November 6, 1945.

On February 1, 1943, a meeting of the Santa Clara County U. S. D. A. War Board took place in the director's room at 60 North Second Street, San Jose, Calif. There were present the following: Lewis W. Armstrong, chairman Santa Clara County U. S. D. A. War Board; Messrs. Russell Henwood and David W. Dresbach, members Santa Clara County U. S. D. A. War Board; Earl Adams, of the San Jose Office of the United States Employment Service; Agricultural Commissioner L. R. Cody; Harvey L. Hansen, administrative officer Santa Clara County U. S. D. A. War Board; Chairman Dave Davidson, California U. S. D. A. War Board; Roland Ballou, member California Agricultural Conservation Committee; and Matthew Triggs, administrative assistant California Agricultural Conservation Committee.

During this meeting the matter of obtaining priorities for farmers came up for discussion. Mr. Davidson turned to Mr. Hansen, the administrative officer for the county U. S. D. A. War Board and said to him that when farmers appeared at the county A. A. A. office for assistance in obtaining priorities for various materials and equipment they were of course asked if they were participating in the A. A. A. program. Mr. Hansen stated that the only thing that he was concerned with when an applicant came in the door was whether or not he was a farmer. If the applicant was a farmer he was entitled to all the facilities of the county A. A. A. office in obtaining priorities. Mr. Davidson stated that farmers should be signed up in the A. A. A. program before being given priority assistance.

I stated in my capacity as chairman of the County U. S. D. A. War Board that we did not feel that any farmer should have to sign up in the A. A. A. program in order to obtain the materials or equipment that they needed in order to give maximum production during this war period. Mr. Davidson continued at some length regarding this matter although his idea was not put into effect in the county. No instructions contrary to Mr. Davidson's statement at this meeting of the County U. S. D. A. War Board were received from his office during 1943.

LEWIS W. ARMSTRONG.

FEBRUARY 11, 1944.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of February 1944.

EDNA BUCHHEISTER,
Notary Public in and for the County of Santa Clara, State of California.

Vermont Defends a Principle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to be a jurist, but anyone who reads the law not under duress of recent decisions ought to know as a matter of common sense that the United States cannot exercise powers not enumerated in the Constitution, which powers are reserved to the States, and still expect to be the United States of America.

While the opinions of John Marshall do not carry as much weight with an allegedly hand-picked court as they certainly do with the people whose vital interests the court formerly undertook to protect, it is nevertheless worth while to know that in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 5 Peters), Justice Marshall said:

> In our complex system, presenting the rare and difficult scheme of one general Government whose action extends over the whole but which possesses only certain enumerated powers and numerous State governments which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union, contest respecting power must arise * * *. This, however, does not prove that the one is exercising or has the right to exercise the powers of the other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, generally, under their reserved powers, the States have created water power and flood control commissions within themselves in order to protect and to preserve their rights with respect to this great natural resource for themselves, within their borders, excluding navigable rivers, independently of the Federal Government. In so doing they have exercised their rational constitutionally reserved rights and demonstrated the power within themselves to protect their interests and those of their people, who are the Government.

The undertaking to extend the wise provision relative to the power and control of the War Department over navigable streams for the purposes enumerated and at such length, to stretch it to such ends as have been accomplished by connivance of a court which has undertaken to legislate rather than to adjudicate is unfortunate, unwise, and can but spell the end of our Union. These decisions which undertake to interfere with the sovereignty of the States and with the reserved powers thereof are deadly in their import.

The bill which I have introduced, H. R. 4179, seeks to correct a situation and to relieve all of us of judicial legislation by virtue of undertaking the repeal of the controversial provisions of a law which the Court has construed to tolerate and to permit such a destruction of the reserved rights of the States as is intolerable and devastating and can mean only destruction for all of the States and for us all.

The bill I introduced and to which I have referred has for its purpose to restore to the States the sovereign powers of local government, the right to control their valuable natural resources and the property interests which under the Constitution are their reserved right despite any unconstitutional legislation or any decisions of any court based thereon.

Under permission heretofore granted I am extending these remarks by including a recent article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of March 25, 1944, entitled "Vermont Defends a Principle."

I am also including a portion of an article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of August 21, 1943. To both of these articles I respectfully direct your careful attention.

As somebody said to me the other day, the whole dam' trouble with the dam situation is found in the fact that we have tried to beat nature and have commenced at the wrong end of the program. Think that over.

The two articles follow:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of August 21, 1943]

VERMONT DEFENDS A PRINCIPLE

Opposition of southeastern Vermont to the construction by the Federal Government of a great flood-control and power dam in its West River Valley would deserve only a sympathetic interest elsewhere, if nothing were involved beyond the natural objection of residents to being driven out of their homes and to the inundation of a beautiful valley. Other things are involved, touching both fundamental principles of government and broad national policies.

The States' rights issue may well concern every State in the Union. It has application to many things other than the turning of a Vermont valley into a hydroelectric power reservoir, contrary to the State's wishes.

A system of reservoirs in the upper Connecticut River Basin is needed, for the protection, primarily, of towns and cities in Massachusetts and Connecticut—notably Holyoke, Springfield, and Hartford. The great floods of 1936 and 1938—the latter contemporaneous with the great New England hurricane—did direct and indirect damage of $144,000,000. Local works since erected protect down-river communities against ordinary freshets. To protect them against occasional great floods requires control of the upper river through storage basins.

Vermont agrees to that, is willing to supply necessary land, asks only that she be not required to go beyond flood control, that her lands be damaged as little as possible, and that her rights as a sovereign State be respected. That is fair enough.

Under existing law, however, there is nothing Vermont can do to stop the proposed power development, unless Congress can be persuaded to withhold an appropriation, estimated at $30,000,000, perhaps more.

Obviously, if this can be done to one Vermont valley against the State's wishes, it can be done to any and all valleys of that State, and to any and all valleys of any State.

Carried to its theoretical extreme, that puts it within the legal power of Congress to wipe out a State. A State may not be deprived of its representation in the United States Senate without its consent, but purely as a matter of legal theory under the existing flood-control law, Senators from any State could find themselves representing only great bodies of water, with a few mountaintop islands rising out of them.

That reduces the matter to absurdity, of course. However, the very exaggeration serves to emphasize that what the law permits to be done in one State may be done in any State, regardless of the State's wishes. That may well cause the representatives of all the States to think at least twice. Other aspects of the controversy have to do with the general national policy regarding flood control. There is much competent opinion that, with a few exceptions which need to be chosen with great care, flood control and power development, tied together, are incompatible.

Power development calls for full reservoirs, flood control for empty basins, or at least ample storage, when floods come, often without warning. Some years ago the Federal Government built the $25,000,000 Pensacola Dam in the Grand River Valley of Oklahoma. At the insistence of the Federal Power Commission and the power bloc in Congress, hydroelectric development was included. In the Saturday Evening Post for August 21, 1943, Elmer T. Peterson told what happened. When the flood of that year hit the Pensacola Dam the "reservoir was practically full and there was virtually no capacity to take up the excess flow. * * * The raging Grand River produced a flood in its lower valley and in the Arkansas River as if there had been no dam at all." Damage was $127,000,000, a vast food-producing area was ruined.

All this lends point to the Vermont contention that a power dam in its West River not only is unnecessary, but does not represent the best way, or perhaps even a good way, to protect Massachusetts and Connecticut cities.

Vermont has raised a pertinent issue, not only in regard to the fundamental principle of State rights, but also with respect to the national policy concerning flood control, for which it is proposed that the United States shall spend billions after the war.

[From Saturday Evening Post of August 21, 1943]

FLOODS ARE UNNECESSARY

"It doesn't make a lot of difference whether a dam is constructed primarily for power or flood control," said Doctor (Hugh H.) Bennett, diplomatically bypassing the glaring failure of the Pensacola Dam. "It will fill up with silt anyhow—in anywhere from 25 to 50 years in many instances—unless its watershed is adequately protected. Even Boulder Dam will face this siltation problem some day. There are 2,000 reservoirs in the United States already filled up with sediment. I remember one in Kansas that filled up during one rainstorm. In the remaining 8,000 major reservoirs of the country the rate of sedimentation is so great that about a third of them will fill up in 50 years."

One clincher to this phase of the discussion was furnished a few years ago by Dr. N. E. Winters, outstanding soil conservationist then connected with Oklahoma A. and M. College, who commented on the Denison Dam, on the Red River between Oklahoma and Texas. This dam, now under construction, will cost more than $50,000,000, and its reservoir will receive a silt-laden output of the Red, Washita, and other rivers, which looks like thick red barn paint, its solid content sometimes reaching 15 percent or more. Some engineers predict that it will fill up within 25 years.

"I could take half the cost of this dam, and, by spending it on watershed treatment, completely stop floods on the Red River," said Doctor Winters in a public address. As a matter of fact, he could point to a small lake near Guthrie which has dried up because the watershed has been terraced and contour-farmed.

All of which should give us taxpayers something to chew on.

Mr. Speaker, what we need is fewer dams and more brains. What is now sought to be accomplished by the expenditure of many billions of dollars could have been achieved long ago at relatively small expenditure and the use of more gray matter. We cannot beat nature.

Congress and the F. C. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, I introduce into the Appendix of the RECORD, editorial comment by the Ohio State Journal, published in Columbus, Ohio, and headed "Congress and the F. C. C.":

CONGRESS AND THE F. C. C.

Over the bitter protests of the bureaucrats and their sponsors, Congress has lopped $1,500,000 from the Federal Communications Commission's budget. The F. C. C. claimed it needed this money to operate its Radio Intelligence Division, but, as Senator MCKELLAR, Democrat, of Tennessee, pointed out, our Army and Navy have ample radio intelligence set-ups which are adequate to the need.

The F. C. C. has itself to blame for this loss of operating funds and for what now must be the dropping of one of its divisions. It has concerned itself a great deal too frequently with purely domestic radio affairs, even to the extent that it has been charged with dictating types of programs for the air and being otherwise arbitrary. Like most other bureaus, the F. C. C. carried its activities and projected its authority beyond the point specified by the law. It was time it had its horns trimmed a bit.

Furthermore, the F. C. C. Chairman, James L. Fly, has been one of the most dictatorial little czars of all the army of bureaucrats who infest Washington. He has dictated to radio stations, to program sponsors, and even tried to tell Congress where its authority ended and his began. For this he is being given a lesson in where the authority really exists, and none too soon.

In controlling appropriations Congress holds the real key to command over our whole giddy system of bureaucracy. The trouble is the lawmakers do not use this power often enough. There still remains to be investigated matters in which the F. C. C. figured in a manner that has the public skeptical. The administration has tried to quash one investigation and may succeed yet in keeping it from an airing. But Congress seems to be hitting a new stride and the hope is that it will accelerate its pace in the direction it has been moving. That is what the people want it to do, as attested by the trend in recent elections.

Address Before the Chelsea (Mass.) Zionist Emergency Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following address I made on March 22, 1944, at a mass meeting of the Chelsea Zionist Emergency Council against the British white paper of 1939, held in the Chelsea high school auditorium, Chelsea, Mass.:

The resolutions now pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Congress of the United States provide: "That the United States shall use its good offices and take appropriate measures to the end that the doors of Palestine shall be opened for free entry of Jews into that country, and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization, so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

As a result of the action initiated at the Bermuda conference of April 1943, the expiration date of March 31, 1944, was indefinitely postponed by the British Parliament to enable the authorized remainder, approximately 30,000 Jews in number to enter Palestine whenever they should succeed in reaching that haven.

The new British policy, when formulated, must not be a repetition of the white paper of 1939.

The Balfour Declaration of November 1917 publicly recognized the right of the Jews to have a sovereign homeland. Over 50 nations endorsed these terms and they were unanimously approved by the Lodge-Fish resolution, passed by the Congress in 1922. Every American President since then has consistnetly supported this stand.

Under a mandate from the League of Nations, Britain was appointed guardian over Palestine, to regulate it until such time as the Jews would be in a position to administer their own affairs. But Palestine is a vital link in the communications of the British Empire. As the dictators grew in power, they seized upon Palestine as a fertile field for their propaganda and the Arabs were stirred to revolt. Then came the days of Chamberlain and the fatal policy of appeasement. Loath to antagonize the Mohammedan world, England compromised, and in doing so failed in its pledges to the Jewish people.

In 1939 the British issued the White Paper, which provided for (1) total stoppage of Jewish immigration into Palestine after March 1944; (2) rigorous restrictions on land purchase by Jews; (3) the ultimate establishment of an independent Palestine state in which Jews should constitute not more than one-third of the population. And Jews the world over were dismayed.

As of March 9, 1944, President Roosevelt stated that "the American Government has never given its approval to the British White Paper of 1939."

In 1939 Mr. Winston Churchill and others now leaders in the British Government condemned the White Paper as a "breach and a repudiation of Britain's pledges" and predicted that it could not endure.

Plainly this White Paper was an attempt to appease the Arabs at the sacrifice of the Jews, but it failed. In Britain's darkest hour the Arabs lifted not one finger in her defense. When Rommel, the "desert fox," was knocking at the doors of Alexandria the Fascist-minded Arabs prayed for Britain's defeat. Even today the former Prime Minister of Iraq and a prominent member of the Egyptian royal family are in Berlin doing propaganda work for the Nazis. But what were the Jews doing in this crisis? They were the only group in the Middle East loyal to the democratic cause. They begged for the opportunity to raise an army of their own to fight by Britain's side, but she refused. In spite of this, 30,000 Palestinian Jews are serving in the British Army, and today more than a million Jewish men and women are serving in the armed forces of the United Nations.

The Jews have been trained in the school of adversity. They are patient and persevering. The spirit of Zionism, which stands for the creation of a Jewish national home in Palestine, will not be denied. For the last 2,000 years at Passover you have said, "Next year in Jerusalem." Because the currents of Jewish culture run deep and you have never betrayed your heritage.

After four centuries of slavery in Egypt, the Hebrews, under Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, established an independent national existence in Palestine. They conquered it in 1200 B. C. and maintained it for 1,300 years. It grew and prospered under the reigns of Saul and David and Solomon.

But, as the cross-roads of three continents, it had to face barbarian aggression from all sides. Before it finally succumbed to the crushing legions of Rome, it gave to the world the father of all religious faiths—the Bible.

That was a long time ago, before the great nations of today were born. And the point for all men to see and remember is that the Jews gave their greatest contributions to civilization when they were a nation.

Yet there are those today who say the Jews have no right to nationhood, which is a complete and deliberate falsification of history.

For many centuries now, Palestine has been a land of rock and marshland and sand dunes, that is, until the end of the last war when the Jews, filled with the promise of the Balfour Declaration, started back to their homeland. There, during the past 25 years we have witnessed one of the miracles of modern times. One of the lies we used to hear was that the Jew never worked with his hands. Yet out of the sweat of his brow, he lovingly tilled the soil; he built beautiful homes and factories and cities; he set up libraries and hospitals and universities.

Sand and marsh were transformed into fertile farmlands. The death rate became the lowest in the East. Even the Arabs came to Palestine because they found that they fared better under tolerant and progressive Jewish society than they did under the sluggish rule of their native chieftains. Palestine, an impoverished country, has come to life. In less than 25 years an astounding development has taken place on the barren coast of the Mediterranean. The all-Jewish city of Tel-Aviv was created, a community of 150,000 inhabitants which is one of the most modern in the world. All this was done, not by capital—but by Jewish labor. Furthermore, it was accomplished during a period when the world was suffering from an economic depression.

There is no compulsion about the communal settlements in Palestine, nor any State control (as in Russia). The farms are run by mutual agreement among their members and communal organization of the settlement's economic life does not interfere with the freedom of the individual or of the family. The labor movement in Palestine seeks to unite all workers in town and country who live by labor, without exploiting the labor of others. The Labor Party is so strong in Palestine that, if ever a Jewish state is set up, it will be a labor state because they will have built it by faith and toil.

To build the Kingdom of God, the Jews must not be dissipated among other nations, always as ineffective minorities. As the prophets preached, they must have their own nation, there to work and develop the ideal social order, as a model and example from which other nations may learn.

The suffering, shame, and persecution of the centuries must not condemn the Jews to an unending mission of martyrdom. As a liberal and peace-loving people they are needed today, needed as a nation in a world which has lost sight of the ancient virtues.

The Fascist terror, which has brought to the Jews of our time the most cruel persecution in history, will be exterminated. But what of the residue? What of the youth of Axis countries, who have been taught only to hate the Jews? What of the people who have taken over Jewish homes, businesses, and professions? All the sincere and humanitarian efforts of the Allies to remedy these abuses will not fully succeed. It will take many years to clean up the insidious poisons which Hitler will leave after him. In the meantime, what will become of the homeless and uprooted Jews? How can they return to countries which will have their own urgent economic problems? How will these disinherited Jews find a livelihood and recover their moral dignity? Jewish homelessness must be remedied by giving them a home. Only in this way will the fires of anti-Semitism, those fires that are fanned by agitators who are seeking ruthless power, be finally extinguished.

The Jewish people have the tragic yet proud distinction of being the first people to be attacked by the Fascist barbarians. Sacrifice is not a new experience in Jewish life, yet in the present crisis they have given up 3,000,000 of their lives because they would not lose faith in human decency.

Surely, if this great struggle in which so many Jewish men have given their lives, is to have meaning and direction, it must win sanctuary for the Jews. And in doing so, let us face the facts. There is racial and religious prejudice against the Jew. It rests on ancient and deep-seated lies. It cannot be remedied overnight. When social misery cannot be explained unscrupulous leaders seeking a scapegoat, blame the Jews. This is an old, old trick and we had hoped that most people would see through it by this time. But human intelligence is slow in developing and many misguided people still want to believe this. The scourge of Hitler grew to power on this emotional life. Even in our own country we have seen shameful instances of people who direct attention away from their own failings—by blaming the Jew.

The result of this has been that some Jews have leaned backward, fearing to come out openly for the establishment of a Jewish home in Palestine. They have feared that some people might accuse them of putting their interest in Judaism ahead of their interest in Americanism. True, the bigots will make this charge, but the great majority of Americans are in sympathy with the Zionist program. They want to see you work for the building in Palestine of a truly Hebraic civilization, with a different basis than ruthless competition and greed. They want to see what you can do, by example, to help a sick world. They admire the fact that you are not asking for charity, but simply for land your persecuted brethren can call their own and on which they can work out their human destiny as freemen.

Jewish policy has consistently sought a basis of mutual cooperation with the Arabs. This was reflected in the fact that King Feisal, the chief spokesman of the Arabs at the peace conference, welcomed the idea of a Jewish national home in Palestine. Jews and Arabs are both Semitic peoples. There is no reason why they should not get along together. As a matter of fact, the Arabs themselves showed very little interest in Palestine until the Jews, by their labors, brought such improvement to the country. The average Arab was glad to see this initiative because it raised his own standard of living. However, the effendi class of Arab landlords, feudal and dictatorial in character, resented the change. They saw their privileged position challenged. Poverty-stricken Arab peasants, working side by side with Jewish labor, were building a prosperous industrial and agricultural community. Such fraternization must be prevented at all costs. And so false issues had to be invented to mislead the ignorant Arab population. The cry was raised: "The Jew is robbing you of your land." Once more the country was swept by organized violence and destruction. Meanwhile the Arab landlords secretly kept on selling land to the Jews, so that if the wrath of the masses could have had any substance it should have been leveled at their own false leaders who were inciting them to riot against the Jews. The Jews did buy land, but they were careful to compensate the poor Arabs they found on the land of the effendis by buying them land elsewhere. This was often better land, which they could own outright, without having to pay four-fifths of the income from the land to grasping owners as they did under the old system.

But the world was told that this was a spontaneous explosion of Arab nationalist sentiment. Still the Arab peasant refused to join in the uprising. Finally, paid terrorists and gangsters had to be imported to keep up the lie of a revolt. Mussolini stepped in. Quantities of German arms and ammunition were smuggled in. Bands in the pay of the Fuehrer and the Duce kept up the agitation. Violence interrupted the creative work of Jewish national enterprise. Then came the white paper which restricted Jewish immigration to Palestine and prevented their legitimate purchase of the land. British imperial policy forestalled the natural growth of a Jewish majority. Kept as a minority, they would not be able to claim the right of self-government.

The Jewish pioneers had come to make the land of Israel not only a refuge for the persecuted of their own race, but a happier place for the poor and disease-ridden Arabs as well. They came, not as military conquerors, but as doers of the will of God. The first building on Zion's hill was not a fort, but a school of learning, the Hebre University. Zionism's object was to bring to a close Israel's 2,000 years of exile, to establish a haven where Jews might settle down to build "the world to come;" a world wherein not one man shall plow and another reap, not one man build and another inhabit, and not one man cause hurt or damage to another man.

What is England's policy toward Palestine going to be, in the light of the Atlantic Charter and the freedoms for which she has so gloriously fought in this war against tyranny? That is the paradox. The concept of empire and the concept of individual liberty. How can she reconcile them? Is she going to maintain the fiction that Jew and Arab cannot get along together and that, therefore, she must maintain supervision over them? Her concern for the stability of the Mohammedan world as it affected Britain's imperial security resulted in the white paper. That statement of colonial policy gave in to Arab demands and curtailed Jewish agricultural and industrial expansion in Palestine.

If that country were a colony, we might understand Britain's position. In reality it is a guardianship, for which Britain is responsible to the League of Nations and to the United States. This white paper was never approved by other nations and has yet to be legalized by an international authority. The exigencies of war alone support it. At the peace table it will not be exclusively for Britain to decide the ultimate fate of Palestine. The United States also has a right and interest in the solution of this problem which she has never forfeited.

Opposing the white paper, Winston Churchill said in a speech before the House of Commons in May of 1939:

"The triumphant Arabs have rejected it. They are not going to put up with it. The despairing Jews will resist it. What will the world think about it? What will our friends say? What will be the opinion of the United States of America? Shall we not lose more—and this is a question to be considered maturely—in the growing support and sympathy of the United States than we shall gain in local administrative convenience, if gain at all we do?"

As Churchill indicated, American public opinion will have much to do with the honorable solution of this problem. In this case I am reminded of the experience of the Irish people They are small in number. They have worked courageously and persistently for their independence. England did not have to grant it. She did, however, when she saw that the great weight of public opinion in America was in favor of it. England needs America, as we need England. We, who were so tragically unprepared, will never forget the perilous days of 1940–41, when England alone stood up against the ruthless might of fascism. Without England, where would we have been today? And without us—and Russia—where would England have been?

Tonight, in typical American fashion, you are helping to crystallize the sentiment which will inevitably influence British policy and succeed in establishing a Jewish homeland.

Arab Fascists have no case because Arab lands are 100 times the size of Palestine. Arab peasants and workers who wish to cooperate with Jews in the homeland will be welcome. The practice of Arab-Jewish collaboration in labor unions was eminently successful until the Fascists intervened. History has proved that these two people, if left alone, can work together in peace and harmony. For it was the successful cooperation of these two Semitic groups under the caliphs of Bagdad and in Spain that produced one of the nourishing developments of western civilization.

As for England, I feel certain that the peace will provide her with a security that will free her from the need of appeasement in Palestine. Then, her pledge, freely given to the whole world, will be kept, and the Promised Land will be opened to the tired and homeless people of Israel.

Statesmen, seeking to solve this ancient problem have suggested the jungles of Guiana, the barren tundras of Alaska, the forbidding shores of Ceylon and Madagascar * * * but none of these will do. The birthright of the Jew is Palestine. There the framework and organization have been set up by the Jews themselves. The economic, social, cultural, and religious fabric are there, set up by the pioneers. Large areas of land are available for settlement. Erets Yisrael is calling and the day is not far distant when they * * * her wandering children, will return. Gone will be the ghettoes and the badge of shame. And gone will be the tyrants who sought to crush the dignity of man in the person of the Jew. The conscience of the Christian world will, for the first time, be at ease. For an ancient wrong will have been righted.

By what the Jews have accomplished in Palestine they have proved their capacity for self-government. That is exhibit A.

Exhibit B is the consistent policy of the American Government. We have never given up the right to a voice in the disposition of Palestine, to which, as an associated power, we are entitled. And the moral influence of America will be even greater when this present crisis is over.

Exhibit C. This meeting of Americans who are determined that their suffering brethren, driven from pillar to post, shall at last find refuge in the country of their origin * * * as was promised.

The sacrifice of your martyrs, down through the suffering centuries will be vindicated. Humanity will be redeemed and the words of Isaiah will come true:

"The ransomed of the Lord shall return
And come with singing unto Zion."

Food for Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, many Members of Congress were present at a recent meeting of the Food Forum here in the city of Washington and heard an interesting address by Dr. Theodore W. Schultz, of the University of Chicago.

Dr. Schultz's high standing as an agricultural economist and his wide knowledge of food production and distribution make this address significant and timely. Under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include a summary of Dr. Schultz's address:

I want to take up what are, in my judgment, the three basic issues in the problem of food for relief that confront us as a people:

1. The rating given to various foods;

2. The role of food in the relief period ahead;

3. The risk factor in food management.

My three R's are not 'riting, reading, and 'rithmetic, but rating food, role of food, and risk confronting food management.

Let me make explicit the large area on which we are probably all agreed; these are the things I, therefore, am taking for granted:

1. We are eating more food per capita and it is better distributed than ever before. This is also true in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and, for the most part, in the United Kingdom.

2. We have passed the peak in food production in this war.

3. The American people want to contribute generously and freely to the food needs of peoples when they are liberated—to aid children and mothers and more immediately to help the Army so that liberated peoples do not become a menace to the military.

4. The bulk of the food which Europe will need after victory must of necessity come from the fields and feed lots of Europe—fully 90 percent of it. (This means that we must be prepared to make it possible for Europe to help herself as quickly as feasible.)[1]

Now, let me put before you the conditions we should, in my judgment, be prepared to meet. They are:

We should be prepared for a short crop: We have been blessed by nature with five bumper crops in a row. By all count a bad crop is overdue.

We should be prepared for a long war: We are consuming our surpluses as if this were a short war. Should the defeat of Germany take still another year and that of Japan still longer, we must be prepared for it on the food front.

We should be prepared for much more deterioration in the food situation within Europe and in the Orient before peace, order, and production are restored.

To meet these contingencies—a bad crop, a long war, and worsening of the food situation in Europe and the Orient—what about our high per capita consumption and our high hopes to help liberated peoples? This takes us back to the basic issues.

First. What about the rating given to various foods? It is my contention that we need to revaluate our food supply; priorities must be changed. Take cereals—these will be the least scarce, provided we check the feeding of wheat to animals and divert less to the production of alcohol.

Fats will be exceedingly scarce until the Southwest Pacific is rewon and in production again. We cannot afford to put edible fats into the soap kettle and to other nonedible uses. The food situation does not warrant this. Edible fats deserve a higher priority. (And when the war is over remember a big dislocation in American agriculture will be in the production of fats and oils.)

Proteins will also be exceedingly scarce. Here we have fortunately a great reserve in our high quality vegetable proteins. To serve the ends of nutrition in bringing health and strength and growth to malnourished people, we need to mobilize this valuable food resource at once, and do it fully.

Because the peoples of Europe have developed a taste and strong preference for animal proteins, some of these should be made available for them.

Instead of feeding our skim milk to our hogs we owe it to ourselves and to others to give this product a higher priority. Skim milk is a food and it is too scarce and too valuable for feed.

Second. What about the role of food in the relief period ahead? I must be brief; all I want to say is that relief cannot and must not be left as the residual claimant.

There is too much at stake—hungry people will be a menace to our Army, they will hate us for delay and neglect. Relief claims for food must stand on footing with other major claims in food allocations.

Third. What about the risk factor in food management? We are confronted with two major uncertainties: (1) The size of the forthcoming crop or crops, and (2) the duration of the war.

To prepare for uncertainty one turns to flexibility—reserves, stock piles, flows of food that can be diverted.

We must risk coming out with big stocks and carry-overs—it is the price we must pay for being prepared for contingencies. We must even risk having some food spoil and go to waste as we build and maintain stock piles. It is better to do this than to consume all of our abundance currently and be unprepared for droughts and floods at home and military reverses and difficulties abroad.

To recapitulate:

We must alter the ratings; save wheat for food, and use less for feed and alcohol; save all edible fats for food; mobilize our high quality proteins for war; save our skim milk for food.

We must recast the role, make relief a claimant on an equal footing with civilians, the United Kingdom, Russia, and others.

We must take new risks; prepare for the uncertainties that lie ahead by increasing reserves and stock piles.

Letter From Mother of Boy on Duty in South Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 27, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from the mother of a boy in the South Pacific, which contained the following:

My son writes from the South Pacific, "the only news we get comes from the desk of F. D. R. and it makes me damn mad." Can't you make a speech? Stop the Stars and Stripes which are being made as propaganda for the fourth term. It is too outrageous to send our boys out to fight and die and fill them up with New Deal propaganda.

Operations of Social Security Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two informative articles by Stuart Chase and Jerome Beatty on the operations of the Social Security Board, appearing in the April 1944 issue of the Reader's Digest at pages 88 and 91.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STORY OF SOCIAL SECURITY

I. THIS BUREAUCRACY STREAMLINES ITSELF

(By Stuart Chase)

The Social Security Board conducts the biggest clerical job on earth. It has accounts with 76,000,000 Americans. In the past 2 years its work has increased 33 percent, while its pay roll has declined from about 12,300 employees to 9,800. Yet it is doing its gigantic task more smoothly than ever before. What has happened here to thwart the devils of bureaucracy?

Three things, I think, explain it. First, the high quality of Social Security's executive staff. Second, the fact that the Board was organized to do an entirely new job, and so was compelled to use creative ingenuity. Third, the use of a program called work simplification, derived from the job methods training of the War Manpower Commission, in which the rank and file of the organization play a large part.

From its start the Board has been known for its efficiency. In the 7 years of its existence it has turned back $24,000,000 to the Treasury in unspent appropriations. The time spent in settling a claim has been cut from 40 days in 1940 to 23 days in 1943, and is still being reduced.

Under the Board's job methods training, office work is broken down into essential steps and then each step is subjected to a salvo of questions:

Why is this necessary? What is its purpose? Where should it be done? When should it be done? Who should do it? How is the best way?

The regular job methods training for industry goes no lower than the supervisor, but the Social Security Board included every member of its staff. This is democracy with a vengeance, and it produces surprising results. Never in any other office have I found an entire outfit asking embarrassing questions about the efficiency of their own work. In effect they are saying, "Does this thing I am doing make any sense?"

Here is a big technical reference room in Washington, with stacks of documents, court decisions, and fat legal books. The supervisor has a dozen people under her—indexers, file clerks, stenographers.

The entire staff of the reference room take seats at a big table. In comes the "trainer," a specially chosen employee who has taken the JM course with the War Manpower Commission. He unpacks his box of stage properties and puts on a show—the case of a worker making radio shields, for instance, with "before and after" contrast.

The trainer has a talent for acting, and makes the "before" stage extremely funny, with the worker jumping up continually and running all over the shop for his materials. The faster he runs the more work he spoils. In the "after" stage the worker sits quietly at his adjusted bench, turning out three times as many shields. His job has been expertly analyzed, and its 30 steps have been cut to 14.

People around the table are fascinated. The trainer capitalizes this interest to drive home the application to their own work in the reference room. He shows how to break down any job into its essential steps, how to ask the six basic questions, how to develop a better way with fewer steps. Finally he asks for volunteers to bring a break-down of one of their tasks to the next meeting.

I talked with a girl who had been an early volunteer. Her task was to index certain documents coming in to the reference room. She showed me the neat typewritten form on which the old way is compared with the new way. The first had 18 steps, the second 11. "I never realized before," she said, "that people like me could think out improvements. I always thought the supervisor was supposed to do the planning. Now I feel it's part of all our jobs."

I crossed the room and asked a file clerk what plans he had evolved as a result of the round-table meeting. He used to vary his filing with operating the addressograph, wasting much time and effort in walking back and forth between his two tasks. Now he runs the addressograph in the morning and devotes most of the afternoon to sorting his material for filing. When he finally moves to the files he goes completely equipped, with everything prepared in advance. He saves hours a day by this organized attack.

In another office I tackled a plump, gray-haired, conscientious woman who for years has been preparing periodically a cumulative index. The work used to involve 27 steps and take 600 hours. She has cut the steps to 12, and can now do the job in 200 hours. She showed me what operations have been eliminated.

I asked, "Why didn't you think of doing that before?"

"Because I wasn't supposed to think like that before. I was told how to do it, and there were rules higher up that forced me to take those unnecessary steps. When the break-down showed how pointless they were, we got them changed."

When a plan is first submitted at the round table, everybody is encouraged to take a crack at it, especially the supervisor. Many plans overlap other people's work and have to be ironed out by group discussion. A group of 10 to 20 persons may need 5 or 6 meetings to discuss the proposals presented. So far, in the Washington office, 80 out of every 100 plans proposed have been adopted.

As the meetings progress, the trainer eases himself out of the chairmanship and the supervisor takes over. It is better for the supervisor to run the sessions, because one of the chief purposes of the round table is to bring supervisor and worker closer together. The trainer stays as a consultant as long as he is needed.

Every suggestion for improvement is passed up the line to supervisors. Top management acknowledges them by a personal letter. Without the active interest of top management, says Oscar Powell, executive director of the board, the project would fade out. A record of achievement is put into the individual's civil-service file, so that any future employer will see it. There is no financial reward—nothing but credit, honor, and a satisfying sense of participation.

Work simplification has been operating long enough to warrant the following conclusions. If you have anything to do with an office, they ought to interest you.

1. The program taps a vast reservoir of human energy which lies inert in most offices.

2. It helps the employee to share in management and to understand the importance of his job. His morale goes up.

3. It stimulates orderly thinking and gives the employee an effective method for analyzing his own work.

4. The program is democracy in action; it gets everyone in. It transforms the supervisor from a driver to a leader; from "do it and no back talk" to "let's see if we can work out a better way."

5. It opens up the horizon of the supervisor. The old attitude of feeling ashamed if employees beat one to suggestions for improvements becomes a feeling of shame if employees do not submit a flow of suggestions.

6. It shows up red tape.

7. Work simplification as a technique is applicable to other Government agencies and to all office work which involves recurring tasks. In fact, the round-table idea is now being adopted by unemployment insurance offices in almost all the States, by the United States Department of Agriculture, by the State of Minnesota, by the city of New York.

Here is an example of how the Board has used work simplification to get rid of several yards of red tape:

Jim White in the St. Paul office is being transferred to Boston. He is going to sell his house, take his family and his furniture with him. The Board is authorized to move his furniture, but to get it done under the old method shook the Republic to its foundations: 24 signatures, acknowledgments, permits and certifications were required, in St. Paul, Chicago, and Washington.

Then came work simplification and some pertinent questions. As a result, the whole thing can now be done in St. Paul, without Chicago or Washington sticking their noses in at all, and Jim can get his family established in Boston in good time.

Then there is the story of the clerk who asked why she should classify and file the third copies of some 4,000 social-security decisions sent in monthly by the States, when 2 copies were already in the works. Her superiors, horror-struck, could point to no answer except the barnacles of tradition. They stopped saving the triplicate copy. Instead they saved time, filing cabinets, floor space, paper, transportation.

Traditions fall, not only in Washington but in the larger Baltimore office. Old-age and survivor benefits are calculated here on the most fearful and wonderful machines in the world. I saw a whole building full of these clanking robots, automatically recording data from cards.

In the Baltimore office 2,400 workers have made 6,600 suggestions, of which 1,600 have been adopted. Some of the proposals have been spectacular. One of the building guards worked out a plan to eliminate 38 guards—half the force—with no loss of protection. Another employee's plan for eliminating the 76,000,000 ledger sheets, with the essential information retained in simplified microfilm listings, promises to save $350,000 a year and 20,000 square feet of floor space.

A remarkable feature of this bureau's program of self-improvement is that it has begun to analyze its technical language. The head of the Baltimore office has worked out a card that reminds employees to keep sentences to 25 words and paragraphs short. Avoid technical and legal terms, it advises. Do not hedge; be explicit. Use friendly, not frigid, words. Do not be afraid of idiomatic phrases. Concentrate on the meaning.

This is indeed a revolution among bureaucrats. It might even spread some day to the Internal Revenue Bureau, and make some sense out of the income-tax form.

Here is a significant letter received by Director Powell:

BLANKVILLE, TEX.

MY DEAR SIR: I am usually resentful when I receive an inquiry from State or Federal agencies, but I welcomed your letter as I invariably do when I hear from your office, because your agency is organized along sensible lines and is consistently courteous and inclined to help the employer rather than harass him.

Respectfully yours,

X. Y. Z.,
President of a local company.

The more human and efficient the Board is, the better for us all.

II. WILL YOU GET YOUR SHARE?

(By Jerome Beatty)

One day recently a friend asked me, "How much do we get in social-security payments when we're 65?" I didn't have the slightest idea. "Neither have I," he admitted. Like most Americans, we carried social-security cards but knew very little about it.

So I went to the Social Security Board in Washington to find out. I went to Baltimore, too, where in a shabby loft building the records are kept in 20,400 filing cabinets. Here a sprightly girl, with nothing to guide her but my name, found my account number in 17 seconds. (She couldn't have done so well had my name been Smith, for there are 574,435 Smiths in the files.)

The basic idea of social security is to help aged workers who have never earned enough to save for old age. A tax, levied on wages up to $3,000 a year, is paid by both workers and employers. This provides a fund from which payments are made to eligible persons when they reach 65. It is not an insurance plan that gives every worker equal benefits for what he pays in. The poor generally will get much more than they and their employers have put in, and the man who makes $3,000 or more a year is likely to get less. The maximum paid to any one family is $85 a month.

Several large groups are not covered by social security. These include farmers, domestic servants, school teachers, ministers, the self-employed, and workers in Government service and religious and charitable organizations.

Generally, when the time comes for you to collect old-age insurance benefits, you must have worked in "covered" employment half the time since January 1, 1937, when social security started, or since your twenty-first birthday if that came on a later date. The years are divided into quarters, for figuring, and if you have credit for 40 quarters (they don't have to be consecutive) you are qualified as long as you live.

Girls who pay pay-roll taxes for a few years and then marry and quit work usually lose all they put in. Similarly, housewives who are in war work only for the duration probably won't qualify.

You will collect nothing at 65 unless you stop working then. But you can get benefits even though you draw money from investments, from your own business, or from a job not covered by the law. A New York man who worked for a florist reached the age of 65, and found he was due to receive $42.28 a month if he stopped working. He and his wife weren't able to live on that amount, so he stayed on the job. A social-security agent, however, explained to him that if he had a business of his own he would qualify for the payments. The man started a little greenhouse, makes about $20 a week from it, draws his social-security payments, and lives comfortably.

If your employer collects your tax and then fails to pay it, and his, to the Government, the Bureau of Internal Revenue gets after him; but in some cases it's almost impossible to catch a tax-dodging employer unless you write the Social Security office for a statement of your account and discover that you are being cheated.

The Social Security office in Baltimore encourages workers to write in and ask for statements of their accounts. Queries must bear the worker's signature, address, birth date, and Social Security number. These facts are necessary to make sure the request is not being made by some snooper who wants to find out how much money you're making.

Social Security records are absolutely secret. The Bureau of Internal Revenue would like to get its hands on them, in order to track down workers who are dodging their income taxes; but the law says "No." A wife can't find out how much her husband is making. Even the F. B. I. can't peek into the files.

If you lose your card, be sure to ask the nearest Social Security field office for a duplicate.

If you qualify for Social Security, it sends you a check every month after you become 65. It pays your wife, too, when she reaches that age. It pays something toward the care of children under 16, or under 18 if they are in school—if you have any when you become 65. No matter what your age is when you die, payments go to your widow if she is 65 or over or when she reaches 65. If there are dependent children, as above, she receives benefits at once. If you leave no widow or dependent children, wholly dependent parents receive benefits at 65.

If no relative is immediately qualified to draw monthly benefits as a result of the death of a worker, a lump-sum payment of $60 to $336 is made—this payment going usually to a widow under 65 who has no dependent children. She still receives benefits after she reaches 65.

Too many widows of workers don't know that social security may owe them money. Recently a young soldier married just before he was sent to north Africa. Five weeks later he was killed in action. His 19-year-old wife drew her Army benefits but didn't know about social security until a friend mentioned it. Her young husband had not worked long before he went into the Army, and had paid in less than $20, but she got a lump-sum payment of about $150. A posthumous child is due, and when it arrives the mother will get about $32 a month until the child is 16 or 18. If she doesn't marry again, the widow will get about $19 a month after reaching 65.

No one seems to be sure how much money it will take to pay benefits as the pool of old persons entitled to them increases. There's a balance of $4,500,000,000 in the fund now, but payments will increase tremendously when the war ends. It is estimated that 625,000 persons now entitled to benefits aren't claiming them.

Retirement insurance benefits you may expect at 65

[1] For average monthly wages under $50 the benefits are smaller; but they cannot be less than $10 a month for a single person, or $15 a month for a man and wife. The maximum benefit to any one family is $85 a month.

Work of the Truman Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CARL HAYDEN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], who is detained by illness, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the American Observer entitled "The Work of the Senate Truman Committee."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WORK OF THE SENATE TRUMAN COMMITTEE

In Washington's welter of coordinating, managing, and investigating agencies there is one group which stands out for its clearness of purpose, its efficiency of operation, and its fearlessness. It is the Truman committee, the 10-man body formed in 1941 to investigate the progress of the war effort. For 3 years this Senate committee has been at the same time successfully trouble shooting the home-front administration and demonstrating the way a congressional committee can, and should, function.

It began in February 1941, when Senator HARRY S. TRUMAN, of Missouri, placed himself on record as particularly alarmed over the way defense contracts were being placed by the War and Navy Departments. Charging that favoritism and unfair practices govern the distribution of work on the Government's expanding war program, he called for an investigation. The next month he was installed at the head of a committee to take care of the matter.

Investigations by Senate committees were nothing new to the Capitol, and at first this one attracted little attention. Senator TRUMAN was assigned a number of freshman Senators and $15,000—a comparatively small amount of money for such an enterprise—and was promptly forgotten.

But it was not long before his committee began to make news. In August 1941 it issued a 98-page report prepared by TRUMAN himself with the aid of his chief counsel, Hugh A. Fulton. It outlined in well-authenticated detail the needless waste of $100,000,000 in the Army's billion-dollar-spending program. Then, attributing this waste to poor and inadequate planning, it proceeded to recommend more efficient practices.

Impressed by the thoroughness and logic of Senator TRUMAN's work, Army officials considered his recommendations. According to General Somervell, head of the Army Service Forces, which are responsible for most Army spending, the Truman inquiry resulted in Government savings of some $200,000,000.

Following this initial investigation, the Truman committee began to work on other aspects of the war program. Hundreds of people appeared to testify before it on such matters as rubber, aluminum, small business problems, and administrative practices in Government war agencies. In January 1942 Senator TRUMAN went to President Roosevelt with a new set of recommendations.

In surveying the work of agencies directing the war economy, the committee had found two major difficulties. One of them was red tape—the kind of inefficiency and confusion resulting from too many people trying to do the same thing without clearly defined powers and responsibilities. The other was the influence of dollar-a-year men. TRUMAN felt, on the basis of his investigations, that these officials, recruited from the biggest business interests in the country, were serving as lobbyists for their corporations and putting private interest before national interest. He recommended the appointment of one man to run the entire war program and also the end of the dollar-a-year man system.

One day later, Donald Nelson was appointed director of the Office of Production Management. Very shortly thereafter O. P. M. was liquidated in favor of the War Production Board, which largely conformed to specifications laid down in the Truman report.

Next the committee turned its attention to shortages of vital war materials. In the course of its study of the rubber and aluminum situations, it began attacking international cartels and their influence on American corporations.

Later other phases of the home-front effort were investigated with equal thoroughness. While the Truman committee has fallen far short of having all its recommendations adopted or all the abuses it pointed out corrected, it is conservatively estimated that its investigations have saved our Government close to a billion dollars.

What is responsible for this remarkable record? There is nothing unique in the make-up of the committee itself. Composed of six Democrats and four Republicans, it includes many young and relatively inexperienced legislators. Along with congressional oldsters—CONNALLY, of Texas, and JAMES MEAD, of New York—the committee is composed of such comparative newscomers as Senators WALLGREN, of Washington; FERGUSON, of Michigan; and BALL, of Minnesota. Other members are BURTON, of Ohio; KILGORE, of West Virginia; HATCH, of New Mexico; and BREWSTER, of Maine.

Nor is it to be found in the personality of Senator TRUMAN himself. Grayhaired, 50-year-old HARRY S. TRUMAN is much more a typical grassroots American legislator than an inspired leader. He does not pretend to have elaborate political theories or world-shaking plans. In his own estimation, he is "just a farmer who happens to be in the Senate."

In 1922, he was elected judge in the county court of Jackson, Mo. During the next few years, he studied law and worked with Tom Pendergast, the Democratic party boss of Kansas City. In 1930, as presiding judge of the Jackson County court, he was responsible for the construction of $60,000,000 worth of highways and public buildings in the county.

In 1934, with the help of the Pendergast machine, TRUMAN was elected to the United States Senate. Just before he came up for reelection, the Pendergast machine was broken as Pendergast himself was convicted of income-tax evasion. But TRUMAN'S reelection in 1940 demonstrated that he was a vote-getter in his own right rather than a pawn of the political organization in power.

The clearest reason for the Truman committee's profitable work of the last 3 years lies in its methods and its insistence upon expert staff help. The usual thing for a committee of this type to do is to appoint a lawyer for political reasons and build a staff of clerks and stenographers along with a few investigators borrowed from the different Government bureaus.

The Truman committee proceeded differently. Senator TRUMAN chose his counsel, Hugh Fulton, on the advice of the Justice Department and on the strength of Fulton's record with a highly successful New York commercial law firm. Then he hired three assistant attorneys—men with excellent legal records and no political connections. Six field investigators with long experience in fiscal affairs rounded out his staff. Today a few investigators with qualifications in particular fields have been added.

The committee's main working principle is cooperation. Although its members are of differing political parties, they work together harmoniously and have never been divided in their conclusions about an investigation. Each day they meet for a conference in the "dog house," a small office TRUMAN maintains. At these meetings current problems are discussed and plans made.

Some Truman committee investigations are started by the members themselves. Most, however, result from tips received outside. Plowing through the hundreds of letters it receives, the committee chooses its subjects for investigation from suggestions offered by people closer to the actual operation of the war program.

When evidence accumulates showing that a particular aspect of the war program should be studied, hearings are begun. Management of these is parceled out to the various members according to subject matter, as each man has his own specialty.

Businessmen, labor leaders, and Government officials are called to give testimony. After this has been presented, the committee members and their attorneys take over for a period of questioning. Then the results are discussed by the whole group, recommendations framed, reports issued.

Just as startling as the amounts of money Truman committee investigations have saved the Government is the small amount of funds on which the committee has operated itself. To save Uncle Sam a billion, the Truman committee has spent less than $200,000.

What Is the "Issue"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "What Is the 'Issue'?" which appeared yesterday in the New York Sun, written by George E. Sokolsky in the column entitled "These Days."

Perhaps I might clarify the matter by reading a couple of lines of the article to indicate the general tone and purpose, so to speak, or theme of the article by Mr. Sokolsky:

Wendell Willkie chases about the country demanding that Republicans discuss the "issue." I have read Mr. Willkie's public addresses, God help me, these 4 years and have yet to discover any "issue" in them except an insistence upon the preeminence of Wendell Willkie.

I ask that the entire article be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

WHAT IS THE "ISSUE"?

Wendell Willkie chases about the country demanding that Republicans discuss the "issue." I have read Mr. Willkie's public addresses, God help me, these 4 years and have yet to discover any "issue" in them except an insistence upon the preeminence of Wendell Willkie. For instance, the gentleman from Indiana is opposed to isolation. What is he for? Roughly, one gathers that he is for cooperation with Russia and China and England—in that order of significance. But cooperation among nations requires a mechanism, what the diplomats call a modus operandi. What kind does Mr. Willkie propose? He has been talking for 4 years on this subject but has made not a clear proposal yet. He complains that others are not facing the "issue." Is he?

On domestic questions, his outpouring is even more muddled. Each time I write an article calling attention to Willkie's plethora of words and poverty of ideas, I receive an enormous mail calling me names for questioning the man-god's perfections. Often I ask my complainant to state in clear, simple, printable English what exactly it is that Mr. Willkie proposes on a single issue. His followers end up by saying that he is the only Republican who can defeat Roosevelt. But is it necessary to defeat Roosevelt at such a cost?

Mr. Willkie has failed to indicate precisely how he would deal with a single domestic issue except taxes which he would raise beyond the people's ability to pay. He roughly doubled Roosevelt's figure—a figure so preposterous that Congress passed a bill over the President's veto and Senator Barkley delivered his famous oration of resignation. Beyond proposing an additional $16,000,000,000 tax, Willkie has limited his domestic discussion to the proposition that he can operate the Government more efficiently than Mr. Roosevelt and that all other Republican candidates, with special emphasis on Tom Dewey, just ain't no good.

Already Mr. Willkie has told off Harold Stassen and General MacArthur that they are soldiers and ought to stay out of politics altogether. In a word Willkie's single domestic issue is that he, Wendell Willkie, wants to be President and that anyone who opposes him or competes with him or so much as questions his wisdom, knowledge, or infallibility is just a plain, low-down bum.

In St. Louis Wendell Willkie was asked a series of questions so that he could explain in simple, understandable English what he believed about anything. Willkie refused to answer those questions; he insulted those who asked them. Let me, to remind you, repeat the first two questions:

"1. Do you believe that the United States should become a member of a world supranational state? If so,

"(a) Would it involve any limitation upon the sovereignty of the United States?

"(b) Would it mean that the Army, Navy, and Air Force of the United States and its technical equipment for war are to be placed under the control of the world state?

"(c) Would it mean that, except for domestic police purposes the United States is to have no independent military force of its own?

"2. If you favor a world state, what would you do about nations that refused to come in?

"(a) Force them in by military means?

"(b) Treat them as outlaws by not permitting them to trade with the members of the world state?

"(c) What other action would you favor?"

Let Willkie demand a discussion of the issue only after he has stated the issue in clear, positive language. He might answer a couple of these questions.

Members of House Want Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Baltimore Sun of March 27, 1944:

Secretary of State Hull must think with longing these days of that question-period proposal which is being backed in the House of Representatives by his fellow-Tennesseean, Representative ESTES KEFAUVER. What Mr. KEFAUVER wants is a regular time in the program of the House of Representatives when Cabinet members and heads of executive agencies can be invited to face questioning by the Members. Mr. KEFAUVER argues that this would help in many ways toward a more effective cogging together of the work of the executive and the legislative departments.

Certainly, such a provision in the rules of the House might well have saved Secretary Hull some time in the last few days. Remember that it was only last Friday that the Secretary entertained 24 freshmen Republican Members of the House at a conference on foreign policy that lasted 2 hours and 20 minutes. The meeting was private, but there have been press reports of what went on. The reports suggest that about all the relevant angles of foreign policy were discussed.

But now Mr. Hull faces still another questioning on foreign policy from a second group of first-term Republican Representatives. There are only 14 in this group, and they do not ask for a conference. But they do ask for answers to a series of questions submitted in writing. And we may be perfectly sure that many of the questions were raised in one form or another in the Friday conference. Thus, we may be sure that group 2 is asking Mr. Hull at many points to cover ground already covered for group 1.

Now, of course nobody wants to shield the departments and executive agencies from legislative questioning. But it is fair to protect their officers from the kind of time-wasting duplication of effort which Mr. Hull now seems to face. This was one of the main ideas behind Mr. KEFAUVER's plan. Under his plan, there would be a 2-hour question period at least every other week. Notice would be given to the Members as to the official to appear at that time. They would have a chance to get all their questions in order. The official would have a chance to answer all such questions with some hope that he wouldn't have to duplicate the performance almost at once. For all Members of the House would have their chance at hearing what was said.

It is true that some special matters involving secrecy or confidential relations could not be raised in a public question period. It is true, too, that the conference Mr. Hull has just had with group 1 of the Republican Representatives was closed apparently for this reason. So the question period might not obviate the need of conferences altogether.

But certainly it would go a long way toward cutting down the wear and tear on public officers. At the same time it would improve the information and the understanding of Members—all Members—of the House in the discharge of legislative business.

Half Million Barrels of Fuel Passes Through Big Inch Pipe Line Every 24 Hours

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. BUELL SNYDER
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting the interesting and thought-provoking address delivered by the president of War Emergency Pipelines, Inc., Mr. W. Alton Jones, at the dedication of these pipe lines March 24, 1944, at pipe-line pumping station No. 22, at Rockwood, Pa. His address follows:

Congressman SNYDER, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, everything in life, said a great philosopher, from marriage to manslaughter, depends on the speed and cost at which men, things, and thoughts can be shifted from one place to another.

Today we see the crucial problem of war is movement in all its forms. Getting there "fustest" is no idle phrase. Speed governs every effort on both battle and home fronts. It is a contest against time. In factory, it is to produce two guns to shoot where one shot before; in drafting room, it is to design a tank or plane that will move faster and farther; in air and on sea and on land, the contest is to move men and death-dealing devices to the front and at the front more rapidly than the enemy.

We witness today the harnessing of a fourth dimension in transport. Before our eyes are war materials flowing to the front, without the use of wheels or wings or ships.

Since the war started better than 10,000 miles of petroleum pipe line alone have been laid, reversed, or converted. This is more mileage than has been so involved for any similar period in the last decade, and includes individual lines of greater length and diameter than any in history.

The Big Inch and the Little Big Inch, which we inspect today, are in the last category. Their part in the war effort is well known to you. So, perhaps, I can best use your time and attention in sketching the high lights of the undertaking. When you have heard it, I believe that you will forgive a feeling of satisfaction on the part of those of us who got our heads bumped and our shins rapped in bulling the job through.

It was away back in July 1940—18 months before Pearl Harbor—that Secretary Ickes stated that the building of large pipe lines from Texas to the East might not be sound in peacetime, but they might be necessary in an emergency. In May 1941, a year later, representatives of 7 oil companies met in New York to consider the possibilities of 1 or more such lines. After careful consideration, they recommended the building of a 24-inch crude-oil line, with capacity of 250,000 barrels daily. They appointed an engineering subcommittee; and they sent out reconnaissance crews to make surveys and recommend a route. It looked at that time—mid-May 1941—as though a big pipe line was well on the way toward becoming a fact. But it wasn't. A difference of opinion developed within the industry as to the relative value of pipe lines as against ocean tankers. There was also difference of opinion as to whether the proposed line should be a crude-oil line or a petroleum-products line.

But, a little later, representatives of 11 companies, meeting with Secretary Ickes, agreed to build a 24-inch crude-oil line from Texas to New York and Philadelphia, at their own expense. Your speaker was chosen as chairman of a committee to see the thing through, and, in an unguarded moment, I accepted the assignment. I give you my word that I had no idea what I was letting myself in for, but if my hair has become a little grayer and a little sparser, you will understand why.

One of the first jobs, of course, was to try to get the steel and other materials and equipment allocated. So, Secretary Ickes and representatives of the oil industry went to the agency then in charge of such matters—the Supply Priorities and Allocations Board. The answer was "no." But, Mr. Ickes is not a fellow who will be stopped by just one "no", so he went back again a few weeks later and asked again for the material. Again the answer was "no".

Then, the Supply, Priorities, and Allocations Board was superseded by the War Production Board, so Mr. Ickes had the the opportunity for a fresh start. He made it—with the industry representatives supporting his appeal. Another "no" was produced, but we kept plugging. There were meetings and meetings and meetings, and, on June 10, 1942, the W. P. B. approved the allocation of enough steel to build the first section of the Big Inch from Longview, Tex., to Norris City, Ill. Previously, the Honorable Jesse H. Jones had removed the other major obstacle by agreeing that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would now finance the job, for changed conditions had made it inadvisable for the industry to finance the line.

Well, ladies and gentlemen, that was all we needed to start rolling up the mountain—or, more accurately, rolling up the plains of the Southwest. The job that has been done since that June day in 1942, when W. P. B. flashed the green light, is one in which, I must frankly confess, everybody concerned feels just a little pride. In case this doesn't sound very modest on my part, let me hasten to add that I claim very little credit for myself. The real credit goes to the steel-company workmen who turned out the huge pipe with almost unbelievable speed, the train crews who speeded it to the unloading points, and the five-star pipe-liners who dug the ditch and laid the pipe.

I wish that it might be possible to give specific recognition to every one of the thousands of men who built these two pipe lines, over country that would discourage an army mule and through weather that would depress an Eskimo. Obviously, there is not time to do this, as to mention by name all of those who have so ably and unselfishly contributed to the successful building and operation of the Big Inch lines would practically entail a roll call of who's who in the oil pipeline industry. However, I must not omit the name of the man who directed, through 2 grueling years, the spectacular race against time and the elements in completing these projects so that the old slogan of too little and too late would have no place in the history of these pipe lines. That man, ladies and gentlemen, is Burt Hull, vice president and general manager of War Emergency Pipelines, Inc.—(Burt, will you take a bow?). Also present are two vice presidents of the company—capable assistants who have shared Mr. Hull's burdens. I would like you to know these men—Major Horne and Charles I. Thompson. A third, Mr. J. M. Williams, is unable to be present as he is in Beaumont, Tex., devoting his personal attention to smoothing out operations of the Little Big Inch.

We must not forget, in our tribute to the builders, the men who made the blueprints, the men who worked out the plan. They did the surveying, they staked their reputation on the choice of design and route, they saw in advance and put on paper the plan of the longest and largest pipe lines in the world.

To mention this work, one must mention Cap Finney and his associates who not only took a leading part during the planning stage, but, followed through in the solution of problems during the construction and testing periods.

There is another contribution. Eleven oil companies are stockholders of War Emergency Pipelines, Inc. They have shown throughout a most admirable spirit. They have provided trained personnel from their own staffs, often at considerable inconvenience and sacrifice to their own welfare. They did this in order that the best talent might be available in discharging the obligation to provide our fighting forces and war industries with the products of petroleum, one of the most essential tools in realizing the victory which, I hope, will soon be ours. The fact that this obligation is so well discharged should be a source of gratification to the petroleum industry, and, indeed, to the Nation.

In exactly 29 days after W. P. B. had given its approval for materials, the first pipe rolled from the Lorain, Ohio, mill of the National Tube Co. Nine days after that, the first trainload of pipe line started on its way south. Sixteen days after that, actual construction work on the pipe line was under way. And, on the last day of 1942—just 150 days from the start of construction—the first oil was pumped into the line at Longview, Tex.

Ladies and gentlemen, I think you will agree that that was laying pipe.

But meanwhile other things had been happening. From the time that we got approval for the first leg of the line we knew that, while half a line was better than none, we really needed the whole thing. So not long after the line to Norris City was started the whole Petroleum Administration and the industry began pleading for steel and equipment to extend it to the east coast. On October 26, 1942, the War Production Board approved the extension.

But even then we were not satisfied. With Secretary Ickes, we were convinced that the enormous requirements of the military and the essential requirements of civilians were going to call for still another line. So we began again to make nuisances of ourselves at the War Production Board, and, to spare you the detailed account, we got approval for the first section of the 20-inch products line on January 26, 1943, and approval for the second section a little more than 2 months later.

Today we are here inspecting the completed lines. Even with me, looking at the finished job, there is now a tendency to forget that it didn't just happen. With those of you who had the good fortune to escape the pains of gestation and labor, I feel rather sure that there are no thoughts of what lies behind these two great lines. But please believe me, my friends, there were more times than one when the planning and the building of the Big Inch could have been accurately classified as the Big Pain.

The saving part of it is that the lines are proving themselves to be worth more than all the tribulations that attended their creation.

And, so, in addition to enjoying this opportunity to join with Congressman SNYDER in looking over the pipe lines and the pump stations, in addition to appreciating the chance to join with you in these ceremonies, and to meet and know you, I also am grateful for the chance to get out here on the line and see again the actual operations of these all-important projects. Certainly it is not necessary for me to call attention to the significance of these pipe lines in the war program. But I feel that you share with me the feeling that there is something of a thrill in the knowledge that the very oil that is flowing through these lines that we are viewing today is on its way to war. It is, in fact, the oil which, within a matter of days, will be powering airplanes over Germany, and propelling tanks across Italy, and—yes, fueling the very ships that take those instruments of war across the seas to the battle fronts. It is a fact, which I know that you appreciate, that in transforming Big Inch and Little Big Inch from dream to reality, the oil industry and the Government, working as partners, have made a major contribution to the speeding of victory and the shortening of the war. Thank you.

The Biggest War Port

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the New York Sun of March 28. We from New York are, of course, proud of the important part that port has played during the present period. Mentioning the port of New York prompts me also to call to the attention of the House the fact that in Brooklyn, N. Y., there is located the New York Port of Embarkation, one of the largest, if not the largest, such ports in the country. It is most efficiently run, and I should like to pay my respects to its personnel and to the Army Transportation Corps, under whose jurisdiction it comes, the chief of which corps, Maj. Gen. Charles P. Gross, is well recognized as an expert in the field of transportation.

The editorial is as follows:

THE BIGGEST WAR PORT

Those whose offices, homes, or routes of travel between the two, afford them a glimpse of New York Harbor are aware that it is a busy place these days. They may not have realized, however, that its activities have expanded to the point where Rear Admiral Stanley V. Parker, who commands the Coast Guard in this area, describes this as the greatest wartime port in the world. In his capacity as captain of the port, Admiral Parker says that its present volume of men and goods is twice that of the pre-war peak of 1926.

Declaring "We've never seen anything like it" the Admiral says that men and supplies are flowing here from all over the country, being loaded upon waiting ships and sent to sea like clockwork. He pays high tribute to the way the city, the pier owners, and especially the water-front workers have combined to make this possible. He gives special credit to the longshoremen, observing, "Labor is peaceful and splendidly efficient on our water front." And he furnishes to New Yorkers a special cause for gratification by concluding "The story of New York's water front in wartime is one of which the whole Nation can be proud." It is another example of what real teamwork can do.

The Relation of National Sovereignty to the Framing of the Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Relation of National Sovereignty to the Framing of the Peace", which I delivered before a citizens-for-victory luncheon at New York on September 24, 1943.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, fellow Americans, what is our main purpose in the framing of the peace? I believe it is the same purpose for which we went to war—that this country and its people may enjoy peace in the days to come, so that they may be left free to work out the happiness of the American people and the destiny of the American Republic. We went to war to make clear that national aggression cannot succeed in this world; to punish the aggression which has occurred and discourage aggression in the future. We went to war to prove that so far as the American Republic is affected, might in this world will not make right. I do not believe that we went to war to establish the "four freedoms" or any other freedoms throughout the world, except as such a world condition might result from the insuring of our own liberty through victory over the despotic aggressor nations. Our purpose in framing the peace must be to carry out the purposes of the war—to insure safety to our own people by preventing aggression in the future and the renewed tragedy of world war.

When we sit down around the council table to work out arrangements for that end, we are met at once by this question of national sovereignty. By some it is used as an argument against any covenants which will bind nations in advance to courses of action to be taken in the future. By others it is regarded as a mere bugbear, which can be waived aside and disregarded as an anachronism in a bright new world.

I don't propose to search for a correct definition of national sovereignty. The philosophers, from Aristotle to Kant, have argued on the nature of sovereignty, and lengthy volumes only leave the reader in greater confusion. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the popular view that a sovereign nation is one which runs its own affairs without interference from the outside.

I don't believe any modification of sovereignty is involved by covenants with other sovereign nations, unless the covenant gives those nations some right to come into our country and give orders to our citizens. I don't believe we are any less a sovereign Nation because we agree to submit disputes with other nations to arbitration or to a world court. I don't believe we are any less a soverign Nation if we agree to use our armies, navies, and air forces under certain circumstances to prevent world aggression. Since we remain a sovereign Nation in full control of our own country and our armed forces, we have power to break our promises, but we cannot honorably do so and we do not intend to do so.

On the other hand, to the extent that we give anyone the right to interfere in our domestic affairs, to enter our country, or compel our citizens to obey orders other than those of our own Government, there is an infringement of sovereignty. If that infringement is not material, we remain a sovereign Nation in spite of waiving some small part of our sovereignty. On the other hand, if we join an international state, and give that state direct power over our citizens, as for instance in the control of our seaports and airports, I believe we are no longer a sovereign Nation. The best view today is that while we call our 48 States sovereign States, they are not in fact sovereign, but only exercise some part of the national sovereignty which is assigned to them by the people of the United States of America.

In my opinion the permanent success of any peace depends upon this Nation and other nations retaining their sovereignty as I have defined it. A world set-up which gives to the citizens of one nation the right to interfere with the internal affairs of other nations would do two things: First, it would take away from our people the very freedom which is the object of permanent peace; second, it would be more likely to cause wars than to prevent them. The Republican Conference at Mackinac approved "participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations." Secretary Hull's speech of September 12 supports "organized international cooperation" between independent nations, each nation free to decide for itself the forms and details of its governmental organization and of its internal economic and social organization.

I am convinced that only by retaining sovereignty can we retain democracy. True democracy depends on local self-government, protected in this country by our independent States, and effective access of the people to their central government, so that the will of the majority does in fact prevail as to both local and national issues. Sometimes I question whether the United States has not reached the limit of size under which the people of a nation can have a real voice in its government. Certainly a world government at Geneva or Panama would listen more closely to the voice of cranks and pressure groups than to the voice of the majority of the American people. It is significant that the British Empire, because of its size, in order to maintain democracy, has moved towards decentralization of government, and has today no over-all legislative body, no over-all executive, and no over-all police force. If Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa and Eire are regarded as too diverse to be consolidated into one government, what about China, Japan, Russia, and Ethiopia?

The very purpose of peace is to assure freedom to the people of this country. We do not have this freedom if a majority of alien peoples can direct our internal affairs. We know how our people would resent it if some foreign majority told us what we could import and what we could export, how we should handle our Japanese problem or our difficult Negro problem, or how we should operate our merchant marine. If we aren't willing to permit foreign interference, we can be sure that every other people will harbor the same resentment. We should not insist on interference with the internal affairs of other peoples in any field in which our people are unwilling to allow foreign interference here. If we wish peace, we must learn to treat with tolerance conditions and ideologies which we may not understand or sympathize with. I seem to see a tendency, especially among our New Deal friends, to make plans for the world as they made plans for us poor Americans. We can't crusade throughout the world for the four freedoms, or force milk on people who don't like milk, without making ourselves thoroughly hated. We can't force on the Russians freedom of speech and freedom of religion if Mr. Stalin doesn't approve of them, as apparently he doesn't. We can't force independence on India except as the British see fit to arrange it. We can be helpful throughout the world, but we can't be a meddlesome Mattie or try to boss the boots off the world if we expect to avoid war in the future.

In short, the maintenance of national sovereignty as I have defined it is essential to peace itself, and to the freedom of our people, which is the very object of peace. I believe this clearly rules out the international state of Clarence Streit and Harold Stassen. I believe their idea is fantastic anyway, and that such a state, with a supreme legislature, executive, and all-powerful military force, able to dominate all nations and control all trade, all seaports, and all airports within the various nations, would fall to pieces within 5 years, the very moment it adopted some policy unsatisfactory to a substantial minority. The difficulty of holding together such a Tower of Babel under one government would be insuperable. Furthermore, from a practical standpoint, I don't believe the English people, the Russian people, or the American people would agree for a moment to submit themselves to an all-powerful international state, the control of which would rest in a majority bloc of member nations, the composition of which bloc in the years to come would be impossible to predict. If you can see Winston Churchill liquidating the British Fleet, or Joe Stalin dismissing the Russian Army, or either of them turning over their forces to President Whoozis of Worlditania, you are more clairvoyant than I.

On the other hand, I have stated before that I believe the sovereign nations should sit down together and enter into very definite agreements as to their future action in preventing world war. The United States in the past has pursued, not an isolationist policy as often charged, but a policy of retaining complete freedom of action to deal with any situation which might arise. That policy, after all, has succeeded, because we have retained our national liberty, and have not been invaded for 130 years. It is not a policy to be lightly dismissed. But because of the development of modern weapons of war, I believe we should go further. The day may come, if it is not already here, when any war may bring overwhelming destruction to this country; even if it does not deprive us of liberty. Therefore it is far more important to us today to prevent any war beginning in Europe or Asia. If we can prevent aggression by making definite commitments beforehand, I believe we should do so, and I do not see any loss of national sovereignty in doing so. If we can establish an organization based on national freedom throughout the world and national economic independence, I believe we should agree, under specified circumstances, to use our armed forces to prevent aggression, even though the determination of the fact of such aggression is left to an international body in which we are a minority member. Such an association of sovereign nations is the kind suggested by the Atlantic Charter, by Secretary Hull's speech, and by the Mackinac resolution.

Involved in this policy there is one modification of sovereignty which I should be willing to make. Such an association as I have outlined must prevent an armament race by nations and by alliances, or in time it will fail. It must undoubtedly seek a reduction of armaments and a limitation of armaments, imposed upon the Axis nations and voluntarily agreed to by the other nation. If we are going to use force against aggressors, we cannot permit any nation to build up a tremendous army, navy, or air force which might make aggression successful. I believe we should be willing as part of a general plan to agree to limit our own armament; and should be willing to permit an international body to inspect our armed forces just as they inspect the armed forces of Germany or Japan, to see that there is no violation of treaty obligations. We should be willing to have the construction and maintenance of excess armament as itself an act of aggression. The limitation of armaments would, of course, have to be the subject of a voluntary treaty in the first instance.

One of the proposals now made to maintain peace is a British-American military alliance, with or without Russia. Of course such an alliance would not modify our national sovereignty as I have defined it, even if we agreed under certain circumstances to go to war in the defense of Great Britain. On the other hand, the theory as advanced is certainly destructive of national sovereignty in the world. The alliance is to be so strong that it can never be successfully attacked. Since by hypothesis it is to be stronger than any possible opposition, it will have at least a benevolent control over the entire world. Fundamentally this is imperialism. Our fingers will be in every pie. Our military forces will work with our commercial forces to obtain as much world trade as we can lay our hands on. Potential power over other nations, however benevolent its purpose, leads inevitably to imperialism.

Technically such power may not destroy the national sovereignty of the rest of the world, but as a practical matter it does just that. The destruction of national sovereignty in the rest of the world is just as likely to lead to war as an attack upon it in this country. The determination of the human race to secure freedom will inevitably lead to a counter alliance and ultimately to another world war. It is a continuation of the old policy of balance of power, which certainly had no great success in preventing war. There are plenty of other reasons for opposing a British-American alliance as a solution of the peace, but basically it is inconsistent with a world based upon the sovereignty of independent nations.

It is amusing to me to see so many advocates of an international state, as well as those who believed in an association of free nations in a free world, suddenly abandoning all those ideals to adopt a policy which proposes a peace maintained by the armed forces of America, England, and Russia. It is utterly inconsistent both with the ideals of Woodrow Wilson and with Secretary Hull's "system of international relations, based on rules of morality, law, and justice."

In conclusion, I believe our thoughts are rather confused than clarified by the use of the term "sovereignty." What we mean is that nations must remain free if the world is to remain at peace. It is not inconsistent with freedom to go forward with an organization in which we unite to prevent and destroy the aggressor who would attack that freedom.

American Conscience at Its Best

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article taken from the New York Herald Tribune of today entitled "American Conscience at Its Best."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN CONSCIENCE AT ITS BEST—CONFESSION

(By Malvina Lindsay)

Yes, I feel guilty and sad every time I read a headline, "Bombers strike Berlin." I feel sick at soul every time I look at a photograph of a bomber crew—the fresh, boyish faces of those fated to be death's emissaries. And I think of myself as very humane and wonder if German citizens were as noble and compassionate when their young men were dropping death on Antwerp, Coventry, London.

But I feel less ashamed when I face my guilt forthrightly, and realize that in it I am trying in an easy, weak, and sentimental way to square myself with my conscience. I feel more honest when I admit that what is really preying upon me is my part in letting this incredible war with its blood and bombs happen. The truth is that I feel the cumulative guilt of 10 years upon me, 10 blind and selfish years, from Mukden to Pearl Harbor, during which I escaped into my own little concerns, vaguely hoping somebody would do something to quench the smoldering embers of war.

I remember Manchuria. Did I write a letter or even lift my voice when Secretary Stimson fought alone without support in his own Nation or in the League of Nations to invoke international justice for China? No, better patch it up. Don't let's arouse Japan. Might lead to trouble. Besides, that was the year of Rudy Vallee, Ben Bernie, the Eugenie hat, another drop in business.

I remember Austria, the murder of Dolfuss, Hitler and his blood purges, the growing power of the Nazis, the constant warnings of returned Americans about the European powder keg. Did I arouse myself, or my neighbors, to the implications of these things? No; I was only one. What could one do? Besides I was so busy, so rushed, so behind in my work. Why those were the hectic years of the early New Deal, the Chicago World's Fair (and Sally Rand), the Dionne Quints, Shirley Temple.

I remember Ethiopia—its rape by Mussolini. Did I protest because my country refused to collaborate in the League's sanctions against Italy? Did I bother to realize the import of Haile Selassie's dramatic prophecy to the League when it failed him: "God and history will remember your decision"? No; that was none of my—none of America's business. Were we not all busy with sit-down strikes. "Gone With the Wind," the suntan craze, the news about Edward and Wally?

I remember Spain—the try-out of the Axis war machine, the death of the republic, the secret beginning of World War No. 2. Did I write Congress about the Embargo Act, which prevented the Spanish Government from buying arms to fight the first round against Hitler and Mussolini? No; a ticklish situation. Better leave it alone. What was that the papers were saying about the long-hair bob, the Big Apple, The Women, the glamour craze?

I remember Munich—those tense September days when war hovered so near. Did I cry aloud over the sell-out of Czechoslovakia? Yes, but feebly. After all, peace any peace, might be better than none. "Peace in our time" * * * and maybe "they" could do something a little later. The leaves were turning—a good time for motoring. America was safe (for a while) to take vitamins, see Snow White and Hedy Lamarr, plan for Thanksgiving.

I remember China—devastated by the Japanese by the aid of the American Neutrality Act. I remember the Nazi blitz in Poland; the Quislings in Norway, Holland, Belgium; the crumbling of France; the radio blaring out on a quiet Sunday afternoon the attack on Pearl Harbor.

I remember all these, and it is for them I carry the load of guilt. Yet, you ask, What could I have done? How can I be such an egomaniac as to imagine that what I might have done would have mattered? Yes; I know that what I could or would have done seems trifling, useless, even hysterical to you. It might perhaps, from your viewpoint, have been the wrong thing. I also know that wars may be "inevitable," or that the most we can hope for between them is a "longer truce"—this side of the next 500 years. I know this torrent of blood could not have been dammed by me, possibly not by 130,000,000 people. Yet, if I saw it all again stretching ahead, would I not be on every soap box sending letters in every mail to Congress?

The whole point is that I didn't try to do anything. I was passive, futile, negative. I shirked. I cheated as a citizen. Therefore, can I expect to escape my share in the soul searing that bombings bring? Can I expect to find peace until I expiate the most inglorious of failure—that which knows no striving?

The Roosevelt Judges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the March 27, 1944, issue of Pathfinder:

THE ROOSEVELT JUDGES

This is as good a time as any to ask two questions involving the caliber and fitness of the 185 judges and justices appointed to the Federal courts since 1932. There has been considerable gossip during the past 6 months about the growing dissension and acidulous language between the nine Justices of the Supreme Court. Then, a few weeks ago, word began to get around that Randolph Paul, the "pinkish" General Counsel of the Treasury Department, will probably be appointed to fill an expected vacancy on the bench for the southern district of New York. Finally, an unidentified young woman pinched a Congressman's backside during a tea party at the British Embassy the other day. She apologized, hurriedly. "I thought," she said, "you were a friend of mine in the Supreme Court."

These are three incidents in a nation's history. They are, you might say, exceedingly trivial stuff. In one way, yes. But look at them again. Federal judges are appointed for life. In their hands rest the decisions that rule our civil liberties. They are the senior guardians of national justice and law, and the official interpreters of the Constitution.

What kind of men has President Roosevelt appointed to the Federal bench? The question is vital, for no other President ever appointed so many. To the United Supreme Court he has named 7 out of 9 members; to the 56 circuit courts of appeal he has appointed 38 judges, and to the district courts he has named 140 out of 224. Of all the Federal judges, he has chosen about 65 percent. Many of them were appointed because of political favor. Many are political candidates who failed to win public elections. There is no secret in the fact that the President expects "personal loyalty" from all of them.

Charles W. Smith, Jr., associate professor of political science, University of Kentucky, declared in the Kentucky Law Journal of May 1943 that Roosevelt's appointments to the Supreme Court "have been made with an eye on political considerations and on the social and economic views of the men appointed," and he pointed out that only one, Rutledge, had ever had any previous experience as judge of an important court. When in June 1936 the President appointed two Federal judges in New York to fill newly created positions, the independent New York Times identified them as supporters of "two local political bosses" and remarked, "It is painful to have to record that the President has again treated important appointments to the Federal courts as if they were ordinary partisan spoils." The city and county bar associations also made strong protests.

The assertion that the President "has viewed the courts as merely one part of the administrative machinery" was strikingly demonstrated in his Court-packing effort of 1937 when he proposed to add to the Supreme Court six new judges who would allegedly move it out of its "horse and buggy" ways and make it a "puller" instead of a "balker" in the "three-horse team" of the Government branches. "We must take action," he said then, "to save the Constitution from the courts," although he was also on record as saying that the Constitution was incomplete and always had been, "through which a team and horses can be driven on every page."

In its final report on the Court-packing bill, the Senate Judiciary Committee declared it "an invasion of the judicial power such as has never before been attempted in this country," that it was a "proposal without precedent and without justification," and should be "so emphatically rejected that its parallel will never again be presented to the free representatives of the free American people."

Bottom in the President's court appointments was reached, according to Professor Smith, when he sent to the Senate in July 1942 the name of Thomas F. Meaney as district judge in New Jersey—a man whom Governor Edison dubbed "a pawn in the hands of the boss of Jersey City [Frank Hague]."

Such appointments naturally affect the tone and quality of our courts and the character of our Government. They, too, reach down through our traditions to the constitutional roots of the Republic. The Constitution defines the powers of the judiciary and, at the same time, appoints each generation of the judiciary to its council of guardians. As the New York Times so wisely said, "Those having the power to appoint [Federal judges] ought to be more than usually scrupulous and painstaking in leaving nothing undone which may redound to the repute and reverence in which the Federal judiciary ought to be held by the people."

Now, again, comes the rumor of Randolph Paul's coming appointment. And that rumor has not been denied.

In view of the record, one question might well be asked Mr. Roosevelt. It would be asked, not as an insult, not as a political move but humbly and sincerely in the interests of the American Republic, and the Republic's future. The question would be, "If you do not hold our courts and our Constitution in contempt, Mr. President, what is your attitude?"

Ceiling Prices on Fresh Fruits and Vegetables

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID J. WARD

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Mr. S. H. Rayner, Rayner Bros., growers of perishable fruits and vegetables, Salisbury, Md., who has made a thorough study of the effect of O. P. A. ceiling prices on fresh fruits and vegetables.

In my opinion, the O. P. A., before placing ceilings this year on perishable fruits and vegetables, should give the situation, as set forth in this statement, the most serious consideration:

It has now been clearly demonstrated to all, with unbiased prospectus, that O. P. A. ceiling prices on fresh fruits and vegetables only result in one of two extremes—serious scarcity and a flourishing black market or glutted conditions with serious waste of foods which should not and cannot be tolerated during this emergency. This may seem a broad statement; however, it has been proven true during the past year and is still true at this time.

In 1943, comparatively high ceiling prices were established for white potatoes. The acreage planted was so great that many thousands of bushels were purchased under the support program and has been so widely publicized in the newspapers, a very large quantity of these spoiled in transit and in storage, and were a total loss to the consumer. There are still more Irish potatoes in storage than can possibly be consumed before the new crop comes in, and, under such conditions, it must be expected that the growers will reduce their potato acreage drastically, which will, in turn, result in a serious shortage of this most important vegetable by 1945.

With onions the case was the reverse. Low ceilings discouraged planting, and as a result one of the most flagrant violations of Federal regulations followed. The legitimate retailer could not buy onions at anywhere near the ceiling price established by O. P. A. For practical purposes, as far as the average consumer was concerned, there were no onions. Had supply and demand alone, without artificial interference, held full play, there would have been sufficient potatoes and onions for all, and the cost to the consumer would have averaged much lower than has been the case, and the Nation, too, would have been assured a continued normal and adequate supply of these two important foods.

Another very serious problem confronting the Nation is the supply of strawberries, which, due to weather and economic conditions are now at the lowest point in many years. For example—the 10-year average acreage for the State of Florida was 10,000 acres, but for the harvest of 1944 there are 1,300 acres. In Maryland, the condition is almost as bad; with normal 10-year average acreage of 6,800 acres, there is now reported for harvest in 1944 in this State 2,800 acres. Of this amount, approximately 2,000 acres are from old beds, planted in 1941–42. Reasonably high prices which return the grower a decent profit on this desirable crop would soon return the national acreage to normal, but in spite of this deplorable condition, I understand that O. P. A. will issue price-ceiling regulations on strawberries during this week.

With the small acreage and poor condition of the strawberry beds of the country today, due to the very unfavorable weather in the strawberry section of the country last year, we can hope, at best, for only a very, very few berries, and regardless of the price ceiling placed by O. P. A. there will not be nearly sufficient fruit to go around. We understand that ceiling prices were established at the request of the Army, so that sufficient fruits could be diverted for canning and processing. However, this approach to the problem is comparable to that of the Mother Goose fable of "killing the goose that laid the golden egg." Without normal expectations and liberal cooperation to the growers, it is not to much to be expected that the strawberry industry of the United States will be wiped out entirely.

Even now, cabbage, spinach, carrots, and numerous other winter vegetables are spoiling in the fields because the wholesale market price is too low to cover harvesting, packaging, and transportation costs. These same crops were scarce last year and sold at abnormally high prices. One of the important reasons for this great waste can be placed squarely at the door of O. P. A. in its regulations governing retail ceilings, which base the retailers' current price upon his wholesale purchases made the preceding week.

Upon such regulations, with the rapid increase and decrease in supplies of these perishable commodities, the retailer cannot afford to lower his price, as, should he do so, and the wholesale market advanced rapidly, he would be forced to operate for 1 full week with a higher wholesale cost than his retail ceiling price, and with the shortage of manpower and equipment, under which all retailers now operate, there is no incentive for them to increase their volume at a lower unit markup, as they are not in a position to take advantage of volume sales. The natural outcome of this is consistently high retail prices to the consumer and those crops in large supply, back up in the wholesale outlets and finally, on the farm. This was established beyond dispute in the necessity of the Pennsylvania Railroad embargo on shipments of fresh fruits and vegetables into the Philadelphia area last month; there were more than 400 cars of such commodities on track and arrivals averaging about 90 cars per day.

At a meeting before Mr. Harry Gindick, O. P. A. fresh fruit and vegetable branch, in New York, Saturday, March 25, Mr. Gindick stated that O. P. A. had neither expected, nor anticipated that it were possible for such over supplies of perishable fresh fruits and vegetables to be produced as are in evidence now. Therefore, it is clear in the interest of lower average costs to the consumer of fresh fruits and vegetables, of continued and balanced adequate supplies, and also to maintain high total production, these perishable commodities must be immediately removed from price control.

The millions of producers, the varied methods of harvesting, packaging, transporting and distributing, make ceiling prices impossible of inforcement. With the widely varied production costs between producing areas, regulations cannot be set up which do not contain many and varied inequities.

The normal variation in prices proves to be absolutely necessary to get proper distribution between seasons of the extremes of light and heavy production; for example, snap beans often sell from a high of $6 to $7 to a low of 25 to 30 cents within a period of a week to 10 days, and yet the weighted average return to the producer in such instances is scarcely cost of production. Under such conditions, to avoid waste of foods, supply and demand must be left unrestricted.

During 1943, the supply of fruits was very short, in fact, one of the shortest on record, which was due entirely to frost injury. Prices were high, and yet the industry as a whole operated at a very heavy loss. As a result of this 1 year's rest to the orchards, a very heavy crop must be expected, and is predicted for 1944, and to avoid waste of this prospective bumper crop, low consumer prices will be necessary, but under price control, retail prices will not fluctuate rapidly enough to stimulate necessary consumption. Therefore, at a time when consumers would normally be able to purchase an abundance of fresh fruit at nominal prices, if ceilings continue in effect, there will be only artificially maintained consumers' prices and heavy loss of fruit in the orchards.

The facts here set forth give clear indications that the Nation, the armed forces, the producer, and the consumer will not be relieved from the fear of food shortage and possible famine until price-ceiling regulations on perishable fresh fruits and vegetables have been entirely abandoned.

Labor for Victory Broadcast

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT RAMSPECK

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I have before me a letter addressed to Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, majority leader, from the chairman of the national legislative committee of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. W. C. Hushing. I wish to read three paragraphs from the letter:

For a considerable period of time we have participated every other Sunday in the Labor for Victory program over the N. B. C. networks.

In furtherance of its nonpartisan political policy the American Federation of Labor will feature on its April 2 Labor for Victory broadcast at 1:15 p. m. appeals for the labor vote from spokesmen designated by the Democratic and Republican National Committees.

Representative GERALD W. LANDIS, of Indiana, will tell why, in his opinion, workers should vote Republican next November. Representative MICHAEL J. BRADLEY, of Pennsylvania, will give the reasons why he believes workers should vote Democratic.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Hushing, of the American Federation of Labor, also called this matter to my attention. I join with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] in urging that all of the Members listen to this broadcast if it is possible for them to do so. I also at this time want to express my approval of the expression of the American Federation of Labor, regarding its traditional nonpartisan policy.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman. I think it will be interesting to all of us.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I certainly want to congratulate the American Federation of Labor for the contrast in its attitude with that of Sidney Hillman, of the C. I. O., who is raising money to try to defeat Members of Congress whom he cannot dominate.

The letter referred to follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1944.

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
Majority Leader,
United States Capitol Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JOHN: Numerous high-ranking Members of Congress of both political parties have made inquiry as to the political attitude of the American Federation of Labor. I have explained to them that for many years the policy of the American Federation of Labor has been nonpartisan and that this policy will be strictly adhered to in the coming campaign and election by order of our last convention which was held in Boston. We endorse our friends or oppose others on the records they make, regardless of their political affiliations.

For a considerable period of time we have participated every other Sunday in the Labor for Victory program over the N. B. C. network.

In furtherance of its nonpartisan political policy the American Federation of Labor will feature on its April 2 Labor for Victory broadcast at 1:15 p. m. appeals for the labor vote from spokesmen designated by the Democratic and Republican National Committees.

Representive GERALD W. LANDIS, of Indiana, will tell why, in his opinion, workers should vote Republican next November. Representative MICHAEL J. BRADLEY, of Pennsylvania, will give the reasons why he believes workers should vote Democratic.

Our Weekly News Service of even date will carry a notice regarding the scheduled broadcast, but as most Members of Congress will probably be on trains or planes on their way home when it is issued I thought it would be a good idea if an announcement of the foregoing be made on the floor, and if you agree with this thought I should be very glad to have you make it.

I know—as I keep the records of Members of Congress and prepare letters of endorsement for President Green's signature—that the nonpartisan political policy of the American Federation of Labor is honestly and fairly administered, and I believe that the inauguration of the series of broadcasts next Sunday will emphasize our fairness, as the plan permits each national political committe to select its spokesman and present its case on our time.

With kindest regards and best wishes,
Sincerely yours,

W. C. HUSHING,
Chairman, National Legislative Committee, American Federation of Labor.

Heroism of Edward O'Brien and Other Seabees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am presenting a news article recently sent me through the thoughtfulness of Vice Admiral Ben Moreell, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which describes the heroism of Edward O'Brien, a Massachusetts boy, 19 years of age, who is with the Seabees of the Navy.

On one occasion this young man organized 10 other noncombatant Seabees and killed 320 Japs, holding the fort alone for 5 hours against what the writer describes as a "fanatical Nipponese attack."

The article in commendation of the heroic deeds of the Seabees also illustrates the glorious record being made by the Seabees of the Navy in the war in the Pacific.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEN-MAN PATROL KILLS 320 JAPS

(By Lee Van Atta)

WITH AMERICAN FORCES ON LOS NEGROS ISLAND, March 6.—Edward O'Brien, 19, is a blue-eyed, blond youngster from Massachusetts.

He was a carefree high-school student 18 months ago.

Today he is bleary-eyed, gaunt, fighting mad—and a hero.

Three nights ago, Ed. O'Brien killed 16 Japs single-handed. Then, at the height of a Jap attack against the western side of the captured Momote Airfield, O'Brien organized a patrol of 10 other noncombatant Seabees and went out for Jap blood.

KILLED 320 JAPS

There were 320 dead sons of Japan when dawn illumined the scarred battle scene, where O'Brien and his companions had held the fort alone for 5 hours against fanatical Nipponese attacks.

That terrible night of hand-to-hand war, O'Brien's .30-caliber machine gun blew up in his hands and his best friend was killed by his side.

But O'Brien came out unscratched—came out to find himself a fighting legend.

He told his story to me today on the edge of the Momote airstrip.

It was dusk that Saturday evening when O'Brien's commanding officer assigned the young Irishman and his companions to stand guard over secondary positions.

POSED AS AMERICANS

"But jeez, that was no place for us," O'Brien explained. "So Bill Driskell, of San Jose, Calif., and I pulled stakes and so did my friend. Driskell and I got back but the kid didn't. It was about 2:30 in the morning when the Japs started coming in. They were yelling, 'Don't shoot, we're Americans'—and because we knew the cavalry boys up ahead were having plenty of trouble we believed 'em.

"Then one got in the dugout we'd taken over—and from then on we knew it was nobody but our little Nip friends.

"The kid and I started firing. We told Driskell to try to get back and tell the rest what was going on.

"I never knew there were so damned many Japs in the world—they just started coming and never stopped—I just kept firing as fast as I could.

"We kept weaving our firing back and forth. You could hear those Nips screaming. It was enough to curdle your blood.

"Then they got the kid—right through the heart. My '30' blew up in my hands.

"I got hold of the fixed '50' and kept firing—I think I was more mad than scared."

O'Brien paused to wipe perspiration from his brow and Driskell took up the story.

"I got back to the secondary position and found 'Scotty' McKeon (chief carpenter's mate, of Spokane) in one of our coconut dugouts. I told him what happened and the chief stood right up.

"'Hey, you guys,' he yelled. 'We're in a mess. Let's get up with O'Brien and blow the brains out of every ——— ——— ——— on this rock.'"

When dawn came 320 dead Japanese lay in the line of fire of that 10-man defending force—and 1 American was dead by the gun he had manned

And that's the story of Ed O'Brien, carpenter's mate, third class, United States Seabees' temporary station, Momote airdrome.

The Spirit of the Chinese Christian Soldier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, recently a translation of the radio broadcast on Christmas Eve, 1943, by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to the wounded soldiers in China's armies was reprinted in the Christian Century. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including it below.

We who are brought up in the Christian tradition and take that religion for granted can perhaps profit from reading this message from one who was brought up in another tradition but who in his mature manhood, after careful study and calm decision, accepted the Christian faith.

It is, of course, not exactly the sort of thing our modern western leaders could or would be likely to say to our soldiers. Perhaps we would be better off if it were:

THE SPIRIT OF THE CHINESE CHRISTIAN SOLDIER

(By Chiang Kai-shek)

To wounded and sick officers and soldiers in all military hospitals: Your commander in chief does not for a moment forget the life and sufferings of you wounded and sick officers and men. Words fail fully to express my deep concern for you. I can only say: I should be bearing your sufferings for you. Why then are you suffering in my stead? Think, and you will understand what I mean. My mental anguish over your wounds and pain is more intense than any physical anguish you are enduring.

CARE FOR THE WOUNDED

On New Year's Day of this year I addressed a message to our splendid troops throughout the nation, pointing out certain important principles which should be observed. Another year has now passed. Soon we shall be celebrating the seventh New Year in our war of resistance. During this year we have fought many big and hard battles against the enemy. Not a few of our comrades have fallen upon the battlefield, carrying on the glorious traditions of the revolutionary army that founded our republic. Still more wounded comrades, old and new, have written by deeds of valor stories to make us sing and weep. Now they lie broken in body, maimed and crippled, in our Army hospitals, seeking restoration of their physical health.

I salute you with pride, loyal and brave soldiers; at the same time I sympathize profoundly with you in your bodily distress. I have ordered officials everywhere to fulfill their duties to you on my behalf, and I have instructed all our Army doctors to give you the best possible medical care so as to alleviate your sufferings and help you overcome your difficulties. Only thus can my concern for you be satisfied and my heart be comforted.

I have also decided, beginning with the new year, to invite earnest pastors from Christian churches in the land to visit you at your bedsides, to talk with you about the true way of life, to broaden your knowledge, to give you spiritual comfort, and to lighten your load of suffering.

I, myself, wish to take advantage of this broadcast to say something to you wounded officers and men about the truths by which we soldiers should live.

JESUS THE EXEMPLAR

This is Christmas eve. As we think of this Saviour of men and of the world, His spirit of sacrifice and His martyrdom for the truth, we cannot but be moved. As you know, Jesus was the son of a poor family, His father being a carpenter. Moreover, He grew up among an oppressed people at a time when they were suffering bitterly from foreign aggression, and yet for the sake of lofty and eternal ideals He served His own fellow countrymen and race and poured out His blood freely as a sacrifice for all mankind.

What was the secret of His power—such love of others, such fearlessness of death, such noble, imperishable character? Let me tell you. It was because He knew the meaning of life, because He understood the purpose of life, because He grasped the truth about life. Therefore His infinite spirit fills heaven and earth and rules the universe.

I once said that man born in this universe has a Heaven-given capacity to rise upward and to live for others. When this capacity is fully and creatively realized then man can stand erect and secure, unafraid and unashamed, in the vast universe and achieve the ideal of perfection. I have described this revolutionary philosophy in two sentences: "The purpose of life is seen in the advancement of life in all mankind; the meaning of life is found in the creation of ever-new life throughout the universe." If we comprehend this revolutionary idea and give ourselves to lifelong struggle for it, then with inner certainty of soul and unfailing strength of body we may be able like Jesus Christ to attain imperishable life and become perfect men revered by mankind through all generations.

Comrades, I have spoken before of your world-renowned valor. You have fought and bled for your country and your people. You have displayed the highest traits of character. You have suffered and lived through nine deaths for humanity, for fatherland, for fellow countrymen, and for principle. You have accomplished mighty deeds. But as long as you live on this earth, as long as we have not attained complete victory and freedom, so long does your responsibility remain; it is not yet fulfilled.

LIVE AND DIE LIKE JESUS

We revolutionary soldiers should live and die like Jesus. We should be ready to give our last drop of blood on a cross to cleanse humanity of evil and to create a shining new world of equality and freedom. Let every soldier, as long as he lives and with all the strength he possesses, perform his full duty to his country and to the world. For us soldiers the struggle cannot cease as long as any breath remains in our bodies. Looking at the innumerable heroes and martyrs that have gone before us and the unborn generations that will come after us, we cannot but strain every nerve to complete our sacred mission. Your commander in chief cares deeply for you in your physical distress and even more in your mental misery and depression of spirit. He also knows that you must submit to the discipline of truth if you are to find comfort of soul and hold fast your spirit of struggle and sacrifice. And so again I put before you some of the essential conditions of spiritual culture and well developed character.

First, in a true way of life comes faith. Faith gives life. What is the object of our faith today? The three principles—national independence, democracy, and the people's livelihood—which the father of our country bequeathed to us and which can save our country and people, mankind and the world. Dr. Sun Yat-sen left an important exhortation to our soldiers: "Let us with our perishable lives of a few score years establish for our Nation an imperishable existence of centuries and millenniums." Our individual lives are a part of the life of our race. Remember, heaven and earth and our parents have given us birth that we may be universal men who can transmit the past and create the future.

DEMOCRACY FOR THE WHOLE WORLD

Long life in ordinary speech means life of the physical body. But the physical body is simply a bundle of flesh and blood and bones. It is not our true life which is linked with the endless life of the Chinese Nation and the ever-living truth of the three principles. Only if our nation is immortal can we as individuals truly enjoy long life and immortality. As government of, by, and for the people spreads over the world our lives will be as immortal as these great principles and as indestructible as heaven and earth itself. Understand and live by this truth and you can forget your anxieties. You can meet whatever comes, happiness or suffering, peace or danger. Your whole view of life and death will be changed. You will struggle more bravely, and you will find peace of heart.

Next to faith I must point out the importance of love and patience. It is for love of your country and people that you have been wounded in this war against the invader and are enduring such pain. It is for love of family and kindred and ancestors that you have sworn vengeance against the aggressors and are now lying upon beds of suffering. Remember your love of fatherland and fellow countrymen and your pain will be eased. Think of the victory that lies ahead, the recovery of our lost territories, the return to your homes and ancestral graves, the achievement of all that we are fighting for, and you will find health returning more quickly to you. With love you can endure all the sharp arrows of sorrow and misfortune, with love your spirits can be at rest whatever happens to your bodies.

Finally we need patience. Without patience it is impossible to realize life's high hopes. Hope cannot exist without patience. Patience enables us to strive on and not give up halfway until the goal of our hopes is reached. Our greatest hope today is for a free, enlightened world and for a China that can stand equal and independent among the nations. Because of our effective resistance this hope is nearer to being realized and the full consummation is now within our sight. I am sure that this great expectation will nerve you to overcome all our final difficulties and to forget all your own trials.

SPIRIT OF THE TRUE SOLDIER

All the military and party regulations and my various messages to the troops should be carefully studied and observed. While invalided you should endeavor to be just as good-natured and respectful as before to your medical officers, to your fellow soldiers, and to your teachers. You should deny yourselves, think of others, and help and encourage one another in the same way as on the battlefield. Be affectionate and sincere to all your comrades, share what comes in life or death. Steel yourselves to meet suffering with love of country and a patient spirit. Do not let feelings of depression or rage get control of you. I am sure that you have learned through your own painful experiences the value of love and patience. Faith, hope, and love—these are the three cardinal principles in the teaching of Jesus Christ. If you truly believe in these principles there will be no difficulty that you cannot overcome; you will have the power to realize your highest ideals and to help accomplish the revolutionary mission of our nation.

Comrades, I have mentioned only briefly these great teachings of Christianity. Later you will have opportunity to hear more about them from Christian friends and I am sure you will greatly benefit from them. This custom of visits by chaplains is not common in China as in western countries. There communities, Army groups, hospitals, all have pastors who speak to the people on occasion about the truths by which they should live and give them spiritual security and solace. When a person meets with suffering, sorrow, or depressing circumstances, the pastor is ready to give comfort and encouragement.

I hope that our church friends in China who are engaged in this noble service will minister also to our wounded officers and soldiers. Let them with good educational methods suited to each situation bring spiritual guidance and inspiration to our men, teach them self-control and self-respect, show them how to be strong in character and help them to live according to the teachings of Jesus Christ, which can save our people and the whole world. Then there will be hope for the realization of the three principles of the people and the great tasks of our revolution can be completed. Let us all strive earnestly toward that goal.

My beloved wounded soldiers, take good care of yourselves. I pray God and Jesus Christ to relieve you speedily of your pain and to restore you to health so that you may help win the victory and reestablish our nation.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation

REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, one of the great defense organizations of the country is the Federal Bureau of Investigation. While the Army, Navy, and Air Force are carrying the war to the enemy on the sea and in the air and on foreign battlefields, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is attacking with equal vigor enemies at home. When the history of this war is written, the accomplishments of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, under J. Edgar Hoover, will be recorded with honor and distinction. Therefore, it was a great shock to me, and I feel certain to other Members of the House, when a few days ago we heard the charge made upon the floor of the House by our colleague from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] that:

> Perhaps Jergens, if he took the stand, might disclose that the F. B. I., under J. E. Hoover, has in its files information to which Winchell has access, and might show that Jergens associated with individuals who were much closer to the Nazis than any of those who have been indicted for sedition.

That the Federal Bureau of Investigation should give access to its strictly confidential files to persons not connected with the Government and not entitled to inspect them was to me unbelievable. The confidence of the American people in the Federal Bureau of Investigation was not shaken by the charge. They were, however, dismayed by the recklessness of it, coming as it did from a Member of this distinguished body and uttered on the floor of this House. The charge did not long remain unanswered. No one expected that it would. With characteristic forthrightness, Mr. Hoover stated in unequivocal terms in a letter to our colleague [Mr. HOFFMAN]:

> I note, of course, that your statement was made in a conjectural manner, yet I wanted you to know the facts, and the facts are that no one outside of the official staff of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has access to its files. Any statement to the effect that a commentator has access to the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is wholly unjustified and is not based on fact. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2909.)

There is nothing ambiguous about the letter of Mr. Hoover. It is clear, distinct, and convincing. There is nothing of conjecture. There are no "ifs," "ands," or "buts," or "mights," or "maybes." It is just the kind of a statement that one would expect from Mr. Hoover. It is such frankness that has won for him the confidence of the American people and the respect of this House. No diversionary statement by our colleague from Michigan that there still might be information in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation showing a connection between a certain lotion manufacturer and the Nazis can detract from the plain, fearless, hard-hitting declaration of Mr. Hoover that no person other than those officially connected with the Federal Bureau of Investigation has access to its files and that any statement that a commentator has such access is wholly unjustified and contrary to the fact.

Apparently convinced, though neither pleased nor contented, by the direct unambiguous and unequivocal statement of Mr. Hoover, the gentleman from Michigan then sought to level the same charge at Attorney General Biddle and the Department of Justice. I hold no brief for the Attorney General. I only know him as a distinguished member of the bar, a fearless and courageous prosecutor, an efficient and faithful public servant, a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States and a gentleman of the highest ethics, who certainly would not improperly grant access, nor permit improper access to be granted, to the confidential files of the Department of Justice.

No disclaimer in my opinion is necessary from Attorney General Biddle. His reputation for integrity and courage is his best answer.

Need I remind the House, that the assistant to the Attorney General, Hon. James P. McGranery, was a Member of the House for 10 years immediately prior to his appointment to his present position last fall. Mr. McGranery enjoyed the respect and regard of every Member of the House.

With such men, as Attorney General Biddle, and the able assistant to the Attorney General, Mr. McGranery, in office, the American public need have no fear that the confidential files of the Department of Justice will be improperly disclosed.

On March 13 last our colleague from Michigan placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Hartford Day Spring, a newspaper published in Hartford, Mich. In that editorial the Federal Bureau of Investigation was erroneously charged with suppressing free expression of speech by implied threats that leave the investigated with the impression that he had better keep his mouth shut or run the chance of getting himself into trouble. I presume that the gentleman from Michigan keeps himself well posted with the editorial comment that appears in the newspapers of his home State. Therefore, I am at a loss to understand, when, having given wide publicity to the charge made by this paper that the F. B. I. was suppressing free expression of speech, he did not, with equal frankness and in fairness to Mr. Hoover and the F. B. I., make known to this body the editorial published in that same paper on March 16, 1944, only 3 days after he had inserted the previous editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which reaffirmed the confidence of the editor of the Hartford Day Spring in the Federal Bureau of Investigation. So that the whole editorial might be before this body. I append it herewith and I call particular attention to that part which says:

With the wisdom and efficiency which have characterized his entire career, Mr. Hoover sent Assistant Director Louis Nichols from Washington to investigate the situation more thoroughly. Mr. Nichols was in Hartford last Friday and with intelligence and understanding assured the youngster, his parents, superintendent, and teacher that there had been no attempt to stifle free expression of opinion.

And again:

Mr. Hoover's direct and decisive answer will tend to eliminate any further anxiety on this point, "If at any time any representative of this Bureau should exceed the bounds of his authority and attempt to stifle freedom of speech, prompt and decisive administrative action will result."

And, lastly:

When we presented this story we did not intend it to be used as partisan ammunition or buckshot for personal feuding. That it was used in this manner could not be prevented.

[From the Hartford Day Spring, Hartford, Mich., March 16, 1944]

DID YOU SEE?

(By Joseph N. McCall)

"There has come to my attention an unwholesome condition in Hartford which appears to have arisen from a Nazi-inspired source." This statement made in a complaint to the Federal Bureau of Investigation started what has proved to be an unfortunate incident in the annals of the F. B. I. "We had no choice but to make a preliminary inquiry, which I am happy to say, revealed the complaint to be without foundation," so states Director J. Edgar Hoover, of the F. B. I., in a letter to the Day Spring this week. The complete text of Mr. Hoover's letter appears on page 4 of this issue.

The complainant made these malicious and unfounded charges against a Hartford student. The impression conveyed by the investigator after he found the complaint to be without foundation cannot be dismissed unchallenged, for he left the student with the thought that the accusation was justified, that his critical speech had been unpatriotic. The Day Spring recalling the gravity of the charges and the subsequent unsavory indication, revealed the facts in this column 2 weeks ago. Thanks to Congressmen CLARE HOFFMAN, of Allegan, and FRED CRAWFORD, of the Eighth Michigan District, and Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, many Michigan newspapers, and loyal Hartford residents, the injustice of the complaint and the method of investigation were called to the attention of Mr. Hoover who promptly exerted every effort to correct the unpleasant situation. With the wisdom and efficiency which have characterized his entire career, Mr. Hoover sent Assistant Director Louis Nichols from Washington to investigate the situation more thoroughly. Mr. Nichols was in Hartford last Friday, and with intelligence and understanding assured the youngster, his parents, superintendent, and teacher that there had been no attempt to stifle free expression of opinion. He allayed the fears of those most familiar with the case who were deeply concerned about the extent to which representatives of the Bureau are allowed to go in circumventing speech and democratic rights. Mr. Hoover's direct and decisive answer will tend to eliminate any further anxiety on this point, "If at any time any representative of this Bureau should exceed the bounds of his authority and attempt to stifle freedom of speech, prompt and decisive administrative action will result." Accepting Mr. Hoover's statement as fact, we may conclude that the Hartford case was not handled according to the established principles of the Bureau and was in fact a flagrant violation of F. B. I. policy. We are convinced that such careless investigations as that at Hartford are not sanctioned or countenanced by the Bureau. We are equally convinced that only through the vigilance of the public, the press, and our elected representatives are the high standards of this governmental agency or any other maintained.

Our purpose in presenting the facts to the public has been achieved. We have reaffirmed our confidence in the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The poor judgment of an ill-advised informer and an overenthusiastic investigator cast a shadow not only upon a youth but a respected Government institution. In the light of the past week's events, facts have been revealed and the shadow has passed. The young man, his parents, in fact the whole community, is relieved. They are willing not to excuse the blunder but to accept Mr. Hoover's explanation. We trust that the repercussions in this instance will reach the ears of F. B. I. agents throughout the Nation and that those who are inclined to exceed their authority will profit by the experience of the Hartford investigation. When we presented this story we did not intend it to be used as partisan ammunition or buckshot for personal feuding. That it was used in this manner could not be prevented.

Necessity of Exempting Keymen in the Fishery Industry As Critical Under the Draft—Unless This Is Done Fishery Industry Cannot Survive, Food Shortage Inevitable, and Essential Fish Oil for Hardening Ball Bearings and Other Defense Materials Impossible of Production

---

REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the matter which I have to take up is of peculiar interest to the commercial fishermen of the United States. The subcommittee on fisheries, headed by Hon. J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, has held several hearings on the importance of the seafood industry to the military services of the country and to the production of food for the Nation.

I understand that there is a committee headed by Mr. Paul McNutt, the War Manpower Commissioner, and several other appointees whose names I do not know, which is to meet on March 30 to consider various draft regulations or provisions in the draft regulations which will include draft regulations affecting the fishing industry. This matter has been the subject of interest and peculiar attention on the part of the fisheries subcommittee of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and also on the part of the full committee. In addition to the hearings held by Mr. PETERSON of Florida last week, hearings were held yesterday by the full committee. The following telegram has been sent to Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Selective Service Director, by me, as chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

War Manpower Commissioner McNutt is heading a committee which will meet tomorrow, 30th, to deal, as I understand, with draft regulations affecting the fishing industry. Unless exemptions are made for drafting of keymen in critical occupations in the industry such as captains, mates, engineers, refrigerating engineers, stationary engineers, and others, it is going to be impossible to supply the necessary sea food and oils imperatively needed by the War and Navy Departments for military purposes.

Similar telegrams have been sent to Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War; Hon. Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy; and Under Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Abe Fortas. I also sent a letter yesterday to the President of the United States.

A delegation consisting of Hon. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE, Member of the United States Senate from the State of Maryland, Mr. HARDIN PETERSON, and I, representing the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Dr. Gabrielson, representing the Coordinator of Fisheries, had an interview with Mr. Eugene Casey, Executive Secretary to the President, in which we discussed the importance of the fishing industry to the food of the Nation and also to the war service. We brought to Mr. Casey's attention the fact that the operation of fishing boats was now being prevented by the drafting of men who are critically necessary to the industry, such as captains, mates, engineers, mechanics, refrigerating engineers, retort operators, meal processors and processors of canned fish. We undertook to show him that without these critical men the industry could not continue and could not survive. We showed him that the draft boards are inclined to construe literally the President's statement to reporters that the industry can operate with 16-year-old boys and older men. We reminded him that the work was arduous and as we understood that Mr. McNutt was to hold a meeting to deal with these various problems on the 30th, it was essential that the industry should be protected.

A letter, similar to the one which we presented to Mr. Casey bringing out these facts, was written to War Food Administrator Marvin Jones, Hon. Paul McNutt, War Manpower Commissioner, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, General Hershey, Selective Service Director, and the Under Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fortas.

At a meeting of the full Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries held on March 28, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Committee Resolution 10

Whereas at hearings of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, it has been developed that the industry, in presenting its manpower problems, is divided into two component parts, namely: production of fish and sea food, employing approximately 122,000 persons, and the processing of fish and sea food, employing approximately 91,000 persons; and

Whereas representatives of the industry and the following governmental agencies, through their representatives, have appeared and testified: War Manpower Commission, War Food Administration, Selective Service System, and the Office of Coordinator of Fisheries of the Department of the Interior; and

Whereas this committee finds that both segments of the industry, where manpower is concerned, are equally important, and one cannot survive without the other; and

Whereas this committee is of the opinion that there is a dire shortage of manpower at present existing in both segments of the industry and that this shortage is becoming more acute; and

Whereas it having been shown that—

(a) In 1944 sea-food production will approximate 4,250,000,000 pounds.

(b) The War Food Administrator has stated 5,329,000,000 pounds of sea food will be required in 1944 to supply the needs of the armed forces, lend-lease, and civilians, 1,000,000,000 pounds short of estimated needs.

(c) Approximately 50 percent of the annual sea-food catch is utilized as human food, the remainder being used as essential ingredients in animal and poultry feeds, for the production of human food, as well as certain critical war materials; and

Whereas a committee headed by War Manpower Commissioner McNutt is scheduled to meet at an early date to determine critical activities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee headed by War Manpower Commissioner McNutt be and it is hereby requested and urged to take action as follows:

1. That the fishing industry (including the production and processing of fish and sea food) be proclaimed by the committee headed by Commissioner McNutt as a "critical activity" or "critical industry" necessary to the successful prosecution of the war.

2. That the Selective Service System and/or the War Manpower Commission be instructed to direct local draft boards that the following positions held by men in various segments of the sea-food industry are "critical" occupations: captain, fishing vessel; mate, fishing vessel; engineer, chief, fishing vessel; engineer, second, fishing vessel; oyster culturist; sponge gatherers, bleachers, cutters, and trimmers; commercial fishermen (including catchers of sea food), all around; fish pickler and/or salter (supervisor); foreman, food processing; machinist, maintenance; mechanic, maintenance; manager and/or superintendent, food processing; refrigerating engineer; retort operator; stationary engineer; oil processor; meal processor; chief processor of canned fish; be it further

Resolved, That local draft boards be given latitude to grant deferments for keymen in critical occupations, 26 years of age and under, where such deferments, if not granted, would cause a stoppage of production or processing: Provided further, That such deferments of men 26 years of age and under shall exist so long as men 26 years of age and under remain so engaged and until such time as a satisfactory replacement can be obtained.

Mr. Speaker, copies of that resolution have also been sent to all of the above-named parties. The resolution itself shows the necessity for the deferment of critically needed keymen. It was brought out, and cannot be denied for it has already happened, that the taking of one keyman can tie up an entire boat, as for instance the captain of a fishing boat, mate, engineer, and/or refrigerating engineer. In the fisheries men engaged in occupations such as are specifically listed in the resolution of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries are essential and the industry cannot operate without them. Throughout the United States fishing boats are being tied up because of the drafting of these men who are critically needed not only for the production of food but for the production of oils and other things essential to the war.

While it is true that in many instances most of the crews of vessels of the commercial fisheries are over age or young boys, the drafting of one keyman will tie up the entire boat. Testimony of the National Research Council before this committee shows that the food production per man was higher in the fishing industry than any other class of food producers, even hog farmers in the Corn Belt ranking second to fishermen.

Testimony was produced to the effect that practically all of the menhaden oil produced from the menhaden fisheries and other fish oil had been commandeered by the War Department and is essential to the hardening of bearings in airplanes and other essential war implements. The testimony was to the effect that there was no known substitute for oil of that kind. Further, that fish meal and other fishery products were necessary as a food for poultry and animals for which there was no known substitute, and unless provided there would be a critical shortage of those essential food materials.

The following letter was presented to the Subcommittee on Fisheries during the course of the recent hearings:

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. J. HARDIN PETERSON,
Chairman, Subcommittee of Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. PETERSON: It has come to our attention that your subcommittee is now examining the manpower problem of the fishery industry and is considering a plea that certain occupations in the industry be classified as critical occupations for guidance of selective service in evaluating requests for deferment from the draft.

Fishery products are considered by us to be a vital part of the food program, and in this connection Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, in a recent report to James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, stated that:

"Fishery products are being used freely as a main source of protein or as a supplementary protein to balance the deficiencies of the cereal proteins which are included in the average diet. The high nutritive quality and digestibility of fish proteins class fish among the more desirable food products. Besides being excellent sources of highly available proteins, some fishery products also are rich sources of vitamins. Furthermore, fish contain a variety of minerals in quantity and quality, and some species have high fat values.

"In 1943 war and civilian needs required a production of over 6,000,000,000 pounds of fishery products. Loss of vessels, lack of manpower, restricted fishing areas, and scarce materials combined to hold the final total to about 4,000,000,000 pounds, an achievement greater than that of the previous year, but far short of the goal."

The 1944 requirements for fishery products are greater than those in 1943 and are likely to increase still further as relief and rehabilitation programs will accelerate.

In view of these circumstances every effort should be made to assist the fishery industry in its endeavor to attain the enlarged production objective for 1944.

Sincerely yours,

C. W. KITCHEN,
Deputy Director.

At the hearings before the subcommittee there were present representatives of the War Manpower Commission, including several members of the Committee on Critical Occupations and Selective Service, who later expressed themselves as having obtained much material of considerable value to them, and that they had learned much about the fishing industry that they did not know. There were also present representatives of the War Food Administration and Office of Fishery Coordinator.

Mr. Fulton Lewis, the well-known radio commentator, in his address from California on March 28 over Station KHJ, Los Angeles, over the Mutual Broadcasting System, whose local station is WOL, to whom we are indebted for a copy of Mr. Lewis' remarks, made the following statement concerning the seafood industry:

Some 4 or 5 weeks ago in New England, and more recently in the Pacific Northwest States, I made an effort to get some information on the commercial fishing industry, whether it is living up to the hopes of the War Food Administration in Washington and helping to provide a substitute for meat in the national diet. In the last few days I have coordinated that information with Mr. Elmer Higgins, of the Fish and Wildlife Service in the Department of the Interior in Washington, and it looks, frankly, as though the War Food Administration and the public is destined for disappointment.

The normal commercial catch of fish in this country is about 5,000,000,000 pounds, Mr. Higgins tells me. It dropped to 3,750,000,000 pounds in 1942, then came back to 4,500,000,000 pounds in 1943, last year. The War Food Administration was hoping that it would rise this year to 5,250,000,000 pounds.

The commercial fishing interests and Mr. Higgins in Washington tell me, however, that for various reasons, mostly attributable to the Government in Washington, we will be lucky if the fish production this year is as high as it was last year. It is not a matter of there not being enough fish; on the contrary, as in the case of wild ducks and geese which I mentioned to you a day or so ago, the reduced fishing over the past several war years has given the fish population a golden opportunity to stage a comeback, so to speak, which the fish have done in a very big way. The trouble lies in the fact that many important fishing grounds have been closed to fishing for security reasons. The Navy has taken many others for bombing and for other practice purposes. The supply of fishing nets is short because nets are needed by the Navy and Coast Guard for protecting harbors. All of which is perfectly fair and reasonable. Also, the Navy has taken numerous fishing boats for patrol work.

The most important factor, however, seems to be the fact that the Selective Service draft has cut heavily into the ranks of commercial fishermen. The new rulings of the draft headquarters in Washington against the deferment of any person under 27 years of age for occupational reasons they say will take another 8,000 out of the remaining total of 122,000 men still engaged in commercial fishing. Unfortunately, commercial fishing is not something that a national service act can assist by merely shifting unneeded office clerks to fishing posts in Puget Sound or Gloucester.

Even if some provision is made to avoid the drafting of those 8,000 fishermen, this year's production will be a billion pounds under what the War Food Administration wants.

That is the top of the news as it looks from here, ladies and gentlemen, until tomorrow evening.

Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible within the limits of this extension to disclose fully the services and activities of the individual members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries who have all given their personal time and attention to activities for the fishing industry, who have been diligent in their attendance upon the hearings and in their personal contacts to remedy the evils and correct the conditions existing in the fishing industry.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida and his Subcommittee on Fisheries, consisting of Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas, Mr. DOMENGEAUX, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. KING, Mr. O'BRIEN of New York, Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan, Mr. WEICHEL of Ohio, and Mr. HERTER, have been constant and tireless in their efforts to secure relief and too great tribute cannot be paid by me to them for their efforts. All of the other members of the full committee have relentlessly supported the Subcommittee on Fisheries in their efforts.

The Subcommittee on Fisheries and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries feel that they owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Hugh Frampton, attorney at law, Washington, D. C., and Mr. William S. Snow, of Alexandria, for their diligent service before the committee on behalf of the fishermen.

Maj. Lansdell K. Christie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith enclose a letter which I have received from Mr. W. A. Kirk, president of the W. A. Kirk & Co., Inc., 50 Broad Street, New York, and my reply thereto concerning Maj. Lansdell K. Christie:

W. A. KIRK & CO., INC.,
New York, March 23, 1944.

The Honorable EMANUEL CELLER,
Member of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I read with interest an article in the New York Evening Sun of March 22 relative to the lighterage situation in New York Harbor, wherein it stated that you had made the statement that the Christie Scow Corporation had a monopoly in this port, that the Christie Scow Corporation had a contract with the Army at Port Newark for the transportation of airplanes and parts to the exporting steamers for delivery abroad.

It also stated that this lighterage company was owned by an officer in the Army and inferred that due to this officer's associations with the Army, the Christie Scow Corporation secured the contract for the moving of planes and parts.

It has been my good fortune to have been closely associated with this lighterage company in a business way and to have known Maj. Lansdell K. Christie for many years. A more loyal American citizen I have never yet met. I think the following information may help to clear up many erroneous impressions that have been gathered from the newspaper articles.

Shortly after Pearl Harbor, Major Christie—who incidentally attended West Point Academy—offered his services to the Army for active duty in any capacity, and was immediately accepted and commissioned. In doing this he left a very lucrative and well-managed lighterage company and his absence is and has been a great personal sacrifice.

Some time after he was commissioned he accepted an important post in Africa and was stationed there for over 16 months. On two occasions he contracted some tropical fever and at his own expense flew back to the United States so he could get the proper medical treatment and returned to his post. The last time he arrived in the United States he was sent to a hospital in Georgia and was confined there, a very sick man, for some time.

While Major Christie was in Africa his organization, without his knowledge, bid on the movement of airplanes and parts from Newark, N. J., and the contract was awarded to Christie Scow Corporation only because their rate was a saving of at least 25 percent over what was paid to previous lighterage companies. I have personally seen the contract and can vouch for this statement.

I might further add that Major Christie's reputation in the transportation and lighterage business is and has always been far above reproach. He is one of the most respected and well-liked persons in the business, as all who have come in contact with him can vouch for.

Feeling that a grave injustice has been done to a very honest, loyal, self-sacrificing, and patriotic person and to the Christie Scow Corporation, I am submitting the above to you for whatever disposition you wish to make of it.

Respectfully yours,
W. A. KIRK, President.

MARCH 29, 1944.

Mr. W. A. KIRK,
President, W. A. Kirk & Co., Inc.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. KIRK: I have your letter of March 23, and I am very happy to receive the information you wrote me concerning Maj. Lansdell K. Christie.

It was far from my purpose to injure Major Christie in any degree. I simply set forth the facts that were given to me. The additional facts as set forth in your letter to me are highly important and I am placing your letter and my reply in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Same will appear in the Appendix of the RECORD of March 29.

I am indeed sorry to learn of Major Christie's hospitalization and I hope at this writing that he has greatly improved.

I trust that the placing of your letter and my reply in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will remove any injury or hardship that might have been visited upon Major Christie.

My interest in the lighterage situation in New York Harbor was because of the fact that all lighterage out of the port of New York was controlled by one company, and that company was contracting to do that lighterage without public bidding and without public letting.

Yours very sincerely,
EMANUEL CELLER.

Jim Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an article by John Temple Graves appearing in the Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald on February 24, 1944:

THIS MORNING

(By John Temple Graves)

"Faithful be to faithful friends * * *."

Jim Farley is in Birmingham today. Whatever he is (or isn't) up to, he is entitled to the welcome and good will of every member of his party and every friend of man. He is the Abou ben Adhem of modern politics, the man who has made his way by making friends and been able to make friends because he likes his fellow human beings. He is the political fair player of these times, too. Looking at politics quite frankly as a game, he has made it a fair one; a game with rules that are respected, obligations that are honored, loyalties that are served in devotion as far as public interest will permit.

The long and sad story which has lined Jim Farley up now against Franklin Roosevelt has not clouded his political judgment or his power to sum up. As he sums up the situation in the South, my guess is that he knows this section is going Democratic as usual, and that Roosevelt, as usual, can carry it if he tries.

But that does not mean there is no revolt here against excessive federalism and controlled economy carried too far, nor does it mean that our people see no menace in a fourth term. It means only that the South can't find a "better 'ole.' It sees no one but Roosevelt with much chance of winning the Presidency for the Democratic Party, and it sees the Republican Party as offering nothing sufficient yet to warrant a history-making break-away from Democracy. Maybe Jim will have some suggestions. Maybe he knows a "better ole."

Commenting on the Durham (N. C.) Herald's observation that anti-Roosevelt sentiment has lessened in North Carolina, Editor Santford Martin suggests in the Winston-Salem Journal that "most of the rebellion talk has come from officials and politicians" and that "the work-a-day folk of the State have not participated to any great extent." I can't quite agree on that. I believe, rather, that it is the officials and politicians who are turning back to party regularity and Roosevelt now as election time approaches and a Democratic victory becomes more important to them than anything having to do with Roosevelt or the New Deal. I believe that it is the work-a-day people among whom the revolt is most enduring and real, and that the tragedy of their situation is that they have no leaders. Maybe Jim can suggest some.

In the last few weeks this writer has been in 12 Southern States and talked to fellow-newspaper people in each. Everywhere I have found revolt widespread against what I call the perpetual New Dealer, against those who, not content with what has been dealt, want to go on and on, threatening not only the fine things dealt but the liberties and individualities which are as much a part of our American dreams as the bread and welfare on which the New Deal was concentrated.

But there are no leaders. The people who are feeling this way are, for the most part, people who have been New Dealers once, who have loved and followed Roosevelt and who revere him still even though they know there has been just about enough of him now except for the war. Such people are not won to the old guard as it runs out of its dark corners and imagines itself called on to make a speech. They are not in a mood to fellow travel with ones whose blindness and selfishness in other days made a New Deal necessary. They are not charmed by the psychopathic haters of Roosevelt and the ones who have been bitter and implacable enemies of the New Deal from the start.

They have no leaders, Jim. What about them? They are in all likelihood a majority in the South, and in the Nation, too. Their point of view is much akin to Willkie's. Like him, they are for most of the liberal and progressive things accomplished in this country since 1933, and like him, they believe the time has come for next things, for an end to New Dealing, and to New Dealers who are caught that way and can't stop, a time for new emphasis on the liberties we want in America along with our bread.

They are kin to Willkie, but they don't want Willkie. In the South they don't want him because they rank him with Mrs. Roosevelt on the race question, and because, anyhow, they aren't willing to take a Republican yet. (Elsewhere, it would seem, they don't want him because liberalism and Republicanism are apparent incompatibles.)

If Jim Farley has come to town with an answer to this situation which has the South tired of Roosevelt and disgruntled with the Democratic Party under Roosevelt but nevertheless willing to string along with both for want of a "better 'ole," here's hoping he speaks up loud and long. For he has a speech that can make history.

Meanwhile Jim can be trusted to speak up for the South in the matter of a more democratic apportionment system at Democratic national conventions, I believe. He did it at Chicago in 1940 when we received that two-delegate tip for being the party's faithful heart. He will be on our side next summer when real justice is sought.

The Farm Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. L. McCLELLAN

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, in the February issue of the Southern Agriculturist there appeared two editorials, the first entitled "Mr. Farmer, It Is Up to You," and the second "A Coherent Farm Group." These editorials, Mr. President, were answered by letter by a farmer from my State, Mr. F. C. Maxwell, of Hiram, Ark. His answer was so thought-provoking that the editors of this publication have given it the recognition of publishing the letter as an editorial in the April issue of the Southern Agriculturist.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the three editorials to which I have referred, the last one being entitled "Freedom—Or Democracy and Dictatorship," be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Southern Agriculturist of February 1944]

MR. FARMER, IT IS UP TO YOU

Every farmer knows that we are fighting this war for democracy and freedom. Every farmer is thinking in terms of whipping Germany and Japan, and no group of citizens in the United States is contributing more to the war effort. With the pendulum swinging in our favor, it is time for each farmer to give thought to the type of democracy and freedom that he personally wants.

Our conception of this freedom and democracy is not only the right to speak, worship, write, and vote as we please, but the right to do these things with a minimum of government. Some call it democracy, others the private enterprise system, and another name for it is free enterprise; but we call it preserving the dignity of man with the full right and authority to do what he wishes so long as he does not harm his neighbor. Summed up, it means personal freedom.

The trend of government in the United States is definitely toward more government in everything. We have brought it on ourselves by asking Washington to do something every time a dark cloud has appeared on the horizon. And what has been the result?

Farmers now find themselves swamped with Government questionnaires, red tape, forms, and Government employees. Property rights are limited by quota restrictions. Too much government is absorbing valuable time.

Personal freedom and constitutional government can be had by farmers and other citizens. But it can only be had if we quit calling on Washington to solve every major or minor problem we have, and if we elect and keep in office Congressmen who advocate and fight for constitutional government as set up by our forefathers.

[From the Southern Agriculturist of February 1944]

A COHERENT FARM GROUP

The January issue of Southern Agriculturist pleaded for a Baruch committee for agriculture. The subsidy fight, the differences on the food program for 1944, the lack of steel on the farm machinery front, the scarce farm-labor situation—all these call for thorough planning of both the 1944 food program and of post-war agriculture. No signs have appeared on the horizon to indicate that the answer to these problems has been found.

In stressing the necessity for the appointment of a group to make recommendations for agriculture, we find a dire need for a coherent group of spokesmen for all farmers. Admitting the wide diversity of farm interests, nevertheless the farmer badly needs a real group of outstanding spokesmen who would labor in behalf of all agriculture.

This brings up the question of how a group so widespread can obtain vigorous spokesmen who will not only fight for agriculture but fight for everything that is best for a harmonious relationship between agriculture, industry and labor. The time for serving the selfish interests of any one group has long since passed, but agriculture wants and needs men who will speak out forcibly in seeing that the farmer has and will hold a top place in the economic picture in this fine country.

Individual leaders representing various farm organizations, farm magazines, the Department of Agriculture, and State farm organizations have done yeoman service for the good of the farmer. We say "fine and well done," but who speaks for the great industry of agriculture in tones strong enough to be heard? Until and unless farmers and farm organizations can find the answer to this question, agriculture will not obtain and hold its fair place in the economic structure of our country.

[From the Southern Agriculturist of April 1944]

FREEDOM—OR DEMOCRACY AND DICTATORSHIP

(By F. C. Maxwell, Hiram, Ark.)

In the February issue of Southern Agriculturist appeared an editorial, Mr. Farmer, It Is Up to You. As a farmer I wish to comment upon that editorial and the farm problem. * * * For the past 11 years the farmer has been blamed for every evil which has beset this Nation, and I for one feel it is time we be heard in our own defense.

When the present national administration came into power it charged that God and the American farmer had produced too much and destroyed the farmer's purchasing power and thereby brought on the depression. Under that mistaken assumption the farmer was taken into the charge of the Federal administration and politicians were appointed to manage his business affairs.

Up until that time this Nation existed as a constitutional republic and the individual was given the protection of the Federal Government in the management of his affairs. Under that long established and successful system, the Government had no power to submit the use of personal and private property to a vote of the public, so a campaign of propaganda was started and under it this Government was changed from a constitutional republic to an outlaw democracy. With the coming of outlaw democracy, freedom passed.

The laborer was forced to pay large fees for the privilege of earning his bread, * * * the farmer's right to manage his own farm was submitted to a minority vote largely controlled by political dictators, production was cut, farm jobs were destroyed by legislation, hogs and cattle were slaughtered—not for food—on the theory we had too much food, although millions were hungry.

That was the beginning of political control of food supplies. That was the first real taste of democracy as a form of government. * * * The outstanding democrats from Jackson down had a profound respect for the Constitution and seldom or never considered this a democracy but a constitutional republic—and there is a vast difference. * * * As now correctly termed, a constitutional republic has a wholesome respect for the rights of the individual. A democracy is only concerned with the powers of the majority, or more often the organized minority, regardless of the rights of everyone who does not agree with them.

THE ORIGINAL AMERICAN WAY

The framers of the Constitution studied for 12 years the form of government they should adopt to secure the freedom for which they had fought. They rejected both monarchy and democracy, considering democracy as "mobocracy" or legalized mob law, and in the Constitution they placed a guaranty of a republican form of government. Or in other words, a representative government, with only very limited and well defined powers delegated to the governing body; all rights of the individual were carefully reserved and protected, as were the powers of the States.

But such a government did not suit the self-appointed reformers. It did not permit them the power to force their fellowman to accept their wise or otherwise reforms, so it was changed to a democracy—not by amending the Constitution as provided therein, but by widespread propaganda. * * * Legislation was enacted prohibiting the growing of cotton on the untrue assumption that cotton was overproduced in the world and cutting production would bring the farmers bigger price and income. The facts are: For the first 4 years of crop control the price was about 1 cent a pound higher, but the income to the farmers from cotton staple alone was $197,000,000 less than in the last 4 years of free markets.

For the first 7 years under the A. A. A. and Hull trade treaties the Cotton South produced 43.8 percent of world production. For the last 7 years of free markets we produced 58.1 percent. There is one nice thing about the Hull trade treaties—the name. The American farmer gets the "hull" while the foreign producer gets the kernel of the nut.

Paragraph 2 of your editorial was splendid logic, except that you join "freedom" and "democracy." Freedom is a personal matter or it is not freedom. Democracy is a collective matter. Mr. HENRY WALLACE, speaking in this State in 1933 said, "Democracy is simply majority rule." That makes a very pretty picture, until you ask two embarrassing questions: What majority? And upon what is it ruling? The answers to those questions are important.

The Department of Agriculture on January 16, 1941, informed the Congressman from my district: "In the past quota election, which was held in December 1941, the records of the Department of Agriculture reflect that 790,000 cotton farmers voted for the quota and 50,000 cotton farmers voted against the program. At the time the vote was held, 2,400,000 cotton farmers were eligible to vote."

At the time that election was held there were more than 130,000,000 people in the United States. There was a shortage of frying fats, milk, and butter, which those people needed, yet that minority of 790,000, supported by the strong arm of the Democratic Federal administration, in plain language, said, "Regardless of your needs, we are going to prohibit the 1,610,000 other cotton farmers from producing a billion pounds of cottonseed oil and 3 times that amount of cottonseed meal for the production of milk and butter." One year later a smaller minority, notwithstanding we were in war and still in need of fats, milk, and butter, repeated the ultimatum.

We have millions of our boys in foreign lands dying for our protection, yet at home small minorities of organized labor say we will not produce the things they need for their and our protection, nor will we allow others to produce these needed things; yet this great democratic system of government, which you say we are fighting this war for, is impotent to end that condition.

THE FARMER WANTS NO CHARITY

You state: "We have brought it upon ourselves by asking Washington to do something every time a dark cloud has appeared on the horizon." That statement is misleading and incorrect. It is true that certain organized groups of farmers have asked, and are still asking, certain kinds of legislation, but the great mass of farmers wants only freedom; not gifts, but protection from the oppression of groups organized and backed by vicious special-interest legislation.

The farm population is one-fourth of the total population. The Treasury Department a few months ago stated we owned one-fourth of the investments of the Nation. Certainly we work more than one-fourth of the hours, * * * On Labor Day 1942 Mr. Roosevelt had a serious brain storm because the farm income had increased from eight and seven-tenths billion dollars to $15,000,000,000 for the year. A few days later Leon Henderson placed the national income at $113,000,000,000. If the farmers are one-fourth of the population, have one-fourth of the investments, and do more than one-fourth of the work, why should they not have one-fourth of the total income? Mr. Roosevelt could see our increased income, but he could not see the total increase of national income; neither could he see that under the rule of democracy and mismanagement of bureaucrats our income had shrunk to the low level of eight and seven-tenths billion dollars. Nor in this day has he been able to get his eyes open, for he is yet demanding that the Government tax the farmers and everyone else to pay the grocery bill of his political favorites—organized labor—by subsidies.

Paragraph five of your editorial is good logic, but incorrectly stated. You place the blame upon the farmers by charging them with imposing upon the Government. It is the other way around. We have tried for 8 years to get a divorce from this "democracy." Excepting the solid South * * * the farm vote in 1936 and 1940 was against the New Deal, but still they hold on to us, and are demanding we feed the gang regardless of the fact that they have a larger income. * * * and that income includes about one-half which belongs justly to the farmers.

Michigan Slavs Fight for Victory and Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a report to the third annual conference of the American Slav Congress of Michigan, March 12, 1944, by Dr. W. T. Osowski, president, and George Pirinsky, executive secretary:

MICHIGAN SLAVS FIGHT FOR VICTORY AND LASTING PEACE

(By Dr. W. T. Osowski and George Pirinsky)

With this conference our Michigan Slav Congress rounds up another year of intensive win-the-war activities.

It was an eventful and crucial year, a year of big battles and great decisions.

The Slav forces of Michigan, like all patriotic groups, were called upon to exert new and greater efforts to help prepare the country for its greatest war effort—the forthcoming Anglo-American invasion of western Europe. They were called upon to help master the battle of production and arm our boys with the best of tanks, guns, and airplanes to join the victorious offensive of the gallant Red Army on the eastern front and the magnificent Tito liberation army of Yugoslavia by smashing at Hitler from west and south.

I think we can say that this year, too—the year between our second and third conferences—the organizations and forces united in American Slav Congress of Michigan again demonstrated a deep understanding of the war tasks before the Nation and made a significant contribution to the war effort of this city and State, which rank first in war production.

We can say that in all of our activities we showed that we realize that in these fateful days the supreme duty of every patriotic American, of every liberty-loving American Slav man and woman is to stand by the Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, and help him lead the country to victory and a lasting peace.

The other day our Government announced that from March 1941 through December 1943 the United States produced 150,000 airplanes of all types, of which some 28,000—approximately 19 percent—were sent to Allied nations. Michigan Slav workers, organized in the ranks of U. A. W.-C. I. O., share substantially in Michigan's part of this miracle of production. We are glad that Detroit tanks, guns, and airplanes are helping not only our boys in the Pacific and in Italy to deliver crushing blows to Axis bandits, but they are helping, also, the Red Army men to drive the Nazi hordes from Soviet soil. We read with great joy that our planes are helping Tito in repulsing the relentless offensives of Hitlerite enslavers.

More than 1,000,000 American boys of Slav descent are serving with honor in the armed forces of our country. Many of them, like our John Yaksich, of Detroit, have already distinguished themselves as war heroes who are ready to give everything for victory. It was with a sense of pride that we presented the Army with a 30-ton General Grant tank at our Slav day rally at Keyworth Stadium last summer. The presentation of the tank was the highlight of our most active participation in the war-loan drives during the year of this report, which were conducted under the leadership of our friend, first honorary chairman of Michigan Slav Congress, Mr. Frank N. Isbey, director of Michigan War Finance Committee. It is to the credit of people of Michigan and the leadership of Mr. Isbey, that this State ranks among the first in the sale of E bonds. In the last Fourth War Loan drive many of the women members of the Slav Congress—Serbian, Ukrainian, Croatian, Russian, Polish, Czechs, and Slovaks—did an outstanding job in helping to make that drive a great success. The Russian group conducted a very successful campaign, both in the Third and during the Fourth War Loan drives.

We are proud of the splendid record of our Czech men and women in the blood donors campaign of the Red Cross. Many of them gave blood eight and nine times already.

When Detroit celebrated I Am an American Day last May, our Slav Congress was in the first ranks of the active participants. In fact, the rally on that occasion at State Fair Grounds, where nearly 50,000 people gathered, was opened by Dr. W. T. Osowski, president of our State committee.

Together with U. A. W.-C. I. O., A. F. of L., Free World Association, as well as outstanding community leaders like Mr. Abner Larned, our Slav Congress forces helped make the meeting of Vice President WALLACE last summer an inspiring demonstration of unity around President Roosevelt. Members of our board of directors met with the Vice President and expressed to him our complete solidarity with the war policies of the administration.

Mayor Jeffries and Governor Kelly issued special proclamations for our Slav Day on July 18, last year, commending the patriotic program and efforts of American Slav Congress of Michigan.

Through the publication of "Michigan Slav" we kept high the banner of American Slav unity, not only in our State, but throughout the country.

Through our paper and other American Slav publications we forwarded our message of fraternal solidarity with our brothers in Europe.

The inspiring American-Soviet friendship rally in Masonic Temple last November found Detroit Slavs among the most enthusiastic participants in that splendid tribute to our great ally—the Soviet Union.

Liberal and progressive Poles of Detroit made this city center of a fighting movement to rally all democratic Polish-Americans in support of war program of President Roosevelt. The Polish Trade Union Committee, which was founded recently in Cleveland and which represents 600,000 trade unionists, is headed by our national president, Leo Krzycki. The Polish-Americans, who are united in the ranks of American Slav Congress, are proud of the fact that their brothers and sisters in U. S. S. R. and in Poland are fighting side by side with the soldiers of the Red Army in a great offensive to drive the bloody Nazi invaders, both from Soviet and Polish soil.

The fighting South-Slavic Americans—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Macedonians, and Bulgarians—made a great step forward in strengthening their unity, nationally and locally, by organizing the United Committee of South-Slavic Americans, under leadership of Louis Adamic, renowned American-Yugoslav writer, who spoke to us at our Slav Pearl Harbor Day rally in Cass Auditorium last December. Mr. Adamic's speech at that rally was a real contribution to the understanding of the true situation in Yugoslavia.

Winston Churchill, in his recent remarkable report to the House of Commons on the conduct of the war after Moscow, Cairo, and Teheran Conferences, already substantiated what Mr. Adamic said at our rally on the situation in Yugoslavia, whose people have taken up the fight against the ruthless German invaders and native traitors in the most epic struggle in Hitlerite Europe. Led by the amazing Marshal Joseph (Broz) Tito, the people of Yugoslavia built a tough people's army, whose glorious deeds remind us of our great American revolutionary traditions and immortal fighters of 1776, under Washington, as well as of those days of our Civil War, when Lincoln led victoriously the forces of progress against those of reaction.

Let me read to you briefly what the London edition of the Army magazine, Yank, wrote about Tito's army. I quote:

"The partisan army is open to all who are willing to fight Nazis regardless of their race, religion, or political color. It is an army with the broadest possible base, composed of Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Macedonians, Montenegrins, Jews, Christians, Moslems, Communists and conservatives. It includes an Italian division, a Czech brigade, a Hungarian battalion, a Bulgarian battalion, and even a German company. And it is an army that fights. It operates on the slogan, "Hit the Nazi wherever and whenever you meet him." It did not wait for the allies to come and kick out the Fascists. It began to do that for itself, with its own blood and brains and guts."

Mr. Churchill spoke about Tito in the most glowing terms.

At the meeting in Cass Auditorium, which I mentioned already, we expressed our complete support of Teheran Pact, just announced at that time. We greeted that pact, and the decisions of the previous conferences in Moscow and Cairo as great weapons for victory.

Much has been said and written on the meaning and significance of Teheran Declaration; much more will be said on this great document of our time in which Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill proclaimed to the world that the three mighty nations they represent "shall work together in the war and in the peace that will follow." In that history-making pact, the Big Three of the powerful American-Soviet-British coalition "reached complete agreement as to the scope and timing of the military operations, which will be undertaken from the east, west and south * * * for the destruction of the German forces." As to the peace they stated that they are sure that their "concord will make it an enduring peace."

Teheran Pact destroyed Hitler's hopes of dividing the United Nations. Its provisions, its implications not only guarantee that "victory will be ours", but they also lay the basis for "a peace which will command good will from the overwhelming masses of the peoples of the world and banish the scourge and terror of war for many generations."

Teheran lights the path to victory and projects itself far into the future as a new hope for a better life. It is up to the people to make it a shining reality; it's up to the people's movements like our American Slav Congress to help crown it with complete and lasting success.

None other than Winston Churchill blasted the false contentions of the appeasers. The British Prime Minister emphatically declared in his speech before the House of Commons, that "none of the ground made good at Teheran has been lost." Churchill stated that "the three great allies are absolutely united in their actions against the common foe. They are equally resolved to pursue the war at whatever cost to a victorious conclusion and they believe that a wide field of friendly cooperation lies before them after the destruction of Hitlerite tyranny."

In the same spirit Marshal Stalin, in the order of the day on the twenty-sixth anniversary of the Red Army, strongly emphasized that despite the fact that "the fascist rulers are making desperate efforts to introduce disharmony in the camp of the anti-Hitlerite coalition" these efforts "of the Hitlerites are doomed to failure, for in the foundation of the anti-Hitlerite coalition there lie important Allied interests which aim at defeating Hitlerite Germany and her associates in Europe. It is precisely this community of interests which results in the consolidation of a fighting alliance of the U. S. S. R., Britain, and the United States of America in the course of the war. The hour for the final reckoning is approaching for all crimes committed by the Hitlerites on Soviet soil and in the occupied countries of Europe."

This is straight from two of the architects of Teheran, this is their reply to the appeasers. Both Churchill's speech and Stalin's order of the day show that real progress has been made since Teheran in the settlement of Allied policy toward Yugoslavia. They show that all problems arising in the process of application of Teheran decisions are being solved in the spirit of common understanding and unity.

We in Michigan have much to learn from the Teheran Pact, especially now on the eve of the invasion of western Europe, and in this year of the most crucial Presidential election.

Here, in this decisive war production State, we find some of the worst American appeasers and enemies of the agreements which were reached at Moscow, Cairo, and Teheran Conferences. May I remind this conference of the anti-Teheran position and activities of pro-Fascist forces like Gerald L. K. Smith, Peace Now movement, and others? Some of these people preach negotiated peace with Hitler at a time when our boys in Italy are dying from German bullets.

Here in Detroit and Michigan we must take most seriously the recent warning of President Roosevelt that our country is threatened by rightist reaction and that if the reactionary forces are not checked in time, if they have their way, "then it is certain that even though we shall have conquered our enemies on the battlefields abroad we shall have yielded to the spirit of fascism at home."

Only the fullest mobilization and the broadest coalition of all democratic forces of our State and country can save the Nation from this danger. Only the most active support to the President can block the path of reaction.

Continuation of the leadership of President Roosevelt is essential for fulfillment of Teheran Pact and preservation of the Alliance of United Nations, without which there can be no victory nor a lasting peace. Therefore, our main job and the job of all other democratic forces on the home front this year is to help guarantee the continuation of that leadership, to make Michigan safe for democracy and victory.

The national committee, at its last meeting in Pittsburgh, decided to convene the Second American Slav Congress in early fall for the purpose of mobilizing all Slav forces for the crucial Presidential elections. It, also, decided that the third Sunday of June shall be celebrated by all patriotic Slav communities as all-Slav day as tribute to the Slav peoples of Europe.

Our board of directors proposes that on that day, June 18, we in Detroit stage a great Slav day rally at Belle Isle Park to back our boys, who at this very moment stand ready to fling themselves at the throats of the Fascist murderers of our Slav brothers and sisters in devastated native lands, which the Nazis have turned into virtual cemeteries.

In preparing for the American Slav day in June, and in all of our activities, we must work in closest cooperation with all win-the-war forces, particularly labor, always striving for broadest unity among the Slav groups and the Nation as a whole.

We are greatly encouraged at this conference by the large trade-union delegation—the fighting locals of fighting U. A. W.-C. I. O., in whose ranks there are tens of thousands of American Slav workers.

The support of the entire Wayne County C. I. O. council to the work of the conference is one of the many manifestations of the growing unity and closer cooperation between the democratic forces of Michigan. This people's unity, this constructive cooperation we must strengthen further. We must fight together in the present battle for a Federal ballot for our soldiers. We must fight together against race hatred, against bigotry. American Slav Congress stands four-square against any and all forms of anti-Semitism and Negro-baiting, which are contrary to the spirit of American democracy and the ideas for which our American soldiers and our Slav brothers and sisters in Europe are fighting for and dying.

Liberty-loving Michigan Slavs will not budge an inch from their most active support to the Commander in Chief for total mobilization of all the manpower and industrial and natural resources of our great country to speed the day of victory over fascism.

Yes, these are days that try men's souls, and we fighting Slavs of Detroit and Michigan are fully determined to do more than our share, hoping that some day when the history of the war effort of Michigan is written, the patriotic work of our American Slav Congress in this State will constitute one of its brightest pages.

Great trials and decisive battles lie ahead of us. But we face them with fullest confidence in complete victory and a lasting peace.

Long live our great Commander in Chief, President Roosevelt, under whose fighting leadership we, 130,000,000 Americans, march to victory.

Long live American Slav unity and the unity of the entire Nation, of all Slav peoples, of all United Nations and anti-Fascist forces.

Death to fascism. Freedom to the people.

Forward to the invasion.

Forward to the Victory.

Let Us Face the Race Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Carey McWilliams delivered at Town Hall, New York, at America's Town Meeting of the Air, under the auspices of Town Hall, in cooperation with the Blue Network Co., Inc., broadcast on Thursday, February 17, 1944, over Station WJZ and the coast-to-coast hook-up of the Blue Network:

It took a war to make us realize that the race question involved some real issues and that these issues were vitally related to the question of winning the war. In all sections of the Nation, American citizens are facing this question—in their defense councils, their plant-production committees, and their inter-racial commissions. They are not being fooled or frightened by bogus statements of the question. After what happened in Detroit and Harlem, in Beaumont and Los Angeles, they know that the contamination of racism is spreading throughout the Nation; and they propose to stop it. Fully warned of the danger, the people have already demonstrated that they possess the good will, the creative enthusiasms, and the energy to solve this question; but their efforts need guidance, leadership, and direction. While these local manifestations of good will are magnificent, nevertheless the people will discover that they cannot finally solve this question even in their own communities until it is solved nationally. For measured by any standard, the question has become national in scope and effect and it now falls full square within the field of Federal action. A question that deeply concerns 13,000,000 American citizens, and that threatens the integrity of the democratic ideal itself, can no longer be regarded as the peculiar problem of any one region.

I would propose, first of all, that we enforce the Constitution of the United States, not in part of the Nation, part of the time, for part of the people; but for all of the people, all of the time, in every corner of America. To safeguard the Bill of Rights, to insure the integrity of Federal elections, to banish discrimination in the exercise of constitutional rights based on race, color, or creed—these are Federal responsibilities. The necessity is clear, the justification obvious, the remedies multiple. Apply the second section of the fourteenth amendment; outlaw the poll tax in Federal elections; enact the Federal antilynching bill, and enforce these measures equally, impartially, but firmly throughout the Nation.

Approached as a Federal question, other lines of action are clearly indicated. Make it a cardinal point of Federal policy that there shall be no discrimination based on race, color, or creed. Then proceed to put this policy into effect in the field of Government service and in all the agencies of Government. By way of additional implementation, we need: Legislative sanction and authority for the Fair Employment Practice Committee; an amendment to the National Labor Relations Act, making it an unfair labor practice for a trade union to discriminate against any person by reason of race or color; and a Federal civil rights statute designed as a Fair Racial Practice Act providing for enforcement by an administrative agency as a matter of Federal policy rather than by individuals as a matter of personal privilege.

We should also recognize that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insure that no American shall be denied, solely by reason of race or color, the opportunity to become a responsible citizen. Why should citizens be denied access to public health services, to hospitals, to libraries, to schools and colleges, to the right to decent homes, solely because of the color of their skins? To prevent this denial, which is often occasioned by the States themselves, we need an agency in the Federal Government to provide these services and facilities wherever they have been discriminatorily denied. Give this agency the functions of research and education, of investigation and mediation, of organization and welfare. Authorize it to act through local and State agencies, but permit it to act in its own right whenever and wherever necessary. Provide it with the means to grant subsidies in furtherance of these purposes and expressly direct it to aid and to induce action on the part of local agencies of Government within the broad framework of Federal policy. Let such an agency bridge the gap between research and action; let it bring the full resources of the present-day social sciences directly to bear upon the problem.

Initiation of such a program can no longer be postponed. It is an indispensable step toward, and avoidance of, post-war complications, both foreign and domestic, which have already assumed major proportions. Isolation is a dead fact and isolationism is an obsolete doctrine. The manner in which we have isolated racial minorities in the United States has been closely related to the isolationism we have practiced in the field of foreign policy. The abandonment of isolationism in one field will, sooner or later, compel its abandonment in the other. We must recognize that we will need the maximum unity, not only to win the war, but to discharge the unprecedented responsibilities we have inherited and assumed in the post-war world. Formerly it was sectionalism that threatened to divide the Nation; today it is "racism." Since this war is in part a world revolution, it is folly to assume that it has not profoundly altered the relationships and factors involved in what we call the race question. The Federal Government, in the long run, cannot ignore these and similar considerations. It is precisely because two irreconcilable points of view are developing today on the race question that the Federal Government must be prepared to intervene, to mediate, to point the way to the future, and to prevent the lawlessness that, in the thirteen race riots of 1943, disgraced the Nation and encouraged its enemies.

It is perhaps well that we have waited, for we now possess the resources, both governmental and scientific, to undertake the task, as well as the necessary will to action. There is today in America a large and expanding area of good will, of creative enthusiasms, that can be stimulated and organized for the attainment of such a program and its objectives. If we permit this energy to dissipate, if we fail to act now to prevent the dangers that are so clearly foreseeable, we will invite consequences which may well be disastrous. For "racism" is not merely a threat to the minorities involved; it is a malignant disease that threatens the destruction of civilization and democracy. It carries the germs of future wars and endless domestic disorders. We cannot permit this disease to spread, for it is deadly and infectious. We must prepare now to stamp it out; to rid this Nation, once and for all time, of a scourge that threatens its national existence.

Our Last Chance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Post of March 25, 1944:

OUR LAST CHANCE

The Nazi occupation of Hungary, the imminent occupation of Rumania and Bulgaria, have raised to critical urgency the question of saving the Jews of Europe.

For in these nations almost 2,000,000 Jews lived, and while some have already been sent out of Rumania to die in the gas execution chambers set up in the Polish ghettos, there are still close to a million and a half souls alive there.

Alive, but for how long?

Before the Nazis came, the Jews of Hungary were able to hang on. They were discriminated against, deprived of their livelihoods, forced to live in the most abject poverty, yet somehow most of them managed, growing a little thinner every day, dying off more quickly, but still existing.

Very much the same situation existed for the Jews in Bulgaria and Rumania.

These three Governments were aware that their side might lose; that if they dealt too harshly with the Jews they would pay off for it to the conscience of mankind when the reckoning came at the peace tables. They were even willing to let many of the Jewish women and children migrate. They didn't want their record to be too black.

Now the Nazis are in Hungary. They have ordered the Jews to stay put, not to attempt to escape. They have begun to arrest some. Within the next few months, unless we rescue the Jews of Hungary, they will all either be dead or on their way to execution in Poland.

Unbelievable as it may seem, that is the truth. There were 3,200,000 Jews in Poland when the Germans marched in. Today only about 200,000 are alive, 1 out of every 16. It can happen in Hungary. It can happen in Rumania.

THE PRESIDENT'S WARNING

The President's warning to every Nazi and to every person under German domination to help the Jews escape, shows that he is aware of this. It is a magnificent warning. It could not be stronger.

Yet, of itself, it is not enough. Where are the Jews to go? The only place near enough and the only place where Jews are welcome is Palestine. Yet its doors are still closed. Magnificent as the President's statement is, it has not opened these doors. The British White Paper has slammed them shut, so far as any major use as haven is concerned.

We have been critical enough on this issue before. Let us say just once more that had Palestine or any place else been open to the Jews of Hungary before the Nazis marched in, they would have gone there. It was the lack of Palestine or any other haven that kept the Jews in the Balkans and that now brings them closer than ever to a terrible fate.

There is no time for recrimination now. There are still a few minutes left until the circle closes. Efficient as the Nazis are, they do not have records yet on each of the million Jews in Hungary. It will be weeks before they get down to the towns and villages and comb the hide-outs. It takes time to organize a country.

The Hungarians themselves hate the Nazis now, more than ever. They will help the Jews. Some can escape.

Everything must be done to make that escape possible. That means we must send agents into Hungary, use large sums of money, bribe if necessary.

PALESTINE AS A HAVEN

It means that nearby Palestine must be opened to them as a haven.

It means that today, now, we must start to get the Jews out of Rumania and Bulgaria before the Germans march in, as they will. Later than today will be too late and all the finest statements in the world will not help.

If we do less than that, we ourselves will help to close the circle on these people.

We shall have become participants in the massacre, not because we did something, but because we did nothing.

To the degree that our officials helped the British and Arabs close the door to Palestine, we shall have become participants.

This is our last chance to save our conscience and our honor.

Multiple State Income Taxes on Salaries of Government Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER H. WENE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. WENE. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have strongly advocated the passage of legislation which would exempt from payment of the Philadelphia wage tax all persons living outside the city and State, who are employed within the city limits of Philadelphia. In the past few weeks I have had occasion to publicly express my views in this respect at various meetings held in South Jersey. I am very much gratified at the action of the House on Monday, March 27, 1944, in passing the bill which would exempt from payment of double taxation all persons engaged in Federal employment. I am of the opinion, however, that in the final enactment of a law of this kind, the provisions should be broadened to also include all persons employed by private industry. I feel that they, too, should have the privilege of exemption from this taxation.

With particular reference to the Philadelphia State tax, and speaking in the interest of my district, we have possibly some 20,000 or more residents of South Jersey employed within the city limits of Philadelphia, a large percentage engaged in private industry. Like Federal employees they are subjected to the same unjust treatment double taxation imposes.

While the bill which passed the House would relieve the situation to a great extent, I am very hopeful that we may be able to have the legislation as enacted into law include persons employed by private employers in the exemption of the tax.

Elect More Enlightened Democrats to the Next Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, after serving nearly 12 years as Representative in Congress from the Fourteenth District of California, I have decided not to stand for reelection.

I take this opportunity to thank all the friends who have so loyally worked in my campaigns and to say farewell and God bless you to the many thousands of voters who have time after time reelected me to Congress. Believe me, I hate to leave the firing line at this time, but age is creeping up on me and I feel that I should make way for a successor—one who will be blessed with the youth and energy that are no longer mine.

In Congress I have been a strong supporter of President Roosevelt and his program to bring opportunity to all the people. I have fought for progressive measures and have sternly resisted organized pressure groups whose well-paid lobbyists are continually trying to control Congress.

Before Pearl Harbor and since that tragic day I have supported every appropriation for our Army, Navy, and air force. I have insisted that the American people do not begrudge taxes spent to make our fighting forces the best-equipped in the world; we are willing to pay for victory but we abhor waste, red tape, inefficiency, and we insist that these must be cut to the minimum.

Right now our mighty task is to win the war as quickly as possible and with the minimum loss of life. To do this we need less politics, less hate at home, and more earnest effort to pass legislation that will provide just taxes based on ability to pay and not framed by dictation of pressure groups; to enact such measures as are needed to guard the Nation against inflation, and to provide for reconversion of our war industries to the needs of peace, with the minimum of unemployment and all the ills that go with lack of jobs. Always we must guard free enterprise under such controls as are necessary to prevent gross injustice and unfair practices, resulting in an unsafe concentration of power and wealth.

It is of paramount importance to elect more enlightened Democrats to the next Congress who will not bow to blocs and lobbyists, who will not play politics to the detriment of the war effort, who have such outstanding ability as to compel attention, and who are honestly dedicated to the cause of democracy as enunciated by Thomas Jefferson, nobly served by Woodrow Wilson, and stoutly maintained by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

It is my hope that the Fourteenth District will elect a Representative who is not merely an average office seeker of mediocre ability but a citizen of force and personality, who has the background and the ability to be a leader in the fight against special privilege and reactionary forces.

With an entirely friendly feeling to all candidates, I feel that it is my privilege and my duty to advise the voters of my district that the outstanding candidate who will win immediate recognition in Congress is Helen Gahagan Douglas, Democratic national committeewoman from California. She has pleasing personality, a trained mind, unusual skill in debate, understanding of the issues of this crucial war period, and an enlightened program for a just and lasting peace. The Democrats now have only one woman in the House; we need more. If Helen Gahagan Douglas is elected to Congress, I am confident that she will be able to render outstanding service to the Fourteenth District and to the Nation.

Achievements of the Army Service Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago a very distinguished member of the minority party, my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois, the Honorable LEO E. ALLEN, of the Thirteenth District of Illinois, made a memorable address to this body. So profound were his expressions that the speech won favorable comment in the cloakrooms, not alone from Members on both sides of the aisles but on both ends of the Capitol.

He told that it was the first anniversary of the Army Service Forces, recited the history of the old Quartermaster Corps—in which he served in World War No. 1—of its unfoldment and evolution into the S. O. S.—Services of Supply. He pointed out the great accomplishments of that branch of our armed forces in World War No. 2 under the leadership of its commanding general in the first year of organization.

Mr. Speaker, it is not difficult to recall the many vexatious problems which confronted this body and the armed service a short 12 months ago. Problems of organization as well as problems of production; War Production Board problems of priority and allotments; the seeming failures of industry to effect rapid conversion, the failure of the old quota and allotment system to solve the problem of material distribution that arose out of the required production of tanks, planes, jeeps, and guns. The sinking of our merchant ships by German U-boats.

A memorable year has now passed. Listening to Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell recently while he was delivering an address, I was reminded of the really great speech delivered by one of our leading Republican Members, LEO E. ALLEN, about General Somervell's personal war record and accomplishments.

I am not going to address myself to the general or his work. The gentleman from Illinois, LEO ALLEN, has given to this House a good estimate of his worth to our country. Mr. Speaker, I am simply going to take a short excerpt out of the gentleman from Illinois, LEO ALLEN'S talk, paraphrase and submit it, together with another speech for publication in the RECORD.

On the occasion of that address, the gentleman from Illinois, LEO ALLEN, referred to a letter he received from General Somervell. He describes it as a simple, homey letter, abounding in frank expression, telling of contradictions and disappointments, reciting achievements and things yet to be realized. It tells of hopes and of ambitions that were to be achieved in the coming year.

It is not the kind of a letter that we would ordinarily expect from a so-called brass hat. It is such a human document, * * * replete with good tidings; * * * dealing with many problems * * * of such vital interest to us here in Congress * * * that I am submitting it for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I hope every Member of this House will find time to read it. It will bring to your notice not only the accomplishment of a great soldier and executive administrator, but inspire recognition of the abilities he brings to the task with which he is charged.

That letter and this speech made a year later can in truth be construed as—

Constituting a personal report to the membership of this House by Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, commanding general, Services of Supply, United States Army.

"Let others hail the rising sun,
I bow to one whose work is done."

Thus spoke the gentleman from Illinois, LEO E. ALLEN, to this House 1 year ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to include as part of my remarks another speech made by General Somervell only last week. It tells of what we have accomplished so far in this war, why we are doing them and that we are doing them all in the old American tradition and the truly American way. It was the expression of a truly great soldier, a great administrator, a great executive, and a great American.

ADDRESS BY LT. GEN. BREHON SOMERVELL, UNITED STATES ARMY, COMMANDING GENERAL ARMY SERVICE FORCES, BEFORE MILITARY AND CIVILIAN PERSONNEL, FORT BELVOIR, VA., ON MARCH 9, 1944

This anniversary of the founding of Army Service Forces, it seems to me, is a proper moment for self-appraisal. It is the moment to inventory our successes and our failures, to look backward and look forward, to reexamine our methods, and to ask ourselves pertinent questions.

How have we done?

How do we stand?

What does the future hold?

What can each of us in Army Service Forces do and what can each individual American do to hasten peace and assure victory? Is the purpose for which we are spending so much time and treasure and suffering worth all the effort and the agony?

Let us take up these questions, one by one.

How have we done? We have come a long way. I am proud of the men and women in Army Service Forces, our million soldiers and our million civilians here, and the service troops we have sent overseas. I am grateful to American industry and to American workers, to transportation and to agriculture, for their share in the arming of the Nation. Without united effort, military and civilian, the old cry of "too little and too late" would still be ringing in our ears. Thanks to you, to the soldiers and civilians in Army Service Forces, and to all those men and women who have joined us in our task, nearly everywhere today the story is "enough on time."

Our job is important, far-reaching, and complex. We feed, clothe, shelter, and transport the Army. We construct its roads, bridges, air fields, and port facilities. We operate its telegraph, telephone, radio, and electronic devices. We protect troops from poison gas and maintain our own supply in case of need. Except certain items peculiar to the Air Forces, we design and procure all arms and ammunition, all tanks and trucks, everything the soldier needs to fight and live. We keep the Army's records, pay its bills, pay each individual soldier and his allotments. We are responsible for morale of troops. Our Corps of Chaplains offers religious consolation. We administer military justice, handle prisoners of war, maintain law and order, keep traffic moving on the roads to battle. We carry the mail to soldiers around the world. We operate the service commands. We maintain the Army's health; we nurse the sick and wounded; we bury the Army's dead.

All this requires an organization so vast that the individual within it sometimes may forget how important his part is, or he may believe that his part transcends all others in importance. The engineer soldier drilling in the mud here must always remember that he is part of the Army that is marching up the road to Rome. The worker making nuts and bolts must constantly remind himself that these are not mere nuts and bolts, that he in reality is hurling high explosives at the enemy. The clerk must realize that those aren't just papers she is shuffling, that each paper represents a gun in a soldier's hands.

So far we have done well, but not well enough to relax for a single minute.

We have armed the largest army in our history with the world's best weapons. We have helped arm our allies.

We have housed and clothed and fed the Army well.

Our health rate is higher than the rates in civil life.

Our amphibious trucks, bazookas, rockets, signal equipment have changed the complexion of modern war.

We have shipped many million tons of equipment and millions of men overseas.

Today we set our sights on future targets. We must set them accurately. In order to find the range, we must measure carefully what it will require of effort, of suffering, of labor, of planning, of sacrifice, of unity.

We dare not lose our sense of urgency, dare not forget that each of us is a cog in a vast machine and that individual failure may lead to failure at some vital point far up the line. The soldier here at home, the shop worker, and the clerk can save American lives or by a thoughtless action bring death to our fighting men. The decision is ours on whether the war will be short or long.

How long it takes, how much it costs, is the individual concern of each of us. That little extra effort we all can give is vital. Each time we pause, each time we lay down our weapons or our tools, we help the enemy. No individual cause dare stand in the way of quick and final victory. Only through unity of action and mutual determination will we win.

Let us not be deluded by the happy thought that the war is won. Bitter fighting lies ahead. We have only dented the rim of Hitler's fortress and touched the outskirts of Tojo's empire. We haven't licked them yet. We dare not slacken our efforts. Rather we must redouble them. Victory is never cheaply bought.

Even victory is only a means to an end. What is that end? What are we fighting for? Why do we bury our sons and brothers in lonely graves far from home? For post-war wages or post-war profits? For bigger and better business? For softer comforts, new ice boxes, radios, cars? You know the answer. Our men are dying to preserve a way of life. The little luxuries are only byproducts. We are fighting for liberty, the most expensive luxury known to man.

We fight for simple things; for the little things that are all-important. We fight for the right to lock our house doors and be sure that no bully with official sanction will break the lock.

We fight for town meetings, for the soapbox in the public square, for the high-school debating team, for open doors to cathedral and church and synagogue.

We fight for schools built on a foundation of books, not bayonets.

We fight for the country editor and for the metropolitan daily and for the editor's right to say the wrong thing if he thinks it's right.

We fight for the right to organize for any decent purpose; for labor; for employers; for the Grange and the Legion and the ladies' literary club, and for lodge meetings in full regalia on Tuesday nights.

We fight for our candidate for sheriff and for the other fellow's candidate; and for the right to be sorry we elected him and to say so.

We fight for free radio, for the right to listen to what we want and to turn off what we don't want.

We fight for the right to work at jobs of our own choosing; to read the books we want to read; to listen to music that pleases us, without regard to the race or nationality of the composer.

We fight for the high privilege of throwing pop bottles at the umpire.

For these things we fight.

These rights, these privileges, these traditions are precious enough to fight for, precious enough to die for. They are not easily won. They cannot be acquired by half measures or on half time. Dollars will not buy them. They cannot be attained without sacrifice.

Let me remind you that Tom Paine's words are as true now as they were that snowy night beside the Delaware. Paine wrote them on a drumhead with a stub of pencil. Let us write them in our hearts indelibly.

I quote: "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph."

Thus spoke Tom Paine. His words will give us consolation in our sorrow, strength to combat our weariness, courage to face each new, hard day till peace comes back to the world.

To my troops, to the generals and the captains, the sergeants and the privates, and to all our civilian workers I say, "Well done." In the year ahead we will strive for greater accomplishment. We can't win the war on the assembly line or the supply line, but we can lose it there. The men who will win this war are the fighting men, in the air and in the mud. These are the men we serve. They will triumph in the end. It is our sacred duty and our high privilege to serve them. No matter what we give, no matter how we labor, we cannot approach their sacrifice. Their valor is a blazing torch to light our way.

Again the Jews Are Victims

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of March 29, 1944:

AGAIN THE JEWS ARE VICTIMS

Two more blows have befallen Jews of the Old World. One is delivered by Hitler, as usual. The other is internal. Both make the problem of rescue more difficult.

In Palestine a Jewish terrorist group has resorted to dynamite and murder against British police. This invites British repressive measures. It plays into the hands of the Arabs, who argue that increased refugee immigration would jeopardize Palestinian order and security. And in other countries this unfortunate incident will be used to feed anti-Semitism.

We trust no reader of this newspaper is so uninformed or so unfair as to blame the Jewish community of Palestine for the crimes of that very small gang. The Jewish agency and representative organizations were the first to condemn this terror. Few, if any, people in the world can match the record of the Jews in refraining from civil violence regardless of provocation.

The other blow falls in Hungary. There the new Hitler puppet regime is extending to the occupied country the anti-Jewish laws and lawlessness which are the mark of Nazi barbarism. Persecution was bad enough under other Budapest Cabinets. It will be much worse under the Gestapo. Similar situations exist in Rumania, and to a lesser extent in Bulgaria, other "allies" of Hitler in process of occupation.

The magnitude of this calamity is measured by the large number of native Jews and refugees from Germany now in Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria. Hitherto it was possible to get refugees out of those countries. For that purpose President Roosevelt 2 months ago appointed the Secretaries of War, State, and Treasury as a War Refugee Board, along lines proposed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in unanimously approving the Gillette-Taft-Baldwin-Rogers resolution.

An estimated 2,000,000 or more Jews have been wiped out by Hitler. The problem is to rescue as many as possible of the three to four millions remaining, and to provide temporary havens for them in neutral and nearby Allied territories for the duration.

It should not be necessary to point out to the War Refugee Board, which was named only after years of unpardonable delay, that with these Balkan developments every day counts now. Unfortunately, the British Government has been none too cooperative, either in the general problem or specifically in providing more refugee facilities in Palestine. Its white-paper barrier should be lifted.

This humanitarian issue of relief should not be confused with the entirely different political dispute over Zionism and creation of a Jewish state. To save as many as possible of those singled out for Nazi torture, starvation, and death—of which the large number are Jews—is not a matter of religious sect or creed, of political party or policy. It is common decency.

Why Bomb Germany?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. F. NORRELL

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pine Bluff Commercial of March 18, 1944:

WHY BOMB GERMANY?

A group of nationally known clergymen and writers has issued a protest against Allied obliteration bombing of German cities. Their statement points out that "hundreds of thousands of helpless and innocent people are being subjected to agonizing forms of death and injury comparable to the worst tortures of the Middle Ages."

Issuing a call for repentance, and urging Christian people to examine their participation in this carnival of death, the protest asserts that nothing less than absolute certainty that the bombings are shortening the war should permit the use of these dreadful expedients.

The concern of these obviously sincere and humane people for the innocent victims of bombings will be understood and shared by most of us. It is the same concern that we felt for the victims of the unprovoked Nazi raids on Warsaw and Rotterdam and London, and for the panic-stricken refugees who fell before the Nazi flyers' machine guns along French and Belgian roads in the summer of 1940.

Perhaps some Germans also felt sympathy for those victims. But they dared not protest in Hitler's Germany. So now they, along with their countrymen who applauded the blitzkrieg of defenseless cities, must reap the whirlwind loosed by the man whom Germany raised to power and almost to deity.

The bombing of cities is Hitler's creation, copied from Mussolini, rehearsed in Spain, perfected against Polish and Dutch cities, and halted by the English. And to say that the Nazis did not "obliterate" London because of any humanitarian motive is to be naive.

The protest quoted above obliquely questions "the absolute certainty" that Allied bombings of Germany are shortening the war. This raises the disturbing question: If the protesters doubt the absolute certainty, then why do they think these missions are continuing? Do they suspect that our bomber crews delight in the thought that they bring death and injury to civilians, or that the Allied Command has lost thousands of men and millions in equipment simply to spread terror?

The protest also stresses the fact that 18 months of mass bombings have not broken civilian morale. Such a consideration is wishful thinking. The bombing of Germany is a military campaign, aimed at the sources of supply and transportation, and at the vital nerve centers of enemy planning and authority.

If bombs had paralyzed German production and daily life by now, this costly campaign would be halted. They haven't, so the bombings continue.

Let anyone who thinks this war can be won by confining air action to front lines take a look at the stalemate in Italy? And let him try to count the American dead on the road to Berlin if Germany's ports and railroads and factories remained untouched!

Paying for Past Follies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we are today, in the midst of this terrible war, paying dearly for the past follies of foolish politicians, selfish bureaucrats, and irresponsible, ill-advised theorists as well as would-be autocrats, who were determined to make America over in order that they might have jobs for the rest of their lives at the expense of the overburdened taxpayers.

The hardships and the privations which the American people are today undergoing; the vast confusion, maladministration, and the disruption of American lives caused by point pricing, food scarcities, and black markets—all these are the result not of a sudden emergency arising like some tornado over the land, but of 10 years of unwise political experimentation with the American economy.

In their heyday, the Tugwells, and the Wallaces, and the Hopkinses, and the Corcorans, and the Cohens, and the Ezekiels, and a score and more of other gleeful experimenters and planned-economy politicians, were going strong on their theory and practice of killing little pigs, wantonly slaughtering brood sows; plowing under cotton; paying farmers not to plant, and penalizing farmers for planting.

Back in those days, any citizen, farmer or otherwise, who attempted to point out that farm machinery had to be kept up, that farm land had to be worked for crops instead of being left to produce only weeds, that if men could not farm as a way of life they would leave the land and go to the factory, such worried Americans were contemptuously characterized as Tories, and Economic Royalists, and Copperheads, and worse.

Today, as the people are paying a terrific price in privations for these political and economic follies of the last decade, the Tugwells and the Wallaces, and the Hopkinses and the Corcorans, and the Cohens, and the Ezekiels are keeping pretty mum about those days when they slaughtered little pigs by the millions, and wantonly destroyed the brood sows by countless thousands, and plowed under the cotton and the corn. They have come forward—one or two of them, at least—with new world panaceas which demand of the American farmer an enormous production with which these power-hungry politicians now pretend they will try to feed the world. But just remember that every time anyone has to stand in line at the ration board, and use scarce gasoline and scarcer tires to go back again and again, and every time anyone has to deny themselves some item of food or clothing to which they have normally been accustomed—just remember that they are paying the price which a good many of us warned that they would have to pay in those days of wanton destruction of animals and vegetable crops. The people are today paying the penalty for the foolishness and the political aberrations, and the bureaucratic arrogance and insolence of a decade of New Deal experimentation and disruption of the American economy by the Wallaces, and the Tugwells, and the Hopkinses, and the Corcorans, and the Cohens, and the Ezekiels.

The American farmer has not had an easy way of life in America. He has had, however, the best way of life of any farmer in the world, hard as it has been. He has had many long, lean years, and those who now point to the fact that farm income has risen to a high level, look only at the momentary returns; they are not thinking anything about the long, lean years that stretch behind the American farmer; nor are they thinking much about the long, lean years which may stretch ahead after this war is over.

All the American farmer has ever asked at the hands of his Nation has been a chance to be independent; to run his farm within reasonable limits as he saw fit; to produce under conditions where he had a fair chance to produce at a reasonable cost and sell at a reasonable profit. The American farmer is the most solid, independent, and soundminded citizen in the United States. He, least of all the citizens of this country, wanted to be a ward of the Government. He wanted to stand on his own feet and make his own way by his own efforts, asking nothing more than parity of opportunity and parity of price.

Of course, American farmers could not endure as a permanent proposition a condition in which the prices of everything they had to buy were rising while the prices of everything they had to sell were falling. No other businessman, no other industrialist, could endure and survive such conditions as those.

The farmer was perfectly willing to cooperate, and did cooperate, in soil conservation and flood control, and in erosion prevention. Those were and always will be proper governmental functions. The trouble in the last 10 years—the folly for which all the folks are now paying in point stamps, and ration stamps, in high prices and black markets—is not the price of soil conservation, and flood control, and erosion prevention. It is the price of the grievous mistakes, the deceptions, the miscalculations, the maladministration, and the conniving of those who would change our Government into a Communist dictatorship or a Fascist dictatorship—those connivers and plotters and conspirators who used soil conservation and flood control and erosion prevention as a cover-up and as an excuse to try to put the American farmer into a strait jacket; to handcuff and leg-iron him, and keep the keys in the political bureaus at Washington. That is where the damage was done; that is how the damage was done; that is the damage the people are paying for in privations, scarcities, point pricing, rationing, black markets, high prices and insolent regimentation and bossism by the O. P. A.—the same O. P. A. that a committee of the Congress within the last week has found far exceeded its legal powers and authority, distorted the directions of the Congress and usurped controls to which it was not entitled.

These experimentalists, these termites who were gnawing away at the pillars of Americanism and the foundations of the Constitution under the guise of setting up a planned economy, never seemed to think or to realize, as the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS, recently pointed out, that "No one ever went hungry on a surplus." Instead, their great slogan was the "ever-normal granary." The tragedy was that under the Wallaces and the Hopkinses and the Tugwells, the ever-normal granary was allowed to be a granary which went empty in our first year of the war.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said by some bureaucrats that the American farmer is never satisfied. That is true, and it is that spirit of always demanding something sounder and better that has made America the greatest Nation in the world; that has made the American Government the greatest government in the world; that has put American living levels higher than any other in the world; that has given America the best wages and working conditions ever achieved in the world. If the American farmer had been satisfied, we would still be living in the days of the oxcart, the squirrel rifle, the ax and the hoe. The American farmer never will be satisfied so long as there is anything wrong with his Government or his country that he believes can be rectified by common sense and common effort. One thing the American farmer has been satisfied with, very satisfied, indeed, is our American Constitution and our American Constitutional republican form of government. I can tell you something else the American farmer has been vastly satisfied with, and that is the Bill of Rights.

It was only when a bunch of plotting politicians, scheming revolutionists, and starry-eyed theorists undertook to make the American farm and the American farmer over, and to jam him into a planned economy in which the Bill of Rights would be but an empty phrase, and the Constitution an outworn form, that the farmer began to fight back and demand that tinkering with his business and his way of life by irresponsible bureaucrats such as the fellow who advised the farmers to take the shoes off their horses at night to save metal, cease.

We are asking the American farmer today to help win the war, and to help save the peace by producing more and more and ever more goods and fibers. The American farmer will not fail his country if he is given half a chance, and anything like a fair deal, while he sweats and toils to serve his fellow men. But the American farmer will never consent to be a peasant farmer; to be a serf tied to the land; to be regimented for years after the war; to be made the tool and pawn of politicians plotting for places of power in world politics, as they plotted for places of power in American politics.

The American farmer will never consent to these New Deal schemers using the American economy—and wrecking the American economy—in their postwar world plots for some kind of an American socialized imperialism.

Mr. Speaker, that is why the students of affairs in the United States are convinced that the American farmers are turning back to the Republican Party to rescue this Nation from a clique, the members of which are more concerned with exploiting world affairs for their own purposes than in conducting our Government for the benefit of all the people.

It occurs to me at the moment that it has been four score years ago that Abraham Lincoln stood on that crude platform at Gettysburg and, out of the wealth of his wisdom as a man of the soil, said:

> Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.
>
> Now we are engaged in a great civil war; testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. * * *
> That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. Speaker, 80 years from that distant scene among the hills of Pennsylvania, we are again engaged in a great war—a great world war—to determine whether this Nation can continue to endure under God, whether it shall have a new birth of freedom after this war, and whether it shall be perpetuated as a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and not perish from the earth.

Bombing Raid Over the Continent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, Sgt. W. L. White, Jr., of 181 Madison Avenue,

Clifton, N. J., in my district, is a freckle-faced tail gunner on a Martin bomber B–26, commonly described as a Marauder, in the Three Hundred and Twenty-third Bombing Group, Four Hundred and Fifty-fifth Bombing Squadron, somewhere in England.

Today I present a portion of a letter Sergeant White recently sent his father, W. L. White, Sr., describing one of his experiences in a bombing raid over the continent. It is as exciting as it is inspirational.

I am indebted to Ed Reardon, popular columnist of the Passaic (N. J.) Herald-News, for bringing this letter to my attention.

Tomorrow I shall present copy of a letter Sergeant White wrote the father of one of his comrades, a 22-year-old Kansas farm boy, "just another top gunner," who was killed in action in a mission over France.

The letter follows:

Then the flak really began, and the freckled-face gunner didn't like flak—and a guy can't fight back at the stuff—and he felt that ugly, shivering sensation start in the backs of his legs and end up in the pit of his stomach. He rocked from side to side in his tiny compartment, taking the bounce with his shoulders as the plane convulsed in violent evasive action.

The flak burst close in the formation, black and businesslike, and it "har-oomphed" like an old man coughing in his sleep. The gunner huddled within heavy flying clothes and flak suit, rolled back and forth and warily watched the skies. He watched the large formation, behind, plowing doggedly through the black cloud residue of anti-aircraft explosives; fresh bursts appeared in the cloud like thrown-up handfuls of Smith Bros. cough drops, and around his own ship the freckled tail gunner saw and heard the flak viciously punching at the weaving, feinting medium bombers.

Finally the formation banked into its final run while the bellies of all the ships yawned in unison as the bomb bay doors opened. Now the evasive action ceased; now the pilot's nerves must be of steel as he holds a steady course for the bombing run. Cold turkey for flak, thought the gunner, and the flak did seem to increase—close and tense. Every few seconds the plane shuddered and rocked a little as flak concussions and fragments hit home. Noise and vibration increased because of the open bomb bay doors. Following a sharp lurch and a distinct "splat", someone rather gayly yelled over the intercom—"Anyone see any daylight showing through?" The bombardier's voice came through, strangely clear despite the rasping interference in earphones, "Hold it steady, skipper, yeah. Right about like that—'good'—oops—just a hair to the right—one skinny blond hair to the right—that's it!" A short pause, then, "O. K. boys, there they go." Bombs away!

Some of the noise diminished as the bomb bay doors closed, then it hit; the plane grunted with the impact. "Easy boys," came the pilot's reassuring voice, "right engine. I don't know how badly, but bad, I think! I'm going to feather the propeller—hold everything!"

The tail gunner saw smoke pouring past his left window. It trailed straight back in a slightly wavy ribbon. He thought it looked nice—sort of graceful, fluid-like. He watched the bombs tumble out of the planes in the rear formations. He remembered it was Sunday and thought that a lot of Sunday dishes were going to be broken that day. And then he noticed that his ship was dropping away from formation, and he began to get scared for the first time.

The Spitfires hovering around overhead, and behind saw it drop back too, and about six came in close to escort the straggler. Like swallows, thought the tail gunner, lovely, lovely swallows flitting and gliding in and out. Slowly, but very positively, they were dropping back and losing altitude. The ship was beginning to vibrate, causing a great many little noises that combined to make anonymous roar—ammunition in the tinny racks rattled loudly, loose parts on the machine-guns and windows rattled, too, as did tool boxes and other unfastened articles.

When the top turret gunner's voice suddenly screamed in the tail gunner's earphones, nothing was distinguished except, "fighters" and "two o'clock." The freckled tail gunner's pinched face peered out of his left window and his hands tightened on the machine gun grips. The fighter, as it went past was just a streak, and the gunner's fingers tightened on the triggers partly through instinct and partly from surprise. He saw his tracers sink into the Focke-Wulf across the nose and wing. Two Spitfires flashed by on the fighter's tail; all three planes were so close and the interval so constant that they looked tied together.

A short while later the two Spitfires spiraled lazily up again, looking like indignant hens who had just chased an enemy out of their chicken house. The English Channel was now in sight.

The tail gunner wondered, in a detached sort of way, if the water in the Channel was very cold that day. A detached sort of way until the increased vibration and noise made him realize again their position. But it was strange how he thought of the smell of burning leaves in the fall—back in Jersey; and how, when he was a kid in grammar school, he used to walk up his street on Saturday mornings and smell that smoke and see the misty air and the near-naked trees through the mist. He used to say the trees were stripped down to their shorts about then.

The smoke past his left window was heavier and it poured back with more body to it because of the lower, warmer altitude. He heard the left engine cough once—not exactly a cough, but rather a faint clearing of its throat, but that was bad enough. And elm trees like tall, graceful, haughty women—selfish, too, for aren't they the last to grow leaves in the spring and the first to lose them in the fall? Funny, trees have personalities.

The vibration had now increased so that it shook the tail gunner. His face was white and scared and pinched, and his freckles stood out like warts. Why these thoughts racing through his mind?—pictures. A desire to eat grapes, those big purple ones; should have sketched that old fellow in London; and reading Dickens when he was a kid and feeling the tears well up in his eyes over Little Dorrit and Oliver Twist. And the time he found himself caught on a ledge in the Paterson mountains. Just couldn't reach that handhold and couldn't retreat—and would God forgive a foolish 11-year-old if he fell and killed himself?

The Channel was cold-looking down below. They were all alone except for the few Spits that hung around, ever watchful, yet helpless to help. They held altitude well, but always they were dropping steadily.

The smoke no longer poured past the left window, but the vibration was worse. The plane now bumped and stumbled along—and a prayer was in the minds of all the silent crew. All waited for the pilot's order for ditching in the Channel.

When the tail gunner first began to sing he startled himself by hearing his own voice in his earphones. He saw that his knee had been pressing the interphone switch, but someone else began to hum the same tune. So the tail gunner pressed his intercommunication switch and sang the words slowly and quietly at first and then increasing in volume:

"Onward Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war."

Two other voices started to hum and gradually stumbled into the almost forgotten words—

"With the cross of Jesus
Going on before."

The vibration seemed to gather a certain rhythm; the rattle of ammunition racks became a tintinnabulation. The rest of the crew joined in, slowly, hesitantly at first, then full strength—

"Christ the Royal Master Heads against the foe."

All the voices rose, strangely clear—strangely beautiful—and the usual interference and crackling over the wires was absent. The noise of the ship synchronized with the voices, combined to make a majestic symphony.

"Forward into battle
See His banners go."

The interphone switch was now in the gunner's hand. His whole body grew, swelled in strength. Tears ran down his pinched, freckled face, but he was grinning a huge victorious grin—and tears ran down his cheeks into the corner of his mouth.

Their ship was a great roaring tabernacle racing onward and downward. The vibration and engine thunder was the greatest organ pealing a mighty anthem:

"Onward Christian soldiers
Marching on to war,
With the cross of Jesus
Going on before."

The pilot's voice, usually quiet and clear, broke into the silence that followed. "England, right below us, kids. * * * we're in * * *." A small silence then, "O. K., let's have the second verse," and he started:

"Like a mighty army Moves the Church of God!"

Americans Resent De Valera's Refusal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the American people are very much upset by the refusal of the Eire Government to accede to the request of our Government to remove the German and Japanese diplomatic representatives for the safety of our armed forces.

Typical of the way the American people feel about this matter, I am submitting herewith an editorial from the Fort Worth Star-Telegram of March 17, 1944, entitled "Hard-Headed De Valera":

HARD-HEADED DE VALERA

The things which the United States has at stake in this war are so important that this Nation, for the present and the future, can no longer regard as its friends those nations which give aid and comfort to its enemies.

In respect to Eire, the traditional Irish quarrel with the British, in which Irish persistency won first the indulgence and later the active aid of this country, is now of secondary importance. The Eire Government holds to its distrust, even its actual enmity, toward the Government of London, but now it is the safety of American troops which is endangered by De Valera's stubbornness. The Eire Government has been duly notified of the circumstance. If it now persists in the sort of neutrality which permits its territory to be used as a spy post by the Germans and Japanese it will have forfeited not only the sympathy but the possibility of future support of its aspirations.

The present situation is obviously insupportable. In the British Isles the United States has mustered, and continues to muster, great forces for the forthcoming invasion of Hitler's Europe. Military security demands that the fringes of the camp be cleared of spies. In the capital of neutral Eire the German and Japanese legations, carrying far larger staffs than the nominal importance of the posts would justify, remain open for business. Since Eire is cut off from commerce with Axis territories and since there are few, if any, Axis nationals resident there, the business of these legations can be nothing other than spying upon the Allied forces in England and North Ireland. Eire permits these legations to continue and allows German and Japanese attachés to move at will about the country where, almost with the naked eye, a spy can overlook the camps of our Army and make a record of military and ship movements. This sort of neutrality is not the sort that this country has a right to expect from a nation and a people which have received so much aid as well as sympathy from our Government and our people.

The southern Irish are still fighting Cromwell, who has been dead nearly 300 years. They are still fighting the Tudors and the Stuarts, the last of whom passed to his reward even earlier. They are still tilting at the windmills of British imperialism, which for centuries has refrained from wiping out the snarling obstruction in Ireland and which at last gave the Irish the independence they confused with freedom. But what is of more importance right now is that actually, if not ostensibly, covertly if not openly, they are fighting America and Americans.

Eire has played a paradoxical role in this war. Its neutrality has been possible only because first the British and then the British and the Americans have guarded it. Eire's position forced the British and Americans to divert a great force to Northern Ireland where it must be maintained so as to be ready to defend Eire should Hitler invade that country. Eire's gratitude for all these services, for the century-old support of the American Government and the American people, has consisted of making it as difficult as possible for these protective measures to be maintained. Now it has come to the fact that Eire's position has opened a dangerous threat to the Allied invasion of Europe and to the safety of the American troops moved up to participate in that invasion.

There are abundant proofs that every advantage has been taken by the Germans and Japs of the espionage facilities afforded by Eire's neutrality. American troops have reported that even in Northern Ireland, where Irish traitors are plentiful and where operatives of the ostensibly outlawed Irish Republic Army filter across the border from Eire in large numbers, there have been innumerable evidences of contact between spies ashore and German submarines and aircraft. Beacons maintained by Eire along the Irish Channel enabled the Nazi raiders to get their bearings and easily locate targets, such as Coventry, Liverpool, and Belfast. The point may be well made that Eire's neutrality has served only the Germans and to a lesser extent the Japs. This is the sort of treatment Eire offers its friends.

The demand going from Washington that Eire's spy holes be closed originated with General Eisenhower, who carries the responsibility for the Allied invasion of Europe and for the preservation of the lives of the American troops under his command. It is a logical and reasonable demand, and the most extreme measures to support it would be justified. Mr. De Valera and his Government should take notice that previous assurances against "invasion" of Eire by American troops could not in logic be absolute. In effect, Eire is now compromising the safety of the American cause and endangering the lives of American soldiers. If there is no way of ending that condition short of military invasion, it may be believed that the temper of the American people would sanction that extreme measure.

Obviously, our Government will try all experiences short of shooting, and the closing down of the lucrative trade which Eire has enjoyed may perhaps awaken the Irish people to the folly and venality of the present course of their Government. If the Irish people as well as their Government are so foolish as to believe that they can continue to maintain a spy hole from which enemy agents can overlook our movements and continue to keep going lights by which the enemy can see to assault us, they have a bitter awakening coming. This country has been sympathetic toward Irish independence. We have gone almost to the point of governmental representations to Great Britain in Ireland's behalf, and heads of our Government have in times past exerted every pressure to the same end. Vast funds were raised in this country to support De Valera in the final stages of the bloodless revolution which produced the independent status of Eire. But sympathy and affection can be worn out in time. That time has arrived. The case demands action. Either Eire throws out the Jap and German spies or stands the consequences. Whether blockade or more extreme measures will be necessary to bring Prime Minister De Valera to face realities is for him to decide.

Total Conscription for War Purposes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a copy of resolutions adopted by Local No. 252, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, urging total conscription of all men, machines, material, and money with national service from all and profits to none.

This resolution is unique because of the source from which it comes. Members of Congress have been flooded with telegrams, resolutions, and demands from labor organizations opposing total conscription.

The communication which I received is under the seal of the local, and is as follows:

LOCAL NO. 252,
INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS,
Ann Arbor, Mich., March 20, 1944.

Representative E. C. MICHENER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This resolution was adopted by local union No. 252 (I. B. E. W.) at our regular meeting, March 8, 1944:

"Whereas for some Americans to gain wealth and economic advantage in war prices, war profits, and war wages, through the spilling of the blood of other Americans, is not in keeping with our traditions of liberty and justice for all; and

"Whereas there are powerful enemies of labor who are using the national emergency as a guise, under cover of which they would strike at the very heart of organized labor; and

"Whereas the internal strife which would inevitably result were we to strike back at these same forces in the conventional manner, would only hinder the Victory program and help our enemies, and realizing that to let those same forces continue this subterfuge could only lead to disruption of our productive processes and to ultimate chaos and thereby help to establish the very conditions at home which we are seeking to destroy abroad:

"Therefore, in our earnest desire to be free of all internal conflict, to establish unity, and to coordinate all our productive capacities to the fullest extent, this organization urges total conscription of all men, machines, material, and money with national service from all and profits to none."

We are sending you this resolution because we wish to express ourselves regarding the manpower-shortage problem. We believe with the adoption of this resolution our road to victory would be shortened considerably.

Yours respectfully,

C. O. DOCKTER,
Recording Secretary.

The Absorptive Capacity of Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

THE ABSORPTIVE CAPACITY OF PALESTINE

(By Arthur Lowrie, of American Zionist Emergency Council)

COMPARATIVE ESTIMATES

1. Palestine, west of the Jordan, comprises an area of 10,000 square miles. It is characterized, despite its small size, by great diversity of climate, soils, altitude, and rainfall, and offers possibilities for many types of agriculture and varied economic development. Its population today is about 1,500,000.

2. Belgium, Holland, and Sicily are each of approximately the same size as Palestine. The population of Sicily, mountainous and without important industries, is 4,000,000; that of Belgium and Holland each, over 8,000,000. It is clear that area alone does not determine the absorptive capacity of a country; its material resources and the energy, skill, and character of its inhabitants must also be taken into account.

3. Archaeological and historical evidence indicates that Palestine, in Graeco-Roman times, supported a population of 3,000,000 to 4,000,000, or more than twice the present total. It is reasonable to suppose that with the aid of modern technology that figure will not only be reached once more but considerably exceeded.

AGRICULTURAL POSSIBILITIES

4. Increase in the agricultural population depends on an extension of irrigation. The present irrigated area of Palestine can be increased at least 10 times. This is the conclusion reached a decade ago by 2 American experts (Professor Strahorn and Dr. F. Julius Fohs) who confirmed an earlier study by the late Dr. Elwood Mead, former United States Commissioner of Reclamation. At present less than 100,000 acres (1½ percent of the total area of Palestine) are irrigated.

5. Since the date of the above study, further new and abundant sources of water have been found in the subsoil of Palestine. An estimate of 1,000,000 acres of irrigable land must today be regarded as conservative. Development of such an area would make possible the doubling or even trebling of the present agricultural population.

THE NEGEB

6. For lack of water, the entire southern half of Palestine, known as the Negeb, is almost unpopulated. Archaeological remains throughout the Negeb bear witness to partial irrigation and marked prosperity in that region in ancient times. Sir John Hope Simpson, who in 1930 investigated agricultural possibilities in Palestine on behalf of the British Government, reported that "Given the possibility of irrigation, there is practically an inexhaustible supply of cultivable land in the Beersheba district (Negeb)." It is now clear that irrigation waters can be brought to the Negeb from northern Palestine, much as they are brought from the Colorado River to southern California. Plans for the irrigation of the Negeb along these lines are part of a comprehensive irrigation scheme of the type of the T. V. A. now being worked out for Palestine.

INDUSTRY

7. Palestine industries before the First World War comprised only a few handicrafts. By 1933 production had risen to $20,000,000, and by 1942 to $80,000,000. Today, Palestine produces an astonishing range of articles, including metal, textile, and chemical products, precision instruments, electrical equipment, machine tools and parts, cement, glass, and many specialized products. In addition, the Palestine Potash Co. has begun to extract the vast and hitherto untapped mineral wealth of the Dead Sea, whose products may well serve as the basis of a great chemical industry.

8. Jewish skilled workers and technicians have already proved the possibilities of developing flourishing industries in Palestine, based on local resources as well as imported raw materials. It is a commonplace of economics that many great industries have developed far from their sources of supply, and Palestine's central geographical position gives it easy access to raw materials.

9. Though Palestine lacks coal, great quantities of fuel from the oil fields of Iraq reach Haifa, the Mediterranean terminal of the Mosul pipe line. Moreover, plans are now under way for a great hydroelectric development made possible by the remarkable rift formation of the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea, dropping from 3,000 feet above to 1,300 feet below sea level. On a small scale this rift formation has already been utilized for the production of light and power by the Palestine Electric Corporation.

PALESTINE, A TRADE CENTER

10. Palestine's geographical position is also bound to be a factor of prime importance in determining its economic future. Located as it is at the crossroads of 3 continents, Palestine is rapidly becoming a commercial center for the whole of the Near East. In the words of Prof. Arnold J. Toynbee, it has "a position in the twentieth century world * * * not incomparable to the position of Great Britain as an entrepot between Europe and the Americas." Already Haifa is the third largest harbor in the eastern Mediterranean. A second modern port has been built in Tel Aviv, a city of 200,000, where 30 years ago there were merely sand dunes.

PALESTINE'S BALANCE OF TRADE

11. Coincident with the growth of Jewish immigration and settlement, Palestine's trade figures have consistently shown a considerable excess of imports over exports. In the normal course of events dependence upon large capital imports would be dangerous as involving an increase in the external debt. But the case of Palestine is unique in that the great bulk of capital imported is provided by the immigrants themselves or by Zionist funds from abroad. As the Palestine Royal Commission pointed out:

"The most singular feature in the economy of Palestine is the vast amount of capital which has been invested in the country, for which no remittance for interest and sinking fund are required. This feature sharply differentiates the Jewish national home from other communities which have been created by a process of colonization and are burdened by charges on the capital obtained from overseas for their development."

A SELF-SUPPORTING SOCIETY

12. On the basis of this capital influx, assets of a permanent and constructive character in the shape of new farms and factories have been and are being created, and will provide the basis for a self-supporting society. It is significant in this connection that an increasing number of the Jewish settlements founded with the help of Zionist funds, have begun to make repayments out of income on the moneys originally borrowed by them. During the years 1922 to 1928 the sum total of these repayments averaged only about $2,000 a year. In 1939 alone they reached the sum of nearly $400,000.

CONCLUSION

13. As long ago as 1930, when Palestine was far less developed than it is today, Lord Samuel, after 5 years' experience as High Commissioner, said:

"I am confident that with proper agricultural and industrial development Palestine could * * * support a population of 3,000,000."

On the basis of the experience of the last 13 years and of the economic possibilities above indicated, Lord Samuel's estimate now appears conservative. It has become clear that Palestine may well be able to maintain a population of at least 5,000,000.

14. Dr. Walter C. Lowdermilk, Assistant Chief of the United States Soil Conservation Bureau, who in 1939 spent 8 months in a thorough study of land use in the countries of the Near and Middle East on behalf of the United States Government, has the following to say on the absorptive capacity of Palestine:

"I shall not attempt to estimate the final absorptive capacity of Palestine. That would be impossible, for the absorptive capacity of any country is a dynamic and expanding conception. It changes with the ability of the population to make the maximum use of its land, and to put its economy on a scientific and productive basis. It is clear, however, that there is ample proof of the assertion that full utilization of the Jordan Valley depression for reclamation and power will in time make possible the absorption of at least 4,000,000 Jewish refugees from Europe, in addition to the 1,800,000 Arabs and Jews already in Palestine and Trans-Jordan."

15. The experience of the last 25 years has proved that Jewish immigration and economic activity have led to a marked increase in the numbers and well-being of the Arab population. As Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, Secretary of State for the Colonies in the Chamberlain government, stated in the House of Commons on November 24, 1938:

"The Arabs cannot say that the Jews are driving them out of their country. If not a single Jew had come to Palestine after 1918, I believe that the Arab population of Palestine today would still have been roundabout the 600,000 figure (instead of over 1,000,000 as at present), at which it had been stable under the Turkish rule. It is because the Jews who have come to Palestine bring modern health services and other advantages that Arab men and women who would have been dead are alive today, that Arab children who would never have drawn breath have been born and grow strong."

16. Repeatedly our conception of the absorptive capacity of Palestine has had to be revised upward because of the achievements brought about by the combined pressure of Jewish need and of Jewish determination to rebuild the ancient homeland of the Jewish people. We believe that the prospects held out in this memorandum are, if anything, an understatement of the possibilities.

Expenditures for the Farm-Labor Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief analysis of the expenditure of Federal funds for farm-labor purposes last year. I fear that not enough consideration has yet been given to the plight of small family-sized farmers who have been employing one, two, or three farm hands in their annual agricultural operations. I trust more consideration will be given this type of farmer in the future:

WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, March 16, 1944.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR LINDLEY: I am writing in reply to your letter of February 28, 1944. The funds appropriated under Public Law 45 for the farm-labor program last year were utilized as follows:

1. Approximately $4,700,000 was used by the State extension services under contract with the War Food Administration to recruit and make maximum utilization of all possible labor resources within the individual States. This included recruitment, placement, training, supervision, transportation, and housing of intrastate workers where these services were required in order to solve the needs for farm labor.

2. When all possible efforts to supply needed labor within a State do not fulfill the demands, labor is recruited in other States or from foreign countries. During 1943 approximately $12,600,000 was utilized for the recruitment, transportation, housing, and the furnishing of other necessary services to such interstate and foreign workers who were required to augment the local labor resources within the several States. A complete statement of the types of work, the areas of employment by States, the approximate wages earned, the sources of recruitment, and other related data of interstate and foreign workers transported during the period from January 1, 1943, to October 30, 1943, is included in the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives beginning on page 109, if you are interested in more detail on this particular part of the program.

3. The administrative expenses under this appropriation during 1943, which covers all the expenses of the program at the Federal level at the seat of government, approximated $373,600.

Approximately 45,000 prisoners of war were employed in various agricultural operations in 28 States during 1943. The majority of them were used in the Southern States, where they helped to pick cotton, shake peanuts, harvest rice and sugarcane.

The foreign agricultural workers were used by farmers in 31 States. They were employed by both large and small farmers, in connection with a wide variety of commodities, including vegetables, fruits, field crops, sugar beets, cotton, guayule, etc. A detailed statement of the types of work performed by the foreign workers is included in the House hearings on the Farm Labor Supply Appropriation Act, 1944, starting on page 109.

Both prisoners of war and foreign agricultural workers were employed by farmers at the rates prevailing in the locality in which they were employed. These prevailing rates were established by State extension directors on the recommendation of county farm labor advisory committees composed of local representatives of the War Food Administration and local farm leaders. No information is available from this source as to the average earnings of prisoners of war. The average hourly earnings of the foreign workers were as follows: Jamaicans, 55 cents; Bahamians, 45 cents; and Mexicans, 61 cents.

I hope I have given you the information that you desired.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

Let's Face the Race Question!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Langston Hughes, author and poet at Town Hall, New York, at America's Town Meeting of the Air under the auspices of Town Hall, in cooperation with the Blue Network Co., Inc., broadcast on Thursday, February 17, 1944, over station WJZ and the coast-to-coast hookup of the Blue Network:

Some people bring up the doggonest arguments against doing something concrete toward solving the Negro question. Even some liberals declare the South would rather fight another Civil War than abolish the Jim Crow car and its attendant indecencies. Others profess a profound fear of intermarriage, as if permitting Negroes to vote in the poll-tax States would immediately cause whites and Negroes to rush together to the altar. Others, like David Cohn in the January Atlantic, say there is no solving of the race problem at all, evidently forgetting the examples of Brazil and the Soviet Union.

What puzzles me, an American Negro, is how we—and by "we" I mean all Americans—can put forth such profoundly broad and human war aims and can send men to fight in defense of those aims thousands of miles away to New Guinea or Italy, yet find it so difficult to put even the simplest of those principles into practice regarding Negro-white relationships here at home. We are perfectly willing to bear down—and with good reason—on Hitler and the Japs, dying across two oceans in defense of our ideals, yet unwilling to bear down on our own railroad brotherhoods and those railway companies that refuse to let American Negro firemen work on American railroads, even in this crisis of manpower shortage. We are perfectly willing to send tanks and planes to our heroic British, Russian, and Chinese allies around the world, but unwilling to provide more than inadequate Jim Crow cars or back seats in busses south of Washington for our own colored soldiers. We even permit returned heroes from the battle fronts to be so Jim Crowed.

When I say "we," let me remind you again that I mean the whole United States, North and South. But in discussing the Negro-white problem, there is no denying that although it is a national problem, its focus is in the South. In the South Jim Crow is legal, as Hitler's anti-Jewish laws are legal in Germany. In the South lynchers go unpunished. In the South, unfortunately, the spirit of the Ku Klux Klan still lives and spreads from there into northern industrial centers causing hate strikes, riots, and enemy provocations.

That is why the race problem is a pressing national problem now—because we are fighting a war in which men are dying. Those of us on the civilian front have no right to hold up war production and thus increase death on the battle lines by walking out rather than work beside Negroes on the production lines. Nor have we any right to undermine the morale of Negro soldiers by segregating them in our armed forces, and by continuing to Jim Crow them and their civilian brothers in public places, in war industries vital to the public welfare, and as workers or passengers on public conveyances.

Please note that I said "public places." As to social equality, nowhere in the whole civilized world, so far as I know, is anybody forced to invite anybody else to dinner in his own home, or dance with anybody undesirable, or marry anybody he doesn't wish to marry—nor should it be so—if that is what reactionary objectors to democratic rights for Negroes mean by social equality. To me it seems that individual social relationships have nothing to do with the broad problems of civil, legal, labor, and suffrage rights for all Americans. Some people seem to insist on confusing the issues.

"Would you want your daughter to marry a Negro?" is a stock question. That that Negro might not want to marry his daughter never seems to occur to the questioner. Or, suppose the Negro did? All the daughter has to say is, "No."

So let's face the race question frankly, without being afraid of each other. I can assure America its Negro citizens do not desire to rob its white citizens of any democratic rights. We merely wish, as Americans of long standing, those same rights. Since the race question affects not South or North alone but all of us, since it shames our war aims and embarrasses our relations with our colored allies in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, I feel that an over-all Federal program protecting the rights of all minorities, and educating all Americans to that effect, should be evolved.

It took Federal Order 8802 to open war industries to colored workers. John Temple Graves writes, "There was no need for this Federal interference in the Negro's behalf, and both the Negro and the war effort were helped." It took Federal housing to clean up slums, to some extent, in poor Negro and white neighborhoods all over the Nation. It took the National Labor Relations Board to protect the bargaining right of labor, white and Negro. It took the National Youth Administration Act to break down existing community patterns in regard to work for Negro youths—formerly limited in many localities to employment as bootblacks, maids, and elevator boys. The N. Y. A. gave them, often for the first time, a chance to learn and work at some form of skilled or semi-skilled labor heretofore denied them.

Some of our States have no intention of doing anything about racial decency. Anyway, almost 14,000,000 colored people should not be left to the short-sighted mercy of the same kind of State's rights that have acted so undemocratically in Congress of late regarding the soldier vote. That vote, by the way, some Congressmen have publicly declared, is a matter of white supremacy. White supremacy is one of Hitler's cornerstones. It has not helped him much. Certainly, it is a liability to a democracy. Negroes aside, as an example of what white supremacy does to white folks, consider the poll tax—which affects Maine as much as it does Georgia.

Democracy does not lose by sharing its privileges. It loses by denying them. In ratio to that denial, it approaches the very Fascist patterns we are fighting against abroad. "Free peoples cannot afford the luxury of minority oppression," Ward Shepard says in Common Ground. Let's leave that vice to the master races. It is no fun fighting and hating all the time.

Politics Still Grips Capital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article entitled "Politics Still Grips Capital," by Robert L. Norton, which appeared in the March 19, 1944, issue of the Boston Sunday Post:

POLITICS STILL GRIPS CAPITAL—WITH THE WAR EFFORT ENGAGING THEIR ENERGIES, CONGRESS AND PRESIDENT ATTEND TO OWN INTERESTS

(By Robert L. Norton)

WASHINGTON, March 19.—There are many facets to the scene in the Nation's Capital today, all of them fascinating to the thoughtful observer, but the over-all impression is that of mighty and irresistible effort and energy. One senses and shares the evidence of the concentrated power of the Nation at war and there is something lacking in any American who fails to react with intensified pride in consciousness of his precious heritage of citizenship.

At the White House, in the Halls of Congress, in the huge office buildings of the Government, with their thousands of employees working at feverish pace, there is an atmosphere of cold determination and calm confidence that the war is certain to be won. And there is equal assurance that the future of America is secure.

To the casual observer the picture may be one of confusion. Coming from other sections of the country, where the war tempo is more restrained, many persons are heard to comment that Washington is a madhouse. On the surface this may appear to be true, but actually this seeming madness is pretty well coordinated toward the accomplishment of a common objective. These mad Americans, for the most part, feel an individual responsibility for their part in winning the war. And if the visitor is somewhat bewildered, the inhabitants, mostly new to Washington and coming from every part of the land, readily adapt themselves to conditions and soon learn to take things in stride.

WORST PART OF WAR YET TO COME

One cannot but think of the contrast with other great capitals, their public buildings and homes in ruins, the steady rain of death from the skies, the shattered bodies of their women and children, victims of the dreadful inhumanities of war, and above all the deep conviction that the future holds nothing for them but travail and hardship. It's an ugly contrast and for Americans whose hearts are filled with human sympathy and tolerance, it can bring no great satisfaction in their own good fortune, but instead a deep compassion for these stricken millions, a desire to alleviate their suffering, and a firm determination to prevent it from happening again, if this be humanly possible.

Living in our small towns, peaceful suburbs, or great cities, the war sometimes seems nothing more than an ugly dream, since the normal pursuits of many are not seriously disturbed. We have food, clothes, and shelter in sufficient measure, and above all a feeling of security. In most of our homes there is a vacant chair at the dinner table. There is a stirring apprehension in our hearts as to whether Dad or Johnny will come back from the war. Many families are soul-wracked because their boys have made the ultimate sacrifice, but as yet war has not taken a great toll of lives. The great clash of arms, once our power is unleashed in all its fury, is yet to come, and with it the inevitable spilling of blood. Until we are fully up against it, the full and horrible consequences of this war will not be realized.

BAD MISTAKES CERTAIN TO BE MADE

Washington is the center of the war effort in the sense that it is here that the vital decisions are made. The Federal Government becomes the dictator of the national economy and the authority of the States and local governments is for the time submerged in the necessity for unified and coordinated action. The daily lives of our people are to a great extent controlled through the edicts of the war agencies. Congress sits as the direct representatives of the people in defining policies. The strategy of war, upon which military success or failure depends, is determined by our general staff and the military representatives of our allies.

It is to Washington that the eyes and ears of the population are attuned in these critical times. The Capital, with all its complicated and various war agencies, is geared to the job of administering the war. Unless the Central Government, from the President down, gets this job done with a minimum of friction and a maximum of efficiency, then all our efforts in this vast country are of little avail toward the winning of the war.

To the minds of reasonable men it must be obvious that this is the toughest kind of a job. Bad mistakes are made. No person, however eminent, can claim infallibility and the percentage of human error is bound to be pretty large. Bickerings and jealousies are common enough, even among those who are highly placed in their responsibilities. Men of inferior ability are accorded authority, often of an arbitrary character, which they abuse or fail to measure up to. Greed, extortion, and self-interest show their ugly heads. Lust for power and partisan politics are ever present.

PRESENT TAX PROGRAM INADEQUATE

Many of the critics of the war would have better character if their own motives were free from suspicion, if they contributed more to its successful conclusion and broad purposes, rather than engaging in petty disputes and recrimination. There is a certain latitude of criticism which is difficult to define. Much of the criticism which we hear is pure cant. "Is it in destroying and pulling down that skill is displayed * * *? The shallowest understanding, the rudest hand, is more than equal to the task."

There are persons who disparage criticism on the ground that it is destructive of national unity. But on the whole and so far as Washington is concerned, it is a pretty good thing, more particularly when it is based on facts, as in the case of the excellent job done by the Truman committee. There have been plenty of reasons and justification for attacks upon the domestic conduct of the war. But it is our observation, in Washington and elsewhere, that all of us must recognize the tremendous work of organization done by our Army and Navy. Nothing like it has ever been seen. No army has ever been so well equipped. No such navy has ever existed on the face of the earth. The output of shipping and airplanes is far beyond the wildest dreams of 5 years ago. It is true that the war has cost astronomical sums of money up to date and that this spending has only begun. While we cannot hesitate at the spending of money or the fullest use of the resources of the Nation, nevertheless there is an enormous wastage. Our few economically minded statesmen should therefore be given a full hearing and attention from the taxpayers of the Nation.

Whatever the merits of the controversy over the President's veto of the tax bill, it is perfectly plain that the present program will not suffice unless the country is to go on indefinitely with borrowings and the piling up of a national debt which could ultimately result in breaking down of national credit and repudiation of debts.

BREACH WITH CONGRESS NOT HEALED

For the time being the tax bill will be out of the way until the next session of Congress. There were many reasons for the inadequacy of the present legislation, but chief among them were political considerations with the approach of the presidential election and the influence of high-power pressure groups. From this time on every measure in Congress must be tinged with politics. Even the President cannot be freed from the suspicion of playing politics if he is to run for a fourth term. If the President sets out to win a fourth term, in the very nature of things and as politics are organized in this country, he must have political considerations in mind, since political considerations are translated into terms of votes.

Those who hoped that peace and harmony between the Executive and Congress would be immediately restored after the assertion of independence by Congress on the Presidential veto of the tax bill are doomed to disappointment. It is true that Mr. Roosevelt has shown some signs of responding to the chastening influence of this historical rebuke, but Congress still has a chip on its shoulders.

Perhaps another test will develop should the President decide to veto the compromise effected on the soldiers' vote legislation. Whatever the merits of this legislation—and there are excellent arguments on both sides—the compromise represents the only agreement possible in this session. If the President vetoes the bill and his veto is sustained, then the 1942 law waiving the poll tax and registration requirements as conditions precedent to voting will remain as the only legislation on the statute books.

FAVOR SOLDIERS' VOTE COMPROMISE

With some of the States adhering to the constitutional limitations imposed by registration and poll taxes, there appears to be something in the contention that more of our armed forces would be able to vote under the compromise plan, since it specifically reasserts State control of voting regulations.

The argument for the Federal vote plan sponsored by the President and the chiefs of our armed forces was that because of the simplicity of administration it would allow the largest number of soldiers and sailors to vote. But at no time in the debates was there any clarification of the contention that the operation of the Federal plan was unconstitutional and that therefore with the prospects of electoral-vote contests the election might be thrown into the House. This is an important consideration, since it would be a catastrophe of no mean order if the election of the President were in doubt at a moment when we presumably will be approaching the climax of the war.

Beyond question, as in other legislation pending and in prospect, political and partisan considerations have influenced this legislation. The South stood out against waiving the poll tax because it adheres traditionally to this limitation upon suffrage. Republicans voted almost solidly for the compromise plan because they feared the Federal plan was a scheme to influence the bulk of the soldier vote for a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. It is somewhat significant that Democratic Senators who are up for reelection voted 11 to 10 in favor of the compromise measure.

Future of the School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of every Member of the House to an omission in the exercise of our legislative responsibility which will surely plague every one of us if we fail to correct that omission. That omission is this: For the first time since 1935 we have failed to authorize assistance by the Federal Government in assisting communities in making available school lunches at no cost to needy children, or at reasonable cost to those who are able to pay. We have failed to do this for the year beginning July 1, 1944, even though we have seen a program develop during the current year in which the communities, under the stimulus of Federal contributions of surplus foods, have put up $2 for every dollar made available by the Federal Government. Every one of us should remember this: Unless we take further steps to remedy it, the responsibility for discontinuance of the school-lunch program will be on Members of this House.

We cannot permit this to happen. Our responsibility to every segment of the population is too great. Those of us who are interested in agriculture cannot permit this excellent means of making use of commodities bought for purposes of price support activities to be weakened. Currently many of us are concerned about the decline in the farm prices of eggs. We cannot have effective price support if we do not have good outlets. School lunches can become a major outlet. Those of us who are concerned with maintaining adequate incomes to farmers in the post-war world cannot idly stand by and see one of the strongest means for maintaining ample domestic markets hampered after years have been spent in building it up. Moreover, we have been able to get urban support for agricultural programs because people have believed that there is a close relationship between agricultural and urban welfare. The school-lunch program helps farmers, it helps children in rural areas, it helps children in urban areas. If we kill this program on the ground that some of the money spent reaches farmers indirectly through the market instead of directly, we endanger wide public support of price-support programs. That must not happen.

Those of us who are interested in the welfare of American children and in having able-bodied children, regardless of their income, cannot permit this direct attack on the health and vigor of our children to go unchallenged. It would indeed be a strange commentary on our efforts in international cooperation if we should cast aside the school-lunch program in this country when our allies, partly with the aid of lend-lease foods, are providing adequate lunches for their school children because of their importance in the war and their importance to the future of their countries.

I have had occasion to look over letters about the school-lunch program. Many members have received the testimonies of school teachers, parents, and other civic bodies. Here are some excerpts from some such letters.

From Madison Ohio, the president of North Madison Parent-Teachers Association writes:

We indeed appreciate your letters pertaining to greater use of potatoes, cabbage, and eggs. It enabled us to know what we could do to help and it afforded an opportunity for some of the farmers to sell us their produce at reasonable prices, and they were appreciative of this opportunity to unload some of their surplus.

Our project is a "rural" school, the children traveling distances by bus, so you can appreciate what a hot lunch means to them. In past years, without your aid we have not been able to always serve a balanced meal, but this year we are able to give them a seven-point menu. We all belong to the "clean plate" brigade, and after serving the entire school our garbage won't fill a pint container. There is a noticeable decrease in absenteeism this year and increase in the weight of the pupils.

From Newton, Iowa, the superintendent of Newton public schools writes:

There was a need for over 2,000 women workers to replace men in the war-production scheme. Where both mother and father were working, one on one shift and one on the other, it was impossible to provide any type of regular lunches at home without seriously disrupting what little rest schedule there was for the one who was off duty. Women who tried to work under those conditions had to give it up. If they did not, the results of the attempt to make the adjustment showed up in their children's attitude and health. We started up again, therefore, our school-lunch program with the assistance of the Federal Government. It would have been impossible to do this without such assistance.

The schools have assumed this burden as part of their war job. It has meant extra hours of planning and tiresome accounting work to make the thing go. The subsidy which we get ranges from 7 to 9 cents a meal. Too many of the youngsters could not afford to pay for the meals, but the 7- to 9-cent subsidy takes care of free meals which are served to youngsters from homes which have been handicapped by a change in conditions and where youngsters have to have this food if they are going to grow. In an industrial city like this we have children whose parents are physically unable to work for them. The increased cost of living has meant tremendous burdens. Our children have to be taken care of, and the 9-cent subsidy has made it possible for us to include these children in the program and carry them along.

Long ago it looked as if we would have to close one of the schools where lunches were served, because of plumbing difficulties which occurred in the afternoon session. The announcement was made early in the afternoon that there would be no school the next day. When the repairs were made in time to announce that there would be school the following day, we expected disappointment on the part of the children, but instead the children were happy that they could return to school. It developed that many of them were glad because of the prospect of a hot lunch, which represented the only warm meal that the children in some of these homes had during the day.

There is a great deal of money spent for a lot of bureaus employing a large amount of office help that does not get anything done, but it seems to me that this particular division has gotten a tremendous amount done that has affected vitally the health of children and the war production in factories in communities like ours. This Federal subsidy has made it possible for the school to go ahead on a shoestring and do this job. Without a Federal subsidy of some type, we could not do it. We would just have to close up. It seems to me that in communities where this program is a vital one in war production, that some provision should be made for its continuance.

From Creston, N. C., a teacher writes:

The children were pale and much underweight. Since we are serving hot lunches they have gained from 1 to 6 pounds and doing much better work.

I feel that it is one of the greatest steps ever taken toward developing healthy boys and girls. I only hope the Members of Congress will be able to see the benefits derived and continue to give aid.

The principal of Pine Point Indian School, Ponsford, Minn., states:

I speak mildly if I say that I am pleased with the hot-lunch program. I am thrilled about it. Never in the history of my teaching (and the years are many) has anything so impressed me as this noon lunch here among these Indian children. To many, if not the most of them, this meal at noon is the only one they have all day. By this I do not mean that they are actually suffering from starvation as far as filling their little stomachs is concerned, but I do mean to say that they are starving for the right kind of food.

The most beautiful sight anyone might wish to see is our lunchroom filled with a hundred or more happy, hungry Indian children—eyes sparkling with just waiting to "dive in."

I do not hesitate to say the hot lunch is helping our children physically, morally, mentally, and spiritually.

A big salute to those who have made this hot-lunch project possible.

From Hobbs, Ind., a civic group writes the following:

Our homes are farm homes; however, our child needs this hot meal at noon due to the extremely long day. Leaving their homes early and returning late, usually with a hasty breakfast, and tired evening meal.

Eating together gives us a chance to teach social graces, reverence and thanks, sharing, courtesy, appreciation, etc.

The milk, too, is a step toward the balanced meal. Many of these farmers sell every drop of milk from a herd of cows. Children go without milk and butter.

How could funds be spent in any more profitable manner than building the youth of the Nation—through health?

The following statement was received from a parochial school in Arcadia, Wis.:

I believe that the greatest asset of America is the children growing up in millions of American homes. It is the responsibility of the American people to care for the health of these future Americans. Good health means greater enjoyment of life and greater resistance to disease. We have noticed that these school lunches mean less fatigue in work and play, it means more vigor and pep, a more attractive appearance, better thinking, and better emotional balance. We noticed that our children, now that we have been giving them a warm meal at noon, do much better work in the afternoon. More than all this it means optimum growth and development. I believe that this school-lunch program is the best investment America has made in the last decade especially in our rural schools. We are really building future America.

From Delano, Calif., a district superintendent of schools has written:

The attendance at the Fremont School cafeteria has tripled this year, because of the excellent meal we can serve for 10 cents with the Government aid. These children could not pay the actual cost of these meals.

The Cecil Avenue School pupils come from better homes for the most part, but many are children of working mothers and need a hot, nourishing meal. Cafeteria attendance at this school has increased about 80 percent this year.

We can't express how much we appreciate the help received from the War Food Administration. Without this, we would be forced to charge prices that would exclude the very children who need the food, or close our cafeterias.

This House had some debate on the school-lunch program a short time ago in which the opponents had a field day. I would urge every Member to read the RECORD of March 7, and I am asking for permission to extend my remarks in order to discuss and answer every argument made by the spokesmen who condemned this program.

Careful reading of the statements of opponents of the school-lunch program as expressed on the floor of this House on March 7, indicates that their opposition was generally based on one or more of the following:

First. That this is a problem of local and community responsibility and the Federal Government should not be "barging in."

Second. Much of the program is in rural areas, and it is not necessary to supply children with school lunches in rural areas since these areas produce their own food.

Third. Federal expenditures on school lunches increase the national debt and now is the time to economize.

Fourth. There are no agricultural surpluses now and there is no point in having a program using section 32 funds.

Fifth. There are no needy people now and, therefore, there is no excuse to continue a program that was urged in the depression.

Sixth. This is an effort to regiment individuals who should be left to their own devices.

What are the facts with respect to each one of these allegations?

First. Is it true that communities can and will take care of this problem themselves without the aid of the Federal Government? Every member who will discuss this matter with local citizens will find that this is not true. I do not need to remind the Representatives from many of the States that their resources have not been adequate to provide lunches for all who need them and cannot pay for them. I do not need to remind Representatives from every urban area that the local funds available to communities are not always sufficient. Where they are sufficient, there is no reason why the Federal funds should be made available. The Federal contribution depends upon the requests for assistance by the local community and their own certification of need. That should be sufficient protection to all of us that the funds will not be spent unless and except where need of Federal assistance exists.

The reports from the War Food Administration indicate that on the average for every dollar the Federal Government is spending, local and State authorities are putting up the equivalent of $2 to cover all expenses of the school-lunch program. They are generally matching the food expenditures alone, dollar for dollar, and in addition are providing the funds for cooks, dishes, and other phases of the completely local management.

Second. What of the charge that this is an unwise expenditure since most of the children are in rural areas where they should be able to obtain their own food? First, it is correct that of the schools which are benefited under the War Food Administration program, not less than two-thirds of the children are from rural and farm areas. The reason for this is quite obvious. Since the Federal aid is offered where the need is greatest and in accordance with requests for aid, most of the applications come from rural schools.

Under the school-lunch program food is bought in the community from the total funds, including the Federal funds made available for the program. Estimates submitted by the War Food Administration indicated that about 26 percent of the total funds were for dairy products, 22 percent for vegetables, 17 percent for fruits, 13 percent for meats, 8 percent for eggs, 8 percent for cereals, and 4 percent for fats and oils. Many of these commodities were produced in the area in which they were used, but many others came from farm regions all over the United States.

It is unfortunately true that a large part of our low-income families are in rural areas. The fact that they are producers of cotton, wheat, dairy products, and other farm products does not alone make it possible for them or their families to buy or consume all of the food that they need for good health and truly adequate nourishment.

Third. What of the charge that the national debt is increasing and, therefore, we should economize and not spend this money?

Everyone agrees that there must not be any unnecessary spending of funds. But no man should risk the security of his country by arbitrarily striking off an item which has much to do with our own strength and future welfare. Fifty million dollars is a great deal of money. What it is enabling this Government to do is to give communities an average of about 6 cents per child for six to eight million children. From those who can pay, an additional 10 to 15 cents is obtained. For those who cannot pay, the same meal is served free and without any discrimination. It is no contribution to the war or the peace to cast off a worthwhile expenditure in the name of false economy. We have appropriated in this Congress hundreds of millions—in fact hundreds of billions of dollars—for many purposes. I can think of few regular or war emergencies in which the problem of national strength and future security is more at stake than our decision to help communities provide adequate food for school children.

Fourth. What of the point made that there are no agricultural surpluses and therefore there is no need to have a program? The term "surplus" is a tricky one. Farmers can have more of a products than can be sold at a reasonable price at the same time that city people cannot get all they would like to obtain. Every member with agricultural constituents knows that even now we have had and are likely to have many commodity situations in which the farmers will not obtain the price and incomes necessary for continuous production without market support by the Federal Government. Currently the Federal Government is supporting the marketing of potatoes, cabbage, eggs, beets, beans, and there will be others. Some may criticize the Government for not doing a more-effective job. I have done so myself. But certainly Congress will be criticized if it destroys or hampers the outlets which must be developed and maintained if price support is to be successful. It is an elementary matter that neither this Congress nor the country could or would tolerate any activity by which prices were supported while food that could be used was allowed to be dumped or destroyed.

School lunches are a major outlet for price-supported commodities. There has been some unfortunate interpretation of how much of our appropriation is spent for price-support activities under the school-lunch program as it is now operated. The figures, as they have been supplied by the Department, show that for 1943–44 egg and vegetable expenditures are expected to total $25,900,000. About $5,000,000 are being spent on commodities directly by the Government and $21,000,000 are being spent on similar commodities by the local schools using their own and Federal funds. In other words, the total price support expenditure for these commodities which currently require aid is equal to about 60 percent of the Federal expenditures on school lunches for the current fiscal year.

The appropriation, it is said, is getting the Federal Government permanently into a local activity and if extended will involve even larger appropriations. Let us remind ourselves again that the local communities themselves determine whether they wish to participate. The local communities and States are putting up more for this kind of activity than ever before in their history. There may well be a time when no Federal assistance will be necessary, just as there might be a time when no local price support of agricultural production is necessary. But those times have not been reached yet. The true facts are that, with the assistance provided by Federal Government at a very, very nominal cost, local groups are in fact providing more financial assistance than ever before in our history.

Fifth. What of the statement that there is no excuse for continuing a program that was urged in a depression because there are no needy people now? It is true that this program did develop in this country during the depression, though it was quite small then. It is true, also, that there are substantially fewer needy people now than there were in the depression. There is just no question that this country has the highest income on a per capita basis and in total in all its history. It is the worst kind of ignorance and blindness to argue from this, however, that all needy people and needy communities have disappeared. It is still unfortunately true that there are millions of people who have family incomes of less than $1,000 per year, many of them with family incomes less than $500. Some estimates I have seen show that over 6,000,000 families comprising over 20,000,000 persons have total family incomes under $1,000 per year, right now at the peak of our prosperity.

Sixth. Is it true, as has been charged, that the assistance of the Federal Government in this feeding activity is simply regimentation of individuals? This charge is utterly untrue. As the War Food Administration conducts its share of the program, the local communities run the school lunches, hire their own personnel, and do all their own food preparation. The end result is a fine community achievement, for the program offers all children the opportunity to get a nutritious meal regardless of the amount of money that their parents may have. That is not regimentation.

We have talked about school lunches in terms of price support, in terms of marketing, and in terms of commodities. The activities have a meaning for all these. But it does not detract from these or make them any less significant, that the school-lunch program makes a substantial contribution toward assuring our children of health. It is still true, even though we have heard it many times, that our draft rejections are very large, and many are created or aggravated by malnutrition. It is still true that the Director of the Selective Service and other military leaders have warned us of this and recommended, as a matter of national safety, better nourishment for our growing children.

It is more true now than ever that with millions of women working on farms and factories, children are dependent upon a good hot meal at school to keep them healthy. Proper feeding of children is a first priority in our war economy.

It is very difficult to translate achievement of the school-lunch program into words. Many Members of this House may, as I have done, have gone to some of the schools to see how the program really works. When you have seen it in operation, seen the children thoroughly enjoy their food, and talked to the teachers about what the program is doing for attendance, discipline, and studies, you cannot fail to believe, as I do, that this is one of the truly great things that this Government has developed and which we cannot permit to be lost.

The Story of a Great American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Philip Pearl which appeared in the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Service of March 21, 1944, relative to Mrs. Paul Szymanski. Mrs. Szymanski and her family reside in the First Congressional District of Michigan. They are my constituents. Not only the people of my district but all the people of the city of Detroit feel highly honored and proud of this great American family.

This is the story of a great American. Her name is Mrs. Paul Szymanski. She is a member of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and she is employed by the American Lady Corset Co. at Detroit, making parachutes.

Mrs. Szymanski had seven sons. Two have died for their country, one in India, another in Africa. Four others are serving in the armed forces. Her youngest boy, Harold, has a few months to go before he joins the Army Air Corps.

We are indebted to Justice, official organ of the I. L. G. W. U., for the story of this frail, gray-haired war mother who is a little bewildered at the attention that has been showered upon her. She feels she has done no more than should be expected of an American citizen. Let us see.

She was born in Detroit and until she was placed aboard a train for Washington recently she had never been outside Wayne County. Her husband has been in a hospital for more than a year.

"I KEEP UP ALL RIGHT"

Her employers say she is one of the best of the sewing operators. She rises each morning at 5 o'clock and sees that Harold gets ready for school. She is at her machine at 7 o'clock and she works until 3.

Then she returns to her home at 7685 Helen Avenue and does her housework, prepares the dinner, and, when the dishes are washed, she sits down to write to her boys, the boys who are in Africa, Europe, California, and one whose only address is "Overseas."

The letters done, she cooks things that can be sent to the boy in California—cookies and cakes he loves so well. It is late when she finishes her tasks, and that leaves few hours in which to sleep.

"I keep up all right," she said. "I'm just doing what anyone can do. I don't see why anyone should be interested.

"I have lost two boys, and I pray each night that the war may end and the others come home.

"Raymond didn't die right away. Before he died he told his captain he knew he was going to die, and he wished—he wished someone would kiss his mother for him—I—guess that's why the President kissed me. He knew about it.

KISSED BY THE PRESIDENT

"I've never been away from Detroit before. I was so—so green about traveling. But the Red Cross looked after me. I was one of 57 Gold Star mothers who saw the President—mothers from all over the United States. It was comforting to talk to him. I don't seem to be able to remember what he said—just that moment when he kissed me—just a touch of the lips on my cheek. I can't ever forget that, of course.

"My oldest boy, Leonard, is in Africa. Robert, who's a sergeant, is overseas and so is Tony. Arthur is a Marine. Edward died almost 2 years ago in Africa—I have pictures of their graves—their buddies sent them.

"When Harold goes I'll be all alone. But I'll keep things going so when they come home there will be a home to come to and—What? Bonds? Of course, I bought bonds in every drive, including this one. I couldn't let my boys down."

Mrs. Szymanski's name may be hard to spell and even harder to pronounce. But she is the kind of American we of the labor movement can well be proud of. She is doing her job. She is doing her best to win the war regardless of sacrifices. She is not letting anyone down. May she be spared further suffering!

What We're Fighting For

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of March 27, 1944:

WHAT WE'RE FIGHTING FOR

Astonishing at this crucial hour, is the letter in which 14 Congressmen, most of them from the Midwest, ask Secretary of State Hull the question: "What are we fighting for?"

Where, in the name of all that's sensible, have they been keeping themselves? It's pretty late in the day for Congressmen, whatever their constituencies, to be seeking this information.

There is much that remains to be clarified regarding our Government's attitude on France, Poland, Finland, the Baltic States, and other controversial issues.

But certainly there is no mystery, in the State Department or elsewhere, surrounding the fact that we are fighting this war to make a world in which American democracy can live and where, as the President, has said, tyranny and aggression cannot exist.

This startling letter is in a very different category from most of the recent pleas for more light on United States foreign policy. The other day another group of Congressmen conferred with Mr. Hull without, some of them said later, learning much about the Government's views on international problems now clamoring for solution.

But the 14 midwesterners appear less concerned with post-war settlements and foreign policy in general than with the phrase "unconditional surrender" and the future of the German people.

"If the declaration labeled 'unconditional surrender' is still the official objective," they say, "some elaboration of that phrase is in order. Does it mean extermination of the German people and utter destruction of their country? If not, what does it mean?"

It doesn't seems to us that the phrase "unconditional surrender," as applied to either Germany or Japan, needs any elaboration. It means just what it says—the unqualified capitulation of the aggressors' armed forces.

Unconditional surrender has nothing whatever to do with the future of the German people. The 14 Congressmen should know that the Allies have not the slightest intention of obliterating the German people. They are resolved to curb Germany's war-making proclivities, but the way in which it is to be done is, primarily, a peace conference matter.

Secretary Hull is reported to have taken to Moscow a plan for post-war Germany which Britain and Russia did not find acceptable. He is now said to have a program for an international peace organization almost ready for congressional discussion. Meanwhile the United States Chamber of Commerce is urging immediate formation of an international commission to draft a world peace plan.

These are constructive measures. But the point is that Secretary Hull and his Department right now have enough real worries and perplexities without having to take time out to answer the dubiously inspired query, "What are we fighting for?"

It is at least noteworthy that publication of the Congressmen's letter coincides with release of an open letter to President Roosevelt by the Peace Now Movement in which the President is urged to use his influence for an immediate end of the war.

This is, of course, a defeatist proposal. Any compromise peace at this time would be, in effect, a peace on our brutal enemies' terms. To the vast majority of Americans the mere thought of a negotiated peace with Nazi or Japanese barbarians is revolting.

By the same token the 14 Congressmen's concern over unconditional surrender and What are we fighting for? is defeatist in essence and utterly ill-advised.

We are fighting for freedom and justice. The enduring peace which we are determined to set up demands, first of all, an Allied victory on terms of unconditional surrender. Nothing less will suffice.

The Late Jesse Samuel Cottrell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the death of Jesse Samuel Cottrell in Washington at 6 a. m. on Friday, March 24, marked the close of a colorful career. Born on a farm, in what is locally known as "South America" near Knoxville, Knox County, Tenn., Mr. Cottrell was the eldest of the five children of Samuel H. and Telitha Anne (Simpson) Cottrell. His maternal grandfather was Jesse Simpson, the first man to string a wire across the Tennessee River for a water-current propelled ferry, which he operated for 40 years.

As a boy, he worked on the farm, attended the public schools of Knox County, was a student for 3 years in the academic department of the University of Tennessee, and then transferred to the law department of that institution, from which he was graduated in 1904.

As a young lawyer, in 1907, he was elected as a Republican to the lower house of the Tennessee Legislature from the counties of Knox and Loudon. Reflecting the views and carrying out the wishes of his constituents, he supported "dry" legislation against the opposition of the then "wet" Governor of Tennessee, Malcolm R. Patterson.

His legislative duties ended, he was successively reporter and city editor for the Knoxville Sentinel. Answering the call of the West, he went to Arizona, where, under Gov. J. C. Hughes, he was for a year, in 1908, the managing editor of the Arizona Daily Star.

Returning to Knoxville, he took up educational work. He made the race for county superintendent of public instruction of Knox County and was defeated by only 2 votes in the county court. In the qualifying examination for eligibility for the office, he made a grade of 95 in 19 studies and was issued a life certificate.

As a captain in the Military Intelligence in World War No. 1, he arrested Grover Cleveland Bergdoll as a draft dodger at Philadelphia.

His wife, the former Miss Mary Elizabeth James, of Knoxville, was with him at the time he was fatally stricken. He is also survived by a daughter, Miss Betty Ann Cottrell, of La Paz, Peru, and a sister, Mrs. Monroe Johnson, of Knoxville.

The pole star of his life was honor. He made friends by being honest, and he grappled them to his heart with hooks of steel, because they knew they could trust him. He enjoyed the friendship and confidence of many of the great men of the Nation over a period of more than 35 years, but he never lost the common touch. He delighted to meet and talk to his boyhood friends in Knox County, and his outdoor sport was working in his garden.

He was devoted to his wife, who was his coworker in their representation as Washington correspondents of the Nashville Banner, the Birmingham News, the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer, Greenville (S. C.) News and Piedmont, Watertown (N. Y.) Daily Times, Troy (N. Y.) Record, and the Manchester (N. H.) Union Leader. He was a reporter always, and in his work in Tennessee he covered the Fraterville explosion, which took a toll of 189 lives in a coal mine explosion at Briceville; the campaigns of Bob and Alf Taylor; and the Carmack-Patterson race for Governor, which took him into virtually every county in the State.

He was also secretary to United States Senato Newell Sanders, Tennessee's only Republican Senator. He was appointed by President Harding, who was his personal friend, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Bolivia. He occupied this post for 7½ years. While holding this post he was commissioned by Presidents Harding and Coolidge to represent them at the inauguration of seven South American presidents, to two centennials, and two boundary commissions.

His health impaired by the high altitude of Bolivia, he declined further appointment offered him by President Hoover. He then managed Frank Hitchcock's Tucson Daily Citizen for 4 years and engaged in writing on Latin-American life. He was the author of several books on Latin America, his most famous volume being Across the Andes From Ocean to Ocean.

Educator, legislator, diplomat, soldier, famed correspondent, a typical Tennesseean, and a great American, Jesse Samuel Cottrell traveled far in his journey from the red hills of South Knoxville to the Capital City at Washington where at the time of his death, he was vice chairman of the board of governors of the National Press Club and a member of the White House Correspondents Association.

He was buried in Arlington National Cemetery with full military honors on Monday of this week.

He fell asleep full of years and full of honors—a great Tennesseean and a great American.

The following editorial from the Nashville Banner sets his life forever in the "amber of memory" and is a just tribute to him:

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner]

JESSE S. COTTRELL

To every reader of the Banner, the byline of Jesse S. Cottrell has been familiar for many years. It appears today—though Jesse Cottrell died this morning—because it was Jesse Cottrell's way to work to the last moment. Friends know, knowing Jesse, that when the summons came, it found his desk cleared; his daily task finished; his next assignment eagerly awaited.

The Banner has lost a friend, a faithful family member whose long and distinguished service earned for him a reputation among Washington's best-informed newspaper correspondents, whose sound political judgment was second to none in the Capital, who intimately knew every national political leader of the last 30 years, and whose high journalistic ethics were the pattern of his life. This broad acquaintance with men and events, and the qualities of its possessor, ranked Jesse Cottrell at the top of his profession. He was one of the last of the old-time newspaper reporters.

His was a varied career. Tennesseeans whose minds go back a generation will recall him as a State legislator. World War No. 1 recollections will identify him as a soldier in his country's service—the Army officer who led to capture of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, draft-dodger. Diplomatic records contain the history of his long service as the American representative at Bolivia, and outstanding work in the realm of diplomacy in the South American field. Presidents sought his service and his counsel. They knew him as confidant, trusted emissary, and friend.

The Banner knew him as all of these, and as the man best entrusted with the important task of representing it, and reporting for it, at the seat of the National Government. It esteemed him for that accuracy, that personal integrity, that judgment, which marked every line he wrote. That was Jesse Cottrell's way.

His death shocks and saddens the Banner. Men of Jesse Cottrell's stature are not so plentiful that one can pass without being sorely missed. We salute the memory of a man who humbly walked the path of journalistic greatness, whose pride was in his profession, and whose career was the epitome of success according to the enduring standards.

Urges Single Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a letter from a constituent, Mr. Fred Whitmore, 339 West Maple Street, Kalamazoo, Mich., to the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Whitmore is an ardent proponent of the single-tax system. He has been a student of the subject for many years. His letter follows:

KALAMAZOO, MICH., March 22, 1944.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, House Ways and Means Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: According to a press article of March 19, I see your committee has drafted a plan of simplification of the tax return, eliminating the need of 30,000,000 people making a tax report next year; nevertheless, they do have to report the amount of their incomes in a fortune teller's guesswhat report. Naturally all these reports by individuals will require the attention of politicians.

Also, the withholding tax turned in with lengthy reports by private enterprise requires an endless study figuring out whether these individuals are entitled to refunds or if they have to make extra tax payment.

This complication is going to be a very costly set-up for business in general; it will take thousands more personnel to make the extra red tape that this will create in private enterprise, and I believe it will be still more complicated for the Internal Revenue.

You certainly realize as well as I do, there are multiplied thousands of people working in this Department that could just as well be either in the channels of production or in the armed forces as to be making this unnecessary red tape, and if this present method goes through and is adopted and becomes law, you are going to find the same thing happening that did when the withholding tax of last year was adopted; you and your committee at that time thought you were simplifying the tax structure, and when it was adopted into law and began to function you admitted it was the worst complicated piece of legislation ever drafted.

Now in drafting this legislation to eliminate the necessity of 30,000,000 people making a tax report you have only shifted the burden from the individual to a bureaucratic agency which will bring a great deal more unnecessary red tape and a greater expense to the people, and the individual that has any intelligence at all will figure out for himself, if he has any extra tax to pay or a refund and the amount thereof, in order to know the honesty of these bureaucrats.

I don't have to tell you the plan I have already placed before you and your committee shows how I go back to 1913 when the present law was adopted and by statistics from the Library of Congress prove how we could of had one single tax to cover Federal, State, and local taxes and security benefits, eliminating every other kind of tax, giving security from that day to this, to every American citizen, from the cradle to the grave, and making it so simple a 10-year-old child could understand it, and no necessity for a tax return having to be filed by anyone from then on, this would eliminate millions from the pay roll of the Government, placing them in the channels of production and producing for the good of society.

I heartily agree it is impossible to simplify the tax structure by merely rewriting the tax reports, we would have to go into the tax structure itself and we must go to the fullest extent in rewriting the tax law and abolish every duplicating agency as every tax a person can pay must come from a source of income and have one single tax.

In order to accomplish this we must stabilize the national income and this plan accomplishes these very things and as an American citizen I plead with you, your committee, and the Congress of these United States to give me a fair and just public hearing so that this plan can be placed before Congress and the people before going ahead with this present bill you have prepared.

I am, yours respectfully,

FRED WHITMORE.

Federal Action Would Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer:

FEDERAL ACTION WOULD HELP

Tucked away in a river and harbor improvement bill passed by the House is a provision that might prove of vast importance in ridding the Schuylkill of its pollution.

This is the authorization of immediate surveys to determine feasible methods of eliminating coal wastes from the stream, in order to aid navigation, diminish flood dangers and help to improve the water supply of Philadelphia.

Government action in this matter would be extremely helpful. Washington now spends a considerable annual sum dredging the navigable portion of the Schuylkill below Fairmount Dam. It would be an economy in the long run to remove the silt from the whole stretch of the river, while at the same time, of course, making sure that additional coal wastes are not emptied into the Schuylkill at the mines.

Large-scale dredging operations and settling basin construction might have to await the cessation of the war, but the survey authorized in this measure could be undertaken without delay, paving the way for future post-war projects.

Town of Washington, Va., the First Washington of All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the current discussion of which of the 28 communities in the United States named for the Father of Our Country was the first to so honor him prompts my correspondent, Mr. Henry P. Alden, to write me the following letter showing that Washington, Va., situate in Rappahannock County, of the Seventh Virginia Congressional District, antedated all of the other 27 by more than 27 years:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1944.

Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

In re: Town of Washington, Va., the first Washington of all.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROBERTSON: The attached article, captioned "Dispute arises over first town named for George Washington," appeared Saturday afternoon in the Washington Evening Star. It is noted that the statements therein set forth are attributed to Representative BROWN of Georgia; STEARNS of New Hampshire; and BONNER, of North Carolina. The statements in this article are so at variance with the real facts, it is believed that you would be interested in correcting the same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is a known fact, and having been verified from time to time, that the town of Washington, Va., in the county of Rappahannock, and your congressional district, is in fact the first Washington of all, having been surveyed and platted by George Washington July 24, 1749 (old calendar), and which, under the new calendar, would be August 4, 1749, and antedating any other town or city in the United States named Washington by more than 27 years. In fact, there is of record town lots in Washington, Va., which were conveyed and deeded by lot number, name of street, and the name Washington, Va., as far back as September 1752. There were land warrants issued and of record in the Fairfax surveys conveying lots in the town of Washington, Va., by lot numbers as far back as 1751.

Your special attention is directed to the September 1932 issue of the American Philatelist, the official organ of the American Philatelic Society, which issue, I am sure, is available at the Congressional Library, which contains an article of considerable length by J. A. Oettinger and captioned "The twenty-eight Washingtons." Mr. Oettinger is not only a philatelist but is a recognized historian. After years of investigation and at considerable length he has set forth a résumé of each of the 28 Washingtons, and in the order each was established or named. On a separate sheet I have copied from this article, which I have attached hereto, the names of the 28 Washingtons as listed by Mr. Oettinger and in the order that the same were laid out or named.

It is noted that in the attached list Mr. Oettinger sets forth that Washington, N. C., was laid out and/or named in October 1776, and that Washington, N. H., was likewise laid out or named in December 1776. In this connection it appears that John M. Maphis, of New York, some 15 years previous, likewise compiled a short history of the 28 Washingtons in the United States, and on or about the same time another historian by the name of Herbert or Huber Carter likewise compiled and printed a pamphlet with reference to all towns named Washington. Both Mr. Maphis' and Mr. Carter's articles were identical with that of Mr. Oettinger's, with the exception that Washington, N. H., was listed as the second Washington by that name, it having been first originally known as No. 8, which name was later changed to Camden and later still to Washington, N. H., under date of December 13, 1776 (old calendar), which would be December 24, 1776 under the new calendar. Both Mr. Maphis and Mr. Carter agreed that it was true that Col. James Bonner, who resided at the village known as Forks of the Tar, N. C., sold a few lots under date of December 7, 1776 (old calendar), which under the new calendar would be December 18, 1776, and which deed referred to the intended township as Washington, N. C. While it is true that Colonel Bonner and his wife Mary so deeded certain of said lots, it is further true that the Forks of the Tar, N. C., did not become known as Washington, N. C., until 1782.

Your attention is also directed to a pamphlet captioned "Common speech," volume V, first quarter, 1933. This pamphlet was apparently published by the English Speaking Union of the United States with national headquarters at 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York, which contains an article on page 8 that refers to Washington, Va., as the first Washington and as stating that documentary evidence showed that George Washington surveyed the same himself in 1749.

Enclosed herewith is also a history of the town of Washington, Va., which was published by that corporation on or before 1931.

It is suggested that you obtain a copy of the issue of the September 1932 American Philatelist from the Congressional Library, and it is felt sure you will find that it is without question that Washington, Va., is the first Washington of all, having been surveyed, platted, and named August 4, 1749 (new calendar), the old calendar being July 24, 1749.

I feel sure you will take pleasure in correcting the attached article, which is absurd. Washington, Va., antidates all other Washingtons by more than 27 years.

Very truly yours,

HENRY P. ALDEN.

The following is from an article that appeared in the September 1932 issue of the American Philatelist by Mr. J. A. Oettinger, which said article was captioned "The 28 Washingtons—in the order of having been laid out, founded, or renamed as Washington:"

Our "Friends" Glare at Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. COLE
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Joseph (Mo.) News-Press of March 26, 1944:

OUR "FRIENDS" GLARE AT US

Out of Washington comes a statement designed to clarify our foreign policy. Secretary of State Hull, with the Atlantic Charter before him, writes learnedly of our post-war objectives, but in aiming at the ideal we fear he has overlooked the practical and the realistic. In short, he leaves our foreign policy about where it was. He fails to answer questions that inevitably will arise at the peace table.

For example, he looks to the big four, to the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China, to keep the peace after arms are stacked, and adds: "The four-nation declaration eventually will end the need of alliances, balance of power politics, and other special arrangements common to international affairs in the unhappy past."

This is Mr. Roosevelt's view as well as Mr Hull's, we assume, but is it the Churchill view? And what will Josef Stalin think of it? No foreign policy will be worth the paper it's written on unless in accord with the policy of our allies.

The London Times, which often echoes British policy, last Monday remarked editorially: "The division of Europe into 20 or 30 sovereign independent units, owing no allegiance to any higher authority, is incompatible with the military security and economic well-being of the European peoples. This is a hard, irrefutable fact. To attempt to override it on the general theory of self-determination would be an act not of high political principle but of political madness."

So much for the English view of autonomous little states, but how are we going to reconcile this with the third paragraph of the Atlantic Charter, which provides that "they (signatory states) respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been favorably deprived of them."

Thus the Roosevelt-Hull idealism comes into collision with cold, hard facts. Even now Russia, one of our esteemed allies, is in the act of subjugating the little Baltic countries of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Finland, and parts of Poland. What would the Washington administration have us do about that? Go to war with Russia to maintain an abstract principle? And if not, then what becomes of self-determination? Mr. Hull doesn't say.

Europe is a house of fear and of hate. The United States can't hope to recite rules of conduct and have those rules respected. Europe looks upon us as a smug and impertinent interloper. We go there, as we got into South America, with a program of paternalism. We talk grandly of uplift and culture. Our noblesse oblige is offensive. In our good-neighbor policy we try to buy friendship with money, and our good Latin friends resent it, just as Europeans will resent our telling them how they shall order their affairs when peace comes.

As Senator REED, of Kansas, says, "The post-war situation will be just about what Great Britain and Russia want it to be, and the United States will have to like it." We may expect little good will for America. Its Government will have so contrived its policies that it won't have a friend in the world. We came out of the other war in much the same condition, but it will be worse this time.

A Blow at Opium

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the American edition of the Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury of March 17, 1944:

A BLOW AT OPIUM

Congressman WALTER JUDD is so consistently right about the Far East, which he well knows by first-hand experience, that we have fallen into a sound habit of agreeing with him. This habit is strengthened by perusal of his House Joint Resolution 241, requesting the President to urge upon the governments of poppy-growing countries the necessity of immediately limiting production to strictly medicinal and scientific needs.

We hope Congress gives prompt approval to this measure. It would put teeth into the recent declaration by the British and Dutch Governments that they will not reestablish government opium monopolies in areas formerly under their control and now occupied by Japan.

While we are on the subject, another question may be raised. India is both a large producer and a large consumer of opium. Much of the consumption is classed as semi-medical; this is opium eaten, not smoked, and not classed with smoked opium yet similar in its effects. A royal commission some years ago estimated that 21 to 23 percent of India's gross revenues came from opium. Will not Britain, even though at some financial sacrifice, voluntarily limit India's monopoly sales to medicinal and scientific needs? Surely it should not be necessary that a territory go through a period of Japanese occupation to become eligible for cleansing from the opium habit.

Low Egg Prices Hit Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, many farmers and farmers' wives are writing and telegraphing me for explanations regarding the drop in egg prices. One telegram from Nebraska tells me that eggs there are selling for 20 cents a dozen. Some of the farmers say they were urged to raise more hens in order to increase the egg production. They also complained that the Government had stopped the purchase of eggs in the Middle West. I took this matter up with the Department and am informed that the Government will again start purchasing eggs in the Middle West at 100 percent of parity. This may relieve the situation slightly, but I do not believe it will be entirely effective due to several reasons.

One reason is that I have been informed that there just is not sufficient cold-storage space in the country to store the gigantic volume of eggs we have on hand and which are being produced. This shortage of cold-storage space is general over the country, I am reliably informed.

Another reason for the tremendous supply of eggs is that while the Department of Agriculture asked the farmers for an increase of 2½ percent of eggs, the increase in reality has been around 16 percent. That and the increase in egg production due to mild weather are contributing factors to this great supply of eggs.

Then, too, I am told ships for lend-lease have not been calling at our ports recently to take away the huge quantity of eggs and other farm products. Why these ships have not been calling has not been explained, but that may be a military secret.

However, somthing must be done to relieve the plight of the men and women who are producing our badly needed foodstuffs. These patriotic people were told to raise more eggs and they have done so. But they are now producing at a tremendous loss due to the high prices of feed. I urge that some better methods of distribution of eggs and other farm products must be devised. There is no reason why eastern eggs should be sent to the Midwest where we are smothered with eggs. As an illustration I include in my remarks an editorial published in a recent issue of the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald touching on this subject:

FREE EGGS

Poultrymen in Nebraska and Iowa have responded so nobly to the Government's appeals for more food production that the two States are surfeited with eggs. No one knows precisely what to do with all the output, although Government and the grocers are cooperating in a sort of eat-more-eggs campaign, and hoping for the best.

In the face of that situation it was learned last week that State institutions of Nebraska and Iowa had been receiving free eggs from a Government bureau, shipped here from an Eastern State—probably Connecticut. One Iowa institution received a 3-month supply in one shipment. The purchasing agent of the Iowa State Board of Control is quoted as saying, "They give them to us and pay the freight, so we have no complaint to make."

And probably purchasing agents in Connecticut will have no complaint to make if the Government offers to provide free eggs from Iowa and Nebraska for their institutions. In recent years we have all become such beggars that few of us ever think to question anything that comes to us "for free" from Uncle Sam.

But tomorrow's Federal taxpayers may have a few questions to ask if they ever get to looking back over the books and notice the billions that were spent for food subsidies. It may seem strange to them that their money was used in the fabulously prosperous year of 1944 to buy eggs for State hospitals—and to pay part of the grocery bill of every man, woman, and child in the Republic.

What Shall Be Done With Surplus Industrial Plants?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, when World War No. 2 broke out, no country on earth had a capacity for industrial production comparable with that of the United States. Under our system of free enterprise, the American people possessed an investment of almost $30,000,000,000 in industrial plants and equipment. These plants and this equipment poured out the abundance of consumers' goods which assured for the American people a standard of living unequalled by any people in the world. The success of the free enterprise system in developing prosperous industries and in creating for the American people exceptional comforts was a powerful barrier against the theories of foreign philosophers headed by Karl Marx that government ownership of capital, in which he included what we call plant and equipment, would assure to the common man a bigger share in the wealth of the nation. Socialism and communism found few adherents outside a small group of pink theorists at our eastern colleges. The American people, capitalists and wage earners alike, knew perfectly well that with its weaknesses, with occasional abuses, private enterprise was vastly more successful than any other system in operation in the world. It was common knowledge that the one big country that had staked its fate on Karl Marx's theories, namely, the Soviet Union, had a standard of living lower than any other country in the western world, and that this universal poverty was fully shared by the working people for whose particular benefit the communistic system was established.

It is an amazing, and greatly disturbing fact that, in the emergency of war, this Nation of free enterprise, our great, rich, America, has been carried along on the road toward state socialism. In order to make possible the staggering demand on industrial production, including numerous new items such as tanks, combat planes, guns, and ammunition, the Government has invested some $15,000,000,000 in new plants and new equipment. This is in addition to other billions expended on the building of merchant ships and the construction of airfields all over the world. Government-owned plants and machinery are now a very substantial part of the total industrial equipment of this country. It is obvious that this situation poses tremendous problems to be faced by our people at the close of the war, and that these problems must be faced squarely and solved on the basis of American principles. I feel safe in stating that the American people, or at least the vastly overwhelming majority in this country, want to uphold the American system of free enterprise, and want no experiment or experience in state socialism or communism.

Some war plants, but I am afraid it may be only a small part of them, will be able to continue right on with production for civilian consumption. Many more plants must almost immediately stop present production, because there will be no more need for additional tanks, bazookas, and parachutes. Some of these war plants will quickly be reequipped to produce civilian goods. It should not take such a long time to make and install new machinery for the plants which now build jeeps, to produce new automobiles for civilians. Factories now turning out flame throwers may conceivably soon be able to devote themselves to giving us new vacuum cleaners, or fire extinguishers, and so forth. There appears to be little disagreement that this kind of war factories, as far as possible, shall be turned over to private ownership. It is quite obvious that to do so in a fair way, and in a financially possible way, is a tremendously difficult and complicated problem. It can be solved and must be solved if the people of this Nation intend again to run their Government and terminate the present state of affairs under which the bureaucrats run the Government and the Nation.

Assuming that a program of reconversion has been executed successfully, and that all governmentally owned plants and equipment that can possibly be used in profitable production under private ownership has been disposed of by the Government, there will still remain on its hands a tremendous amount of factories and machinery, ships and military planes which will be a liability and a very serious problem. In the war emergency, the question of cost has been a very secondary consideration. In many cases essential production has had to be carried on regardless of cost. Mines have had to be opened and operated which, under peace conditions, cannot possibly be economically utilized on a commercial basis. There is no doubt that we must squarely face the necessity of writing off a huge amount of governmental investments as war losses.

Owen L. Scott, an outstanding Washington student of affairs, has recently made an interesting study on these problems, and I believe it to be very much worth while for us to study briefly some of his findings. There is, for instance, the question of the investment of $750,000,000 in synthetic-rubber factories. The President has announced that he will oppose any effort, after the war, of protecting this new industry by tariff barriers. The President is of the opinion that artificial rubber can never be produced as cheaply as natural rubber, although our occasional experience with the British and the Dutch who controlled our supply of natural rubber would seem to disprove his theory, and that it is more important that the American people buy tires at the lowest possible cost than it is to maintain the new artificial rubber industry. If the President has his way, this $750,000,000 must be written off as a total loss. It might well be doubted whether the problem is so simple as a calculation of relative costs, based on present-day technological achievements.

Who knows whether new inventions and new techniques may not in a few years make it possible to produce artificial rubber more cheaply than natural rubber can be obtained. Such a development has been experienced in many other new industries. I should certainly be hesitant in deliberately destroying a domestic industry which conceivably might make this Nation independent of foreign supplies which, as we now experience, may be cut off to the great inconvenience and perhaps the danger of everyone. It is true that the British and the Dutch are gravely concerned that we reappear as customers of natural rubber from their possessions in the Far East, but in this connection, also, I am convinced we should pay some attention to the interests of America.

Mr. Speaker, another difficult problem will be what to do with our vast new merchant marine. Before the war this country controlled only 15 percent of the world's merchant shipping. After the war we shall own one-half of the ships of a vastly greater merchant marine than that which existed before the war. Many of our Liberty ships are admittedly rush jobs, and of standards which cannot possibly compete on a commercial basis with modern, carefully built ships. We may scrap them or we may, as it has been suggested, try to give them away. Having disposed of these ships in one way or another, we shall still have a huge merchant fleet on our hands, and we shall again face the situation that this country cannot, in general, operate merchant ships in competition with other nations without subsidies. If we want to have these ships sailing the American flag on the seven seas, we must be ready to have the Treasury pay the deficit in the form of subsidies. What to do with our shipyards, large and small, and how to find other employment for hundreds of thousands of shipyard workers is a serious problem, but it must be solved.

Equally difficult problem confront us in connection with the vastly over-expanded aircraft industry. At present we can produce some 100,000 military aircraft a year. Even if we are able to expand commercial aviation tremendously, say 10 times what it was before the war, we shall need only 5 or 10 percent of the present manufacturing capacity. Of course, we may hope that private enterprise will be able to use some of the buildings for other types of industrial production, but however that may be, staggering write-offs seem inevitable.

It has repeatedly been suggested that we might, at the end of the war, give away our surplus plants and machinery to other countries under lend-lease. It seems to me that this is a suggestion of very doubtful merit. It is most unlikely that any considerable amount of second-hand industrial equipment can be shipped any distance without incurring prohibitive costs. Even if it were possible on a limited scale, it would in no way eliminate or reduce the financial losses our people face or have to face. It is safe to say that all over this country, and particularly along the eastern and western seaboards and in the Detroit area, numerous idle plants will remain as tragic monuments of the most tragic event in human history. We shall face tremendous problems, much more difficult than that of winning the war, and we shall face those problems with a national economy shaken by some 15 years of continuous deficits in our national budget, by some 15 years of extravagant—yes, fantastic—public spending, and by some 15 years of growing public debt. It will take all the courage, all the ingenuity, all the enterprise of every American citizen to carry our Nation safely through the maelstrom, and to avoid being plunged into Marxistic state socialism or even communism. The one bright hope, however, is to be found in the courage, sound common sense, great resourcefulness, and energy of the liberty-loving American people. They will meet these issues—and overcome them.

T. V. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the continued operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority as a nonpolitical agency of the Federal Government is of vital importance to the people of this Nation.

The people of this county are the owners of this $700,000,000 electric power generating and distribution system. Through this agency the T. V. A. is furnishing electric power to hundreds of vital war plants. That there should be no interference with its honest, efficient, and nonpolitical operation and contribution to the war effort is forcibly set forth in the following editorial from the New York Times of Wednesday, March 29:

THE M'KELLAR AMENDMENTS

The House of Representatives now has before it the $8,000,000,000 independent offices appropriations bill, to which the Senate has tacked two amendments proposed by Senator McKELLAR, of Tennessee. To get these amendments into place the Senate majority had to maintain that they were not new legislation, just as it might have voted, had another sort of parliamentary question arisen, that two and two do not make four. They are, in fact, by the layman's standard, new laws and were put in the appropriations bill because the President can't veto a big appropriation measure. One of them requires the Tennessee Valley Authority to turn its funds at quarterly intervals into the general fund of the Treasury, drawing money out of the Treasury only by specific appropriation. The funds are already amply safeguarded. There has been no scandal. The effect of the amendment can only be to make it difficult or impossible for the T. V. A. to carry on its business. The amendment is a drastic alteration in T. V. A.'s charter. The Senate also voted itself one of the biggest patronage grabs in history, by requiring senatorial confirmation of all appointments to executive agencies carrying salaries of $4,500 or more.

The Senate tinkered with the bill in other ways, but these were its shining contributions, made after long debate and with delicate attention to the parliamentary proprieties and absolute neglect of numerous important questions. The House is asked to "compromise" in conference. There is no respectable compromise on either of the two points mentioned. The one is legislation by indirection, intended to hamstring T. V. A. in the midst of its contribution of electric power to war industries. The other is devised to dilute the personnel of the executive agencies by putting "political hacks" ahead of qualified experts. The House ought to know what to do.

Four Freedoms at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article taken from the Hunterdon County Democrat, an independent newspaper dedicated to the principles of true democracy, and published in my congressional district, which is indicative of what the people in New Jersey are thinking about today.

It is my opinion that along with winning the war, the people of New Jersey are concerned about the safeguarding of freedom at home. This is evidenced by the crossroads meetings so ably described in the article quoted below:

Two hundred citizens who attended a meeting in the courthouse last Thursday night signed a statement aligning themselves with a fight for the four home-front freedoms that had previously been adopted at a similar meeting in the fire house at Washington Crossing 3 weeks earlier.

Speakers from the platform as well as from the floor, with two exceptions, supported the four home-front freedoms.

The home-front freedoms adopted at the first of the crossroads meetings in Mercer County and endorsed at the meeting in Flemington are as follows:

"Freedom from bureaucracy, red tape, and wasteful spending.

"Freedom from supergovernment by labor leaders.

"Freedom of enterprise and individual opportunity.

"Freedom of State and local rights from Federal fuedalism."

When the meeting was opened at 8:20 o'clock nearly every available seat was filled and many were standing in the back of the room. The crowd was estimated at between 275 and 300 people, representing persons of all political faiths and most every economic level.

Edgar H. Wilson of Flemington, chairman of the Hunterdon County Four-Freedoms-On-the-Home-Front Committee, said in opening the meeting that the Colonists who rebelled against England and signed the Declaration of Independence demanded the right to assemble for the redress of their grievances. He said that the Hunterdon County meeting had been called after a similar session had been held at Washington Crossing, where the four home-front freedoms were adopted. Mr. Wilson then presented William H. Blackwell of Washington Crossing, who sent out the letters summoning his neighbors to meet at that place to discuss what might be done to check the trend toward centralization of government in America.

BLACKWELL EXPLAINS MOVEMENT

Mr. Blackwell said that the New Deal is something that everybody talks about but nobody does anything about. He said that the time has arrived to try to effect a turning point in the way things are going in the Nation, and mentioned among the grievances taken up at Washington Crossing were the increasing trends toward regimentation, the evils of price fixing, unwanted subsidies, the overbearing attitude of racketeering labor leaders, and the federalization of State, county, and local government.

Mr. Blackwell read the call of the meeting at Washington Crossing on February 4 and said its objective was not partisan and the response had indicated that the people who took part were interested only in restoring their individual rights, and were ready to use any political party or vehicle to accomplish that end.

PROFESSOR MYERS SPEAKS

Prof. William Starr Myers, of Princeton University, introduced by Mr. Blackwell as the second speaker, declared that while leaders of political parties in America had differed about ways of accomplishing results, they had up until 1932 been in fundamental agreement about basic principles. Thus, he said, Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, Al Smith, and Herbert Hoover would all agree on the basic principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

Professor Myers said that another set of principles had been introduced in America since 1932, based on the idea that the individual is the servant of the state. America, he said, had been founded on the principle that the state is subject to the will of its people.

Discussing the "four freedoms" recently enunciated by President Roosevelt, Professor Myers said that the inclusion of freedom from want and fear can be challenged because "the people have got to free themselves from want and fear." If the State undertakes to free its subjects from want and fear, it must by necessity make them slaves, Professor Myers declared.

"THE RIGHT TO FAIL"

Professor Myers said that an essential right under democratic government is the right to fail, because if a person has the right to fail he also has the right to take another chance and succeed.

Professor Myers said that from his observation the experts at Washington are only "farming the farmers," and are interested in continuing centralization of economic controls after the war.

Professor Myers stated that he had served on the faculty of the War College and knows many of the American commanders intimately.

"Don't worry about the men in command," Professor Myers said. He asserted that they can be depended upon to win the war and that what the American people must concern themselves about is keeping America American so that the boys who return will not find that their freedom has disappeared. To this end he challenged Americans to think things through and not to trade permanent freedom for temporary economic advantage.

VOORHEES SPEAKS

Herbert W. Voorhees, of Skillman, president of the New Jersey Farm Bureau Federation, commended the farmers of Hunterdon County for their outstanding contribution to the war effort in the production of food. He also commended them for the ability to work out their own problems, as evidenced by the success of the Flemington Auction Market.

Mr. Voorhees said that by sticking to fundamental principles and laying by a reserve, the management of the auction had enabled it to withstand the hard times to which it had been subjected under war regulations.

Turning to the domination of labor unions by "notorious labor leaders," Mr. Voorhees said that at least one of these leaders had misunderstood farmer philosophy and thereby had been prevented from organizing producers of foods into a labor union. He said that it would be shocking to know what the world would be if the farmers had had the audacity to strike.

RESPONSIBLE LEADERSHIP NEEDED

Mr. Voorhees said that citizens will have to continue to be vigilant until something is done in the ranks of labor to require responsible leadership.

"Farmers believe in organization, but in a democratic sense," said the speaker in contrasting their organizations with those of industrial labor, which, he said, are dominated from the top.

Mr. Voorhees, turning to the news of the day, said that most people felt the President vetoed the tax bill because it requires labor organizations to file financial statements.

CITES CAMDEN "HOLD-UP"

Turning to New Jersey's contribution of manpower in the war effort, Mr. Voorhees noted that the State leads the Nation in the proportion of men in service. He said citizens must see that the place these men return to affords them freedom and opportunity. He then pictured the situation at Camden last summer when misguided labor leaders refused to let soldiers who volunteered to unload tomatoes do so without first joining their union. He said that the tomatoes would have rotted had not the men in uniform volunteered, as there were miles of loaded trucks backed up at the plant.

"We believe in the rights of labor to organize, but we cannot stomach the actions of some of their leaders," he declared, in calling upon citizens to demand, through the democratic process, laws which require responsibility from those in authority in labor unions.

FREEDOM OF ENTERPRISE

Wheeler McMillen, of Hopewell, editor of Farm Journal, speaking on Freedom of Enterprise and Individual Opportunity, said that almost nothing had happened to better the lot of the plain folks of the world until 1789, when our American Constitution was adopted. This charter, he said, had given to the people of the world more in the way of the comforts of life than anything that had happened in centuries before.

Mr. McMillen asserted that the worst tragedy that could befall the human race would be the decline of the United States. He pictured progress in this country up until 1930 and cited population and production trends to show that more wealth and more jobs were being created in each succeeding decade. The decade from 1930 to 1940, he declared, had shown the opposite trend. He expressed fear that the current period of war bringing death, destruction, despotism, and defeat will place further handicaps on freedom.

Mr. McMillen said that American freedom had produced engines which in turn have raised our production.

"Freemen can do more work and have more things," the speaker declared.

"Our freedom was won by a long, hard fight. It can be lost quickly or little by little by trading it for a bit of security, a bit of temporary advantage."

In closing, he cautioned against dividing our freedom up and trading it off as some in authority would have Americans do at this time, using the war as a means to that end.

JEFFERS PROTESTS RED TAPE

Mr. Wilson resumed chairmanship of the meeting and called upon Henry Jeffers, Jr., of Plainsboro, for some remarks. Mr. Jeffers recounted his experience in replacing a chlorinator at the Walker-Gordon dairy farm and pointed to the waste imposed by centralization of authority and red tape.

DIRT FARMER'S SON

Mr. Wilson asked for other remarks from the floor. A young man in the rear of the room rose and declared that he is a "dirt farmer's son." He charged that previous spokesmen had been beating around the bush, cracking funny jokes, and laughing.

He said that the comment had all been one-sided and apparently designed to influence votes in the forthcoming Presidential election. "The purpose," he said, "is to disrupt the people and get them to go against the President and the war effort."

The young speaker said that subsidies are helping the farmer who sweats in his fields and gets little for his labor.

Asked to identify himself, the speaker said he lives near Upper Black Eddy, Pa., on a 35-acre chicken farm and had attended Frenchtown High School.

Inquiry after the meeting revealed that the speaker was Peter Batkus, who is employed in the mill of the Delaware Valley Farmers Cooperative Association, Frenchtown. He attended Frenchtown high school for half a year in 1933–34. He formerly was discharged from military service.

LAUDERDALE DEFENDS MEETING

William J. Lauderdale, West Amwell Township farmer, said that the meeting was strictly nonpartisan and not "phony," as the former spokesman had declared. He said that he is "becoming tired of being told what to plant, when to plant it, who to sell his crop to, what I will get for it." He said he was privileged to do his own managing under the system he was brought up under and hoped for its return.

Lee Aars, another Pennsylvanian, residing in Tinicum Township, Bucks County, said the critics of the New Deal are part of a group who are "tired of the war" and want to "do it the easy way." He said he could not see how any farmer could have any objection to New Deal agricultural policies and pointed to efforts to conserve the soil as fundamentally sound. He challenged Mr. Voorhees' statement that the A. A. A. is dominated from the top.

Mr. Voorhees replied by citing the example of a New Jersey A. A. A. director who was summarily removed on orders from Washington as proof the A. A. A. is not democratically set up.

PEACE MEETING LEADER

D. H. Moreau pointed out that Mr. Aars, who now challenged the patriotism of persons critical of the New Deal, had himself taken a leading part in peace meeting in that same courtroom prior to the time Russia was attacked. Since Russia had been attacked by Hitler, the group had taken an "about face."

Aars replied that in America one has the right to change one's mind, which brought laughter.

Earl Hartpence of Stanton, challenged the statement of Aars that his group had been critical of shipments of scrap iron to Japan. Mr. Hartpence declared that other farm groups had done likewise, including the Farm Bureau and Grange of Hunterdon County.

A man from Monmouth County complained of the "runaround" he had encountered in trying to get a license to fish in tidal waters.

SCHLUTER REPLIES

Fred Schluter of Rosedale, member of the Mercer County "four freedoms" committee, replied to the "gentleman from Pennsylvania" by reading the set of principles adopted at Washington Crossing and subsequently adopted by action of the Hunterdon County meeting. Mr. Schluter called upon the 80 percent of peaceful citizens to organize and oppose "vociferous minorities and pressure groups."

Replying that the movement was not a Republican movement, Mr. Schluter said that the group in Mercer, including members of both parties, had endorsed the program of Democratic Senator BYRD, who recently had called upon the administration to get down to winning the war and keep politics out of it. He challenged the doctor-win-the-war theory which recently was sounded at Washington and said the job must be done by all people, not by any party. He expressed the hope that by arousing a greater awareness of the danger to the freedoms the people will exercise greater influence on the party conventions.

"CONSTRUCTIVE"

"We make no criticism that is not supported by a constructive suggestion," Mr. Schluter declared. He reported that interest in the Washington Crossing meeting had been Nation-wide and that requests are coming in daily for information.

On motion it was voted to continue the temporary committee in Hunterdon County, which includes: Edgar H. Wilson, of Flemington; Mrs. Herbert Van Pelt, of Readington; Clayton H. Stains, of Kingwood Township; Rudolph Burkhalter, of Ringoes, farm owner; Martin Smith, Raritan Township farmer; William J. Lauderdale, West Amwell Township farmer; Frank C. Dalrymple, Pittstown storekeeper; Luther Stothoff, Sr., Flemington contractor; and Mrs. Roy Hall, of Ringoes.

It was voted to send telegrams to each Congressman and Senator from New Jersey, setting forth in substance the principles adopted at Washington Crossing, as follows:

"By working together on the home front—by discussion and public meetings, by issuing pamphlets, through the press and radio—we believe that we can:

"Aid the morale of our men at the front by demanding action against strikes and labor leaders who hurt the war effort, as Secretary of War Stimson suggested recently.

"Demand that our Government cut out red tape and politics and get down strictly to the business of winning the war.

"Encourage our Senators and Congressmen to think and act independently for the good of the people.

"Enlighten the citizens who need to be aroused to the danger of Government's taking away our freedoms while we are anxiously watching the war and working for victory. Let's remember the words of George Washington who said: '* * * it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.'

"Influence both party conventions to support platforms with sound principles rather than political catchphrases.

"Make November 7 Judgment Day instead of a day of fear caused by 'created' crises."

Blanks asking for supporters of the organization's program were signed by about 200 people, representing 36 communities, which will in turn be organized.

A collection which it was announced would have $1 limit resulted in raising $80.12 for furtherance of the work. Clayton H. Stains was named temporary treasurer.

General Anxiety Grows on Both Sides of Atlantic as to Actual Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following article by John Griffin, entitled "General Anxiety Grows on Both Sides of Atlantic as to Actual Foreign Policy," which appeared in the March 26, 1944, issue of the Sunday Post, Boston, Mass.:

GENERAL ANXIETY GROWS ON BOTH SIDES OF ATLANTIC AS TO ACTUAL FOREIGN POLICY—ONLY RUSSIA BOLDLY STATES PURPOSE IN WAR—EVERY STRONG PRESIDENT HIS OWN SECRETARY OF STATE AS WELL

(By John Griffin)

It is very strange that 24 Members of Congress, all of whom have shown a consistent disposition to favor international cooperation, have found it necessary to ask Secretary of State Hull to give them an understandable idea of what our foreign policy is.

That is, it would be strange except for the fact that the bewilderment of the congressional Members is only a reflection of the uncertainty and confusion that prevails throughout the country.

Furthermore, this anxiety is not confined to this country, for in England there appears to be doubt among officials as to our position and doubt among Englishmen as to the foreign policy of their own Government.

Recent reports of another meeting of British and American and Russian leaders are probably a result of this uneasiness. Recent developments in England indicate that the Government leaders are not so enthusiastic over the Atlantic Charter as they were when it was devised.

CHURCHILL CHANGES VIEW

Mr. Churchill told the House of Commons that he did not regard the Atlantic Charter as an "inflexible document," and said "it is evident that, as the changing phases of the war succeed one another, some further clarification will be required of the position under the document which has become honorably known as the Atlantic Charter and that this must be the subject of renewed consultation between the principal allies."

In the meantime, Russia appears to have a very definite idea of what it is after and intends to get it regardless of the British or American interpretations of the Atlantic Charter.

Mr. Stalin decided suddenly to recognize the Badoglio government in Italy, much to the surprise of Britain and the United States. He thus served notice that the Soviet intends to have an important part in deciding the peace terms in western Europe.

But it is only a short while ago that he also served notice that Russia intended to handle the situation in eastern Europe without assistance from Britain or the United States.

Of course, the intentions of the Russians, as clearly put forth, do not jibe with the Atlantic Charter, which has as one of its cardinal principles "no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned."

ANOTHER PRINCIPLE

The charter also lists as one of its principles respect for "the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live" and to have "sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

Another principle is "to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity."

But Mr. Churchill says that while in his mind the charter stood as "a declaration of the spirit and purpose in which its signatories are waging war, it implies no pact or bargain with our enemies."

If anything is clear at all among these diplomatic phrases it is that Britain now has considerable doubt about the charter principle of equal opportunity to vanquished as as well as victor. Britain, or at least Mr. Churchill, apparently has something else in mind.

Obviously the Russian plans for Poland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Finland do not embrace the charter principle which calls for no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned, or that principle which testifies to the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live and calls for the restoration of sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

RUSSIA HAS OWN VIEW

Thus it ought to be clear that Russia is not going to confine its policy to the terms of the charter, in fact, is paying little or no attention to the charter.

And it is evident that Britain does not want to be restricted to the strict interpretation of the charter principles.

That leaves the United States the lone full advocate of the Atlantic Charter, so far as anyone knows. But apparently nobody except the President and a few officials know whether or not we are still sticking to it.

The Moscow Conference distinctly called for joint discussions and recommendations regarding important questions that arise as they developed and the Allied Nations were said to be in agreement on Allied policy toward Italy.

The recognition of the Badoglio government by Russia would hardly seem to be an expression of complete agreement when neither Britain nor the United States is making any such recognition.

Thus we find 24 Congressmen pleading with the Secretary of State for some information that will help them in their official capacities and which would serve as a guide to our foreign policy.

No wonder they feel that some information ought to be forthcoming; the succession of events recently has been enough to cause bewilderment and uncertainty all around.

POSITION OF SECRETARY

There has been quite a lot of bunk about the situation caused by the request of the Congressmen, much of it based on the assumption that the Secretary of State is a great figure in creating a foreign policy.

Mr. Hull is, of course, a forthright individual with a mind of his own, but actually the foreign policy is the work of the President and not the Secretary of State. And that has always been true when there has been a strong President in the White House.

In this particular administration, the President has devoted most of his efforts to the foreign affairs and has turned the direction of domestic affairs over to others to a large extent. So he is actually the Secretary of State as well as President.

Perhaps he will tell the Congressmen all about it. But don't bet on that.

Fight for the Tennessee-Tombigbee Project Just Beginning in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial from the Mobile Register of Mobile, Ala., of Saturday, March 25, 1944, concerning the Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal project:

FIGHT FOR THE TENNESSEE-TOMBIGBEE PROJECT JUST BEGINNING IN CONGRESS

As the fight for the proposed Tennessee-Tombigbee waterway, defeated in the House, moved over to the Senate, Representative JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi, made a statement in the Lower Chamber well worthy of emphasis and elaboration.

"This proposition is not dead and it will never die," Representative RANKIN asserted, "until this great link in our waterways system is completed." Mr. RANKIN's comment came Thursday simultaneously with an announcement from Representative FRANK BOYKIN, of Mobile, that he will seek a new United States Engineers' survey of the project.

Representatives BOYKIN and RANKIN have expressed confidence that they can muster enough votes in the House to reverse its stand on the Tennessee-Tombigbee project, if Senators BANKHEAD and HILL, of Alabama, can succeed in gaining the Senate's approval for the waterway. It would require a shift of 20 votes to obtain reconsideration of the proposal. The House rejected its inclusion in the omnibus river and harbor bill by only an 8-vote margin, but turned down a motion to reconsider by a vote of 195 to 156 before sending the post-war $400,000,000 river and harbor authorization bill to the Senate.

The never-say-die spirit with which Messrs. BOYKIN and RANKIN have waged the battle for the waterway must be carried to the floor of the Senate, if approval of the project at this session of Congress is to be obtained, for it undoubtedly has formidable opposition.

Representative RANKIN attributes the defeat of the Tennessee-Tombigbee project in the House to false propaganda of a few railroad lobbyists. We presume that Representative RANKIN has correctly analyzed one of the principal causes of the project's rejection in the House.

The railroads, however, should realize the short-sightedness of their opposition to the development of the Tennessee and Tombigbee River systems to give the people of the Mississippi Valley a shorter, more economical waterways to the Gulf of Mexico. They have no more hope of permanently blocking the construction of a 20-mile canal to link those two waterways than they would of damming the Mississippi so that the railroads could take over the water-borne traffic on the Father of Waters. At best they can only delay congressional approval of an engineering project that men of vision conceived a century ago. The sooner the railroads withdraw their opposition to it, the better it will be for them and for the Nation.

Undoubtedly America's post-war role as the leading world power will call for industrial development and utilization of all the Nation's resources in a manner heretofore barely dreamed. That will mean the expansion of every form of transportation to the ultimate—air lines, truck lines, waterways, and railroads, included. There will be no need for cutthroat competition between the rival forms of transportation because there will be plenty of business for all.

The railroads ought to look to the future and support, not oppose, the Tennessee-Tombigbee project. A time will come when they, too, will be looking for favors from Congress. If they persist in a dog-in-the-manger attitude about the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway, the railroads will certainly prejudice their chances of obtaining whatever Federal assistance they may need in time to come.

Order to Ireland Strikes Shattering Blow Against All Ideals of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following article entitled "Order to Ireland Strikes Shattering Blow Against All Ideals of America," by John Griffin, which was published March 19, 1944, in the Sunday Post, Boston, Mass.:

ORDER TO IRELAND STRIKES SHATTERING BLOW AGAINST ALL IDEALS OF AMERICA—RAISES POINT AS TO WHAT NATION CAN DO TO REMAIN NEUTRAL IN THIS WAR DESPITE "FOUR FREEDOMS"

(By John Griffin)

The United States is in a war of survival and it is natural to expect that anyone who steps in our way or refuses to get out of our way is going to get hurt. Any nation, large or small, that interferes with our chances of victory, or with our plans for victory, can be assured that it is courting trouble in large quantities and at frequent intervals.

Thus Eire can look forward to nothing but woe as far as her relations with the United States are concerned. It has been decided—by our military leaders according to a recent despatch—that by permitting the diplomatic representatives of our enemies to stay in Eire, that country is jeopardizing our invasion project and imperiling our troops.

So we are going to punish Eire for her refusal to help us. We have pointed out, with threat and warning, that she cannot expect anything from now on but trouble unless she does our bidding. And we even tell her that she can also anticipate very little at the peace table.

ISOLATED EIRE

We're going to see to it, along with our ally, Britain, that Eire gets not more than is absolutely necessary to keep her producing food for Britain. We are going to see to it that she gets no ships from us, as if we were in the habit of providing ships for her.

All right, if we've got to do it to win victory and safeguard American lives, by all means do it—without hesitation and without limit.

But is it too much to ask now that all the sanctimonious twaddle about "four freedoms" cooked up at a meeting between Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt, and all the big talk about the rights of small nations be immediately junked and placed in a position where they cannot be dragged forth to falsify a situation?

When we tell a nation that is honestly neutral—a fact admitted by the Allies—that unless she makes a warlike move against our enemies she will be subjected to punishment from us, we are shattering all the ideals of America.

When we tell a defenseless neutral that unless she makes a move against our enemies, which might subject her to destruction from the air, we will use economic weapons in punishment, we are throwing the rights of small nations into the ashcan.

CAN'T BE SURPRISED

When we tell a small, honestly neutral nation that she has no right to remain neutral and must enter the war on our side upon pain of immediate punishment and future discrimination, we can hardly be surprised if the neutral world looks astonished.

Of course, the neutral world should not be surprised at this event, for we have indicated before that the determination of the American people is to win the war at all costs; that it is a question of survival. But unfortunately at the same time we have been preaching to the world about freedom from fear and freedom from aggression, and other noble principles.

Have the people of Eire now been assured of a freedom from fear and aggression? Is it impossible for them to remain neutral because their neighbors want them to fight? Perhaps it is impossible from the practical and realistic viewpoint. But let's not talk about ideals and freedoms in that connection.

As for freedom, certainly Eire should be free to stay out of the war if that is the desire of her people. But, says one commentator and editorialist, Eire is only "technically right, but is morally and strategically wrong."

This is a view that might be presented to a man standing on his head. If Eire is right at all, she is morally right. And as far as being "strategically wrong" that must mean that she is unfortunate enough to be geographically situated "in the middle."

NO LEND-LEASE

Let's get a few things straight. In the first place, Eire has not been given anything by this country. The ships she got were bought from us and paid for, and were bought only after long months of negotiations in which we tried to bargain for the use of certain Irish ports, which we held were essential to our safety.

This argument was later dropped when it developed that the ports were not necessary for our safety. At a time when we were giving food and other materials to many nations, neutral as well as belligerent, on a lend-lease basis—that is, we were giving it away—Eire was unsuccessfully trying to buy from us.

The Eire Minister in Washington said publicly that the State Department assured him there "has not been a single instance of known leakage of military information through Ireland in the past 2 years."

And the United States note to Eire in which that Government was asked to break off diplomatic relations with Axis countries said: "We do not question the good faith of the Irish Government in its efforts to suppress espionage."

What, then, does a neutral nation have to do to remain out of war? Here is one that has been honestly neutral, that has done everything possible to prevent espionage within its borders, that has expressed the will of its people in its official policy, yet it is being told by two powerful nations that it must immediately take steps which would lead it into war or else suffer punishment for remaining at peace.

A PRACTICAL VIEW

We have been faced with situations in which idealism clashed with realism. There was the question of whether we would be realistic enough to deal with French leaders in north Africa who could save the lives of many American soldiers. From the moral standpoint, and certainly from the standpoint of idealism, we should not have had anything to do with them. But from the practical standpoint we would have been utterly foolish to refuse dealing with them.

Certainly the parents of thousands of American boys were happy that a deal was made that saved untold thousands of American lives.

If the measures to be taken against Eire also result in saving American lives, as the military men say they will, there won't be any outcry of protest from Americans.

But it is strictly a practical matter and sets aside all the brave talk about ideals and freedoms. As if they weren't shattered much earlier by the experience of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and other small nations.

Do what we have to do but let's be honest about it.

The Fight for Tennessee-Tombigbee Project To Be Carried to the Senate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial from the Mobile Press, of Mobile, Ala., of Thursday, March 23, 1944, concerning the Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal project:

THE FIGHT FOR TENNESSEE-TOMBIGBEE PROJECT TO EE CARRIED TO THE SENATE—WATERWAYS PROPONENTS BEATEN IN THE HOUSE REFUSE TO GIVE UP THE BATTLE; ALABAMA-COOSA PROGRAM SOME CONSOLATION

Alabamans' disappointment over the deletion of the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterways from the omnibus river and harbor bill in the House yesterday was offset somewhat by the approval of the Alabama-Coosa project.

But of the two projects, the Tennessee-Tombigbee was far the more important, for it would provide a shorter, more economical barge route from points throughout the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf of Mexico by way of Mobile. The Alabama-Coosa waterways approval will, of course, be welcomed because it would give a vast section of the interior from Rome, Ga., southward to Mobile an outlet to the Gulf through a 9-foot navigable channel and also include electric power and flood-control developments.

—Representative FRANK BOYKIN, of Mobile, who with Representative JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi, led the fight for the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterways in the House, declares the battle will be carried to the Senate. This is as it should be, for the project is entirely too vital to the interest of the Nation to accept the result in the House as final. By all means let Senators BANKHEAD and HILL and all proponents of the important project unite and exhaust every effort to have the rejected waterway reinstated in the bill when it comes up for consideration in the Senate.

Messrs. BOYKIN and RANKIN waged a strong fight for the Tennessee-Tombigbee project in the House against formidable opposition, some of which was partisan and some selfish. Republican opposition, led by Representative DONDERO, of Michigan, was one of the factors in the elimination of the waterways from the bill. It was just such short-sighted opposition as this to worthwhile measures supported by Democrats that Wendell Willkie recently warned his party will react against the G. O. P. in November. Mr. DONDERO argued that the project had been rejected 5 years ago "and the picture is the same today." This, of course, entirely overlooks the increasing importance of inland waterways in moving the Nation's freight. The national picture alters, but the Michigan Representative and others like him do not see the change. They lack progressiveness and vision and when they carry their viewpoints the Nation suffers.

Of course, the fear that the opening of the Tennessee-Tombigbee would divert some traffic from the Mississippi undoubtedly influenced some Members in the House to vote against the $66,000,000 project. It was pointed out, however, that barge operators on the Mississippi would actually benefit because they could use the projected Tennessee-Tombigbee slack water routing on the return trip northward and save the expense of bucking the Mississippi currents on the upward tow.

Representative DONDERO and other opponents to the contrary, the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterways, carrying the endorsement of the United States Engineers, is not only feasible, but essential if the Nation's inland waterways are to be fully developed in the interest of more economical transport. In the end, progress will triumph over reactionary and selfish interests such as the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterways encountered in the House. Let us hope that it will be accomplished in the Senate, and that the House will subsequently concur in the reinstatement of the project so that the Tennessee-Tombigbee waterways will be included with the $60,000,000 Alabama-Coosa project as among foremost public works in America's post-war program.

Washington's "Ghost" Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Washington is a city of mystery. The Government is literally a mass of riddles. The investigator who tries to solve some of the inconsistencies, the contradictions, the impracticalities, and the apparent perverseness of many of the departments, bureaus, and commissions, seems to encounter a stone wall of resistance—an invisible but very tangible conspiracy of silence throughout officialdom. The latest, and I think, the most startling revelation is that there is, in the city of mysteries, a ghost committee of higher-ups, each, apparently, with a completely controlling passion for anonymity, who reserve to themselves the authority to overrule all the other departments of the executive branch of the Government, including O. W. I., on what information and facts shall be given the American people concerning any situation, either on the battle fronts or at home. This revelation is especially startling in view of the fact that it has always been one of the fundamental concepts of our American system of government that a government of, by, and for the people operated by and with the consent of the governed, can be a wise and just government only so long as the people, themselves, are kept informed of the facts concerning their government and their governors in order that they, themselves, may arrive at wise and just conclusions, based upon accurate information. It is, of course, true that military strategy renders it impossible for the Government to acquaint the people with all the facts concerning military operations—past, present, and future. There is ample evidence at hand, however, and it continues to accumulate rapidly, showing that various officials of the Government are hiding their inefficiency and, in some cases, their maladministration, behind the curtain of alleged military secrecy. There is nothing new about this, because in his day, Thomas Jefferson recognized such a danger in government when he said:

> You have seen the practices by which the public servants have been able to cover their conduct, or, where that could not be done, delusions by which they have varnished it for the eye of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, the disclosure of this secret, super ghost committee in Washington, ready to decide in secrecy what the American people may or may not be permitted to know about their governmental affairs, was made in the Saturday Evening Post of January 29, last. It was made by Robert Ormond Case, who had served as assistant to the president of the Rubber Development Corporation.

He tells the story that early in September of 1943 it appeared that the rubber program was over the hump and that the goal of overcoming our perilous rubber shortage had actually been achieved in the first 9 months of the effort. Mr. Case, at that time, wrote a press release giving the figures as to the program, the accomplishments, and the fact that the rubber was in the bins. It was the kind of information that would break the hearts of the Axis Powers, which would have tremendously raised the morale of the American people, and which would have put an end to the sensational stories appearing in some of the newspaper columns at that time that our natural rubber was costing us $500 a pound.

President Douglas H. Allen, of the Rubber Development Corporation, approved the story. The Rubber Development Corporation Board approved the story. Leo Crowley, the head of O. E. W., approved the story. Then this information, continuing its journey through the Washington bureaucratic jungle, went over to O. W. I. for the routine purpose of being mimeographed and distributed. There, for some mysterious reason, the information was hung up. Upon inquiry by Mr. Case, of the Rubber Development Corporation, O. W. I. finally admitted that they had run into a committee of higher-ups. This committee did not think the people should be given this cheering information. Why not? Because this mysterious committee of higher-ups said it was contrary to public policy. The question was asked as to why and in what particular it was contrary to public policy, and nobody in the O. W. I. could answer that question.

Then the officials of the Rubber Development Corporation wanted to know who the chairman of this mysterious committee was. He was Mr. Stuart Rice, of the Bureau of the Budget. Mr. CASE called Mr. Rice who calmly explained that while he realized the American people might be interested in the news that our perilous rubber shortage had been remedied, his committee had decided it should not be published. The publication was considered inadvisable. This "ghost" committee, Mr. Rice intimated, had established this principle of secret over-all decisions shortly after Pearl Harbor. An effort was made by the Rubber Development Corporation officials to determine who was on this mysterious committee. Mr. Rice was evasive. The Army, Navy, State Department were represented. Well, what was the committee called? Mr. Rice was not sure. "Really," Mr. Rice concluded affably, "it doesn't matter. Just call it the committee." By whose authority, the inquirer asked, does such a committee exist and function? The answer was, given in that attitude of benevolent confidence peculiar to Washington, "By Executive order of the President."

Mr. Speaker, certain Members of the Congress endeavored to ferret out this committee, and they learned from Palmer Hoyt, at that time domestic administrator of the O. W. I., that Mr. Hoyt had run into this committee many times and he did not feel that he wanted to undertake a show-down with it. Mr. Leo Crowley, for some reason, cooled off, and the result was that this supersecret committee got away with it and the American people were deprived of the information until a couple of months later a Senate committee hearing developed the facts. As the Post editorial aptly put it:

> Perhaps through lethargy rather than respect for antiquated theories of democratic government, the "ghost" committee failed to challenge the authority of the United States Senate to make the inquiry.

I need not tell you that no more dangerous situation could exist in your Government and in your Capital than just such an all-powerful secret committee as this. There it sits, or did sit, deciding on the basis of its own whims and prejudices and judgment whether or not the people may or may not have facts which they are entitled to have about their Government, which they support, about the supply of rubber, which touches their daily lives at almost every point, and about the war in which their loved ones are fighting, and which they are largely going to pay for over the years. There could be nothing further from our fundamental concepts of free government than such a secret authority, unelected by the people, not even known to the Congress, sitting in secret, overruling the public agency, the O. W. I., and, by authority of the President, concealing facts of government and facts of the war operation from the American people which the people ought to have. In this particular case, such a story would not have aroused criticism of the Government, it would have aroused commendation for the Government. But even so, this hierarchy was narrow enough, was arrogant enough, and was stupid enough to deprive the American people of this ray of encouragement at a time when they were being told they might have to give up their automobile tires and lay up their cars because of a rubber scarcity which was getting worse, according to the newspapers. The refusal to give the American people that information unquestionably caused millions of Americans deep worry and sleepless nights, wondering how they could carry on their business, how they could get to their jobs, how their daily lives could go on if they had to give up their automobile tires to the Government and lay up their cars for the duration.

There apparently has grown up in Washington a general policy in the executive department to give out no information which might bring criticism of that department or any part of it. At the very time the O. W. I. was being pounded in Congress and in the press for not giving the people information to which they were entitled and which they could have had, this secret committee of higher-ups hiding in the mysterious maze of governmental bureaus and commissions, skulking far back behind the scenes, was pulling the strings which closed the avenues of information and denied the American people knowledge they were entitled to have had.

It is time for official Washington to recall some facts which still are facts. One of them is that a state of war does not preclude the citizen from exercising his right and privilege of criticizing his Government for doing something wrong or stupid. This principle was well recognized by Woodrow Wilson during the First World War when he said:

> We do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. It is hoped that criticism will be constructive, but better unfair attack than autocratic repression. Honesty and confidence require no shield of secrecy.

The late Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, one of the greatest liberals who ever sat on the Supreme Bench, one of the most patriotic citizens ever produced in America, one of the keenest students of government the world ever knew, said concerning the same point:

> We do not lose our right to condemn either measures or men because the country is at war.

The very existence of this secret committee in Washington with its hands on the outlet valve of all information concerning the Government, operating that valve in secret, far back from the gaze of the public, far away from scrutiny by the Congress, hidden away from criticism by the press, is the very essence of tyranny. It is the dictatorial hand by which free government, free enterprise, free society will be strangled and destroyed unless it is brought out in the open light of day where it can be dealt with as it deserves to be dealt with. Whenever any Chief Executive lends himself to such a procedure by an Executive order, he has, then and there, departed entirely from the principle of free government and has started down the road to despotism.

The American people should rise up in wrath and demand of their Congress that this mysterious "ghost" committee which has set itself up as the judges and censors of what the people may learn about their Government and the operation of this war, be investigated, be brought into the open, its membership disclosed. If any such committee is going to function above the O. W. I., let the Congress and the people know who is on the committee, how it functions, why it functions, and by what authority it functions.

Mr. Speaker, there has not been, in my time in Congress, a clearer example than this of the sort of abuse, the sort of secret government by autocracy which exemplifies the wisdom of the injunction that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

We are in the greatest war of all time. We are under the most widespread bureaucracy, the most evasive bureaucracy in our history. It operates in the most secret fashion of any bureaucracy in our history, and I am frank to say that there are more aliens in it than there ever have been in any previous governmental bureaucracy in our history. It is shot through and honeycombed with people who would overturn our free constitutional government, our free enterprise economy, our free society, and who would substitute in place thereof the autocracy of a political monopoly operating under the secret manipulation of a bureaucracy designed to produce state socialism, communism, or fascism.

It is just this sort of secret authority exercised back in the dark recesses of governmental caverns that has resulted in a planned confusion which eventuated in what today is regimented chaos.

Naturalization of Filipino War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

NATURALIZATION OF FILIPINO WAR VETERANS—
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Department of Maryland.

Whereas there is now a popular movement in the United States to grant the rights of citizenship to those Filipinos who have shown their love of democracy by their struggle by the side of the United Nations; and

Whereas the political and cultural attainment of the Filipinos under the guidance and protection of the United States for nearly 50 years has demonstrated their affiliation with American ideals and principles; and

Whereas our most distinguished member of the Disabled American Veterans, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, has cast his lot with the Filipino people in behalf of their advancement and military plans; and

Whereas the heroism and sacrifices of the Filipino at Bataan and Corregidor cries for a gesture of world-wide acclaim, so the action of the righteous may be awarded; and

Whereas the naturalization of those Filipinos who have fought on our home front and the battle front for the preservation of our ideals and principles, and who were formally entitled to be granted the privilege of naturalization from World War No. 1, together with those who are Allies in the present world-wide struggle, have demonstrated the finest example of democratic service and sacrifice, and have achieved the right of being called comrade: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Col. Theodore Roosevelt Camp, No. 6, Baltimore, Department of Maryland, U. S. W. V., at our monthly meeting assembled this 17th day of March, 1944, That we endorse H. R. 4229 and commend the action of the American Legion, Department of California, at their department convention, August 12–16, 1939, and we hereby urge that the bill enacted in Congress permitting those who served the United States of America in the World War, be reenacted so those who failed to obtain their citizenship be allowed to regain the benefits thereof, and also, so those who have proved their worthiness of citizenship in the present struggle, shall likewise be granted similar benefits and privileges.

Done at the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, this 17th day of March 1944.

Official:

JOHN H. GLAESER,
Commander.
HOWARD D. SOUTH,
Adjutant.

The above resolution was also endorsed by the following veteran organizations: Admiral Bob Evans Camp, No. 135, U. S. W. V., Department of California; Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Glendale Post No. 1937, Department of California, Disabled American Veterans, REA Chapter No. 5, Department of the District of Columbia; Regular Veterans Association, Post No. 3, Department of Virginia, Maryland, and District of Columbia.

NATIONAL CATHEDRAL POST, NO. 10,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1944.

FILIPINO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C.

(Attention C. T. Elbo, president.)

DEAR MR. ELBO: This is to formally advise you that at the regular monthly meeting of National Cathedral Post, No. 10, American Legion, District of Columbia Department, held at the Legion clubhouse on Wednesday, March 22, the post passed a resolution endorsing H. R. 4229 to authorize the naturalization of native-born Filipinos permanently residing in the United States and Filipinos who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War No. 1. By such resolution, the post automatically endorsed resolution No. 39 of Department of California, American Legion.

I am very pleased to personally make this favorable report to you regarding this particular matter which is of such great importance to your organization.

Respectfully,

HERBERT J. JACOBI,
Commander.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF CALIFORNIA.
Resolution 39
Naturalization of Filipino World War veterans

Whereas there are many Filipinos in America who served in the armed forces of the United States during the World War desirous of becoming citizens; and

Whereas the bill enacted in Congress permitting those who served the United States of America in the World War has expired; and

Whereas some Filipinos took advantage of said act, many did not know of or understand the significance of said act and thereby failed to gain the benefits thereof; and

Whereas the Filipino ex-servicemen are getting older and fewer and the greater number have every intention of remaining in the United States for the rest of their lives, they feel that there is discrimination against them in not permitting them to become citizens;

Wherefore the American Legion, Department of California, as a body gives its support to secure American citizenship for the herebefore mentioned veterans.

Seconded by Solon Beattie, East Hollywood Post; carried.

I certify that this is a true copy of the resolution above taken from pages 66 and 67, Summary of Proceedings Twenty-First Annual Convention, the American Legion, Department of California.

EDWARD J. KELLY,
Chairman, Veterans' Legislation Committee Council.

(Above resolution unanimously passed at a department convention of the American Legion held at Oakland, Calif., on August 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, 1939.)

The Housing Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two addresses delivered on March 25, 1944, by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], one over Station KSD in St. Louis, Mo., and the other in St. Louis before the National Public Housing Conference be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

In this connection I wish to say that the Senator from Louisiana is chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing of the Committee on Education and Labor which handles the housing measures which come before that committee.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FACTS ABOUT HOUSING

(Address delivered by Hon. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, United States Senator from Louisiana, on March 25, 1944, over Station KSD, St. Louis, Mo.)

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, for some time Fulton Lewis Jr., has been broadcasting a series of attacks against the housing program. I will take this opportunity of making answer to his unfounded charges. Unlike Commentator Lewis, my sources of information are official. I am chairman of a Senate subcommittee which has been handling the legislation for all of the housing programs to which Mr. Lewis is opposed. From time to time, our committee has reviewed these programs. When we have talked about them we have known what we were talking about. And when we have acted upon them, we have always done so on a nonpartisan basis.

I think that I might be most helpful in this discussion by calling to Mr. Lewis' attention just what he is attacking. He thinks that he is assailing slum clearance and low-rent housing. He thinks that he is criticizing public housing. Maybe he even thinks that he is discrediting the administration in Washington. I can understand why he might want to try to discredit these things. But the truth is that Mr. Lewis is really attacking something quite different, although he does not seem to realize it. He is attacking the war effort. He is demeaning war workers. He is belittling the Congress of the United States. He is questioning the competence of local governments and local communities. He is casting aspersions upon thousands of local citizens—real-estate men, businessmen, bankers, labor leaders among them—who are helping to do a patriotic job of providing war housing for war workers. He is dealing irresponsibly with the morale of the American people by talking to them about something directly related to the war effort about which he has not bothered to inform himself in the slightest.

Perhaps if Mr. Lewis were to realize what he is attacking he would quiet down a bit and give his audience truthful information.

Mr. Lewis says that he is not talking about the war-housing program. He says that this program is necessary and desirable. He says that he is attacking only what he calls the Federal slum-clearance and low-rent housing program. This program, he says, is now being built during the war to the tune of "untold millions of dollars' worth of new housing."

This assertion of Mr. Lewis is exactly 100-percent incorrect. Since the war started, the slum clearance and low-rent housing program has been stopped. The current housing, about which Mr. Lewis is talking and which he is criticizing so violently, is war housing for war workers. The statements which he makes about this housing are erroneous. The implications and conclusions which he draws from these assertions are even more misleading.

Now, here is the situation in a nutshell.

Before the war, in 1937, a program was started to provide low-rent housing for families of very low income, drawn from the slums. Before the war this program was proceeding successfully. It was rehousing families who lived in the slums. It was providing for the demolition of a slum unit for every new unit built. It was not housing a single family except those who could not afford to live in decent housing built by private enterprise. It was noncompetitive with private enterprise. It was achieving throughout the country an average rent, without utility charges, of $12.79 per family unit per month, serving families with average annual incomes, on a national basis, of $832. It was not a Federal program. All of the houses were built, owned, and managed by local housing authorities, composed of representative local citizens, generally appointed by the mayors of the communities under State enabling legislation. More than half the total cost of these projects—including construction and operation—was being paid in the form of rent by the occupants, although their incomes were miserably low. Less than half the cost was being contributed by the Federal Government in the form of annual grants-in-aid, and by the local governments in the form of tax exemption.

So much for the program before the war. Now let us see what happened when the war started.

First, the Congress passed a law, which provided in substance: If any of these projects which was started for slum clearance and low-rent housing are uncompleted, they may be completed and used as war housing for war workers for the duration of the war. If any of these houses have vacant units, these vacant units may likewise be used by war workers for the duration. If the war workers have higher incomes than the slum dwellers for whom the projects were originally intended, this higher income shall not prevent their admission. But they shall pay rents based upon this higher income. To that extent, they shall not receive subsidies. Because of the critical shortage of housing during the war, the requirement that one house shall be torn down for every new house built is suspended for the duration.

This, in effect, is the law that Congress enacted. In short, the Congress provided that the peacetime slum clearance and low-rent housing program might be converted to war use, just as many industries have been converted to war use. This was necessary because war workers from all over the country, by the millions, were in-migrating to centers of war production. They had to have shelter—to have it quickly.

But the Congress did not draft these projects for war use. The law was permissive, not mandatory. It was left to the local housing authorities, which owned and managed these projects, to make the decision. The decision which was made is a high tribute to the patiotism of these local housing authorities—these citizens in communities all over America. They proceeded, insofar as possible, to turn the vacant units and the uncompleted projects over for war use to war workers—for the duration.

It is this patriotic decision which has been the basis of the confused criticism of Mr. Fulton Lewis. He points out that in one unit, there may be a family paying $18 a month rent, and that in another similar unit there may be a family paying about $50 a month rent. He points out that there are some families living in the units who earn as much as $3,000 a year.

Now what is the explanation? It is very simple. The family paying $18 a month rent is a family of very low income, transferred from a festering slum to this decent low-cost housing before the war. This family is, as I have said, receiving financial assistance from the Federal Government and from the locality. The family paying about $50 a month rent, or anything like it, and earning $3,000 a year, is a family of war workers. To this family, the low-cost housing built ultimately for slum dwellers of low income has been temporarily given up for the duration of the war. This war-worker family is paying what is called a full economic rent, and is not receiving subsidy or aid from any source. The units which are occupied as war housing, and which are benefiting by this economic rent, are paying local taxes in large amounts.

This is the simple situation about which Mr. Lewis is complaining, and which he is unjustly criticizing from one end of the country to the other, creating confusion and distrust.

Mr. Lewis is casting a slur upon every poor family of former slum dwellers, now living in these decent projects, by implying that they are getting something cheaper than somebody else—without giving the true explanation.

Mr. Lewis is casting a slur upon all of the war-workers' families living in these converted projects, by insinuating that their incomes are so high that they should not be living there, or that they are not paying for what they get.

Mr. Lewis is attacking by indirection the War Production Board, which in view of the critical shortage of war materials has had to restrict housing construction very severely—thus making it obvious that some slum clearance and low-rent housing projects be diverted temporarily to war use.

Mr. Lewis is casting a reflection upon every mayor and every member of local government, in all the communities where this conversion to war use has taken place—because, as I have said, the projects about which he is talking are all local projects owned, controlled, and managed by these local authorities created under State laws. They were converted to war use by voluntary local action, after Congress gave its assent.

Mr. Lewis is ridiculing the Congress of the United States, which passed the enabling legislation making it possible to divert these projects to war housing.

And incidentally, Mr. Lewis is severely criticizing and attacking certain important policies of the Army and Navy. In one of his talks, he made much of the fact that the families of military personnel were not being provided with newly constructed war housing. This rests upon a decision of the War and Navy Departments.

War housing is not something to be trifled with, or treated as a political football by a well-paid radio commentator. War housing is necessary to provide a shelter over the head of the men and women who are making our planes and ships and tanks and guns. An attack upon war housing is an attack upon the boys who need the planes and ships and tanks and guns. It is an attack upon the war effort itself.

Mr. Lewis cannot squirm out of this by his carefully calculated statements that he is not attacking war housing. These statements only add to the confusion. For the figures and situations, which he cites, are the direct result of using for war workers the projects which were intended originally for slum dwellers.

I believe in as much private enterprise as feasible and possible, during the war and after the war. But private enterprise cannot fight the war alone. It needs the assistance of public housing, just as much as it needs the assistance of war contracts and guaranties for the expansion of plants, or for the job of reconversion after the war.

I look forward to a vast home-building program after the war, mostly by private enterprise. Such a program will help to rebuild our cities and our smaller communities, to bring better living conditions in rural areas, and to make more jobs for our returning heroes and for others who will be turned out of war work.

But this kind of post-war-housing program must be based upon intelligence and good will, upon a true appraisal of the situation and an accurate statement of the facts. Anyone who attempts to throw the housing situation into a chaos of misinformation and confusion, at the present time, is certainly not helping to build a sound foundation for the future. Mr. Fulton Lewis undoubtedly believes that he is a friend of private enterprise and of the home-building industry. But I contend that he is doing private enterprise and home builders the greatest possible disservice, by his unrestrained and unreflective misinformation.

Unfortunately, most people are so busy doing their war jobs that they have no time to answer these attacks. But somebody must answer them, before they do too much damage to all the things that we are fighting for, and too much damage to the war effort itself.

Therefore, I appreciate this opportunity to answer the attacks of Mr. Lewis upon the war-housing program—to answer these attacks because, upon analysis, they are attacks upon the Congress, the Army, the Navy, local governments, local housing authorities, war workers, families of low income, and upon all the people who are straining every effort to achieve national unity and to win the war.

COMMON SENSE IN POST-WAR HOUSING

(Address delivered by Hon. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, United States Senator from Louisiana, on March 25, 1944, in St. Louis, Mo., before the National Public Housing Conference)

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have been asked to speak on the subject Homes or the Dole. In view of my long interest in public housing, I desire also to discuss with you some of the broader problems and more important considerations than this limited topic ordinarily encompasses. I think that before I conclude my remarks it will be clear to you why I am adopting this course. And I hope that you will agree with what I have to say.

My activities in behalf of public housing go back to its inception. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will indicate that I was in the midst of the battle on the Senate floor for the passage of the United States Housing Act in 1937. I have been in the fight ever since, and you may count upon me to continue to remain in the struggle, so long as I retain my membership in the United States Senate.

As some of you may be aware, I am chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, which has handled slum clearance and low-rent housing legislation, as well as the publicly financed portion of the war-housing program. This subcommittee, as well as the full committee is heartily sympathetic with the aims and objectives of slum clearance and low-rent housing.

I am proud of the record of the low-rent public-housing program, although it has been the subject of harsh, unjust, and uncalled-for criticism. It has performed most satisfactorily in my State. It has done likewise, I am sure, throughout the country, in small places, in medium-sized cities, and in our largest centers of population. The main trouble with the program is that it has been inadequate. After the war we must continue and expand the program. To do this we must begin to get ready now, and it is imperative that the people be told the truth about the program of the past and what is in prospect for the future.

There is no need to tell this group that most of the attacks upon public housing have been unfair, unjustified, selfish, and based upon gross ignorance.

The most common attack has been that the program did not rehouse families of sufficiently low income. The facts refute this charge completely. Before the war the program as a whole achieved an everage shelter rent throughout the country of $12.79 per family unit per month. It housed families with average yearly incomes, on a Nation-wide basis, of $832.

You may be certain that, if the program had housed families of still lower average yearly incomes—that is, if it had housed only the worst relief cases—the opposition would have criticized it as a program solely for people who were indolent or shiftless or undeserving. Of course, I do not believe that families on relief should be so characterized. But I do say, that this is what the enemies of the U. S. H. A. program would have said about the housing program, if it had housed only relief families. In fact, the foes of the program are saying this anyway. They are consistently moving in two directions at once, half the time arguing that the projects should house lower income families, and the other half the time arguing that it should house higher income families. They are seesawing between the two groups in the hope of creating confusion and dissatisfaction.

My own belief is that the program has struck a wise and happy medium in this matter. It has not been administered as an emergency poor-relief job. It has been conducted in a manner to provide decent and dignified aid to families of low income—families who are industrious and deserving and a part of the working population, but whom our economic system has not provided with sufficient income in peacetimes to live in decent housing without public aid. Until our economic system can lift the incomes of these families to the point where they can afford to obtain decent housing entirely on their own, we must continue this public assistance. And we must continue it in the self-respecting and desirable form which it has already taken.

For these reasons, I am opposed to any proposal to abolish the present slum clearance and low-rent housing program, or to substitute any method of rent certificates or rent relief which would handle each family on a case-work basis, veiled in an atmosphere of charity. These suggestions should be placed in the same category as the proposals, made a few years ago, to junk the social security system and to substitute therefor the dole.

Furthermore, I am opposed to these rent certificates or rent-relief plans, because they would tend to perpetuate and subsidize the slums. They would provide no method for large-scale, well planned developments to remove the slums, and to rebuild the blighted areas of our American communities.

On the other hand, none of the attacks made upon the financing plan under the United States Housing Act has impressed me in the slightest. I have spent many hours analyzing in detail the method of financial operations used by local housing authorities, in clearing slums and rehousing slum dwellers.

The essence of this plan is that the development cost of projects is put upon a loan basis, with the Federal Government receiving repayment in full for all loans made, at the long-term Federal rate of interest plus one-half of 1 percent. Since the Government has thus far been borrowing money at a substantially lower rate of interest than the prevailing long-term rate, there has been a profit to the Government on the loan transaction. This profit, I am informed, has been about sufficient to cover the administrative expenses of the United States Housing Authority—now the Federal Public Housing Authority—for the slum-clearance and low-rent housing program.

This being the case, the only cost of the program to the Federal Government has been in the annual contributions to help achieve low rents. This annual contributory system, which some of the critics of the program have distorted and even called misleading, is one of the most honest and simple methods of grants-in-aid that has been devised. Anyone who takes the trouble to study the plan, instead of attacking it blindly, can find out exactly what the program costs each year. He will discover also that the amount of aid is measured exactly against the need, and can be decreased in any year when better economic conditions are made available to the beneficiaries of the program and when economies in operation reduce the amount of aid required.

Let me give a factual illustration of this point. The maximum annual contribution to achieve low rents permitted under the law is about 3½ percent. This would result in an annual contribution of about $25,000,000, during normal peacetime, on the 154,189 completed local authority family units under the United States Housing Act. But even before the war, by various economies, the annual contribution rate had been reduced to about 2.8 percent, which would involve annual contributions of about $20,000,000 for a program of the same size. When the war came along, the 154,189 family units under local authorities were divided into 100,355 continued as low-rent projects and 53,834 units converted to war use. For the 100,355 low-rent units, due to higher incomes during the war, the annual contribution rate has been reduced to about 2.2 percent, involving annual contributions of $10,339,356. For the 53,834 units converted to war use, the annual contribution rate has been reduced to twenty-three one-hundredths of 1 percent, involving annual contributions of $607,935. Therefore, at the present time the total annual contributions on the whole 154,189 units is only $10,947,291, contrasted with the maximum of about $25,000,000 which would be available under the law.

To state this another way: The people who are occupying these projects are paying about $14,000,000 more in annual rents than they would be paying if the Government extended as much aid as the law permits. They are paying about $9,000,000 more in rents than the normal pre-war rate. To state this in still another way, the occupants of the project are paying almost $45,000,000 in annual rents, as against an annual contribution of less than $11,000,000 by the Government.

Let these figures be the answer to those who talk about the occupants of these projects as if they were irresponsible people, unwilling to pay their own way to the last dollar of their capacity. Let this be the answer to those who claim that the plan now in use is uneconomical or unsound.

Of course, we know that after the war the incomes of the occupants of these housing projects will not be as high as now. Somewhat larger amounts of Government assistance will be necessary. But I think that the country will be more prosperous after the war than it was before the war, that we shall gradually raise our standards of living, and that the program will continue to advance in the economical direction that it was moving before the war began.

It has been particularly shocking to me, that the patriotic service which local housing authorities have rendered in turning 53,834 units in their projects over to war use, has been made the occasion for attack upon the program. When Congress passed the United States Housing Act, it contemplated slum clearance and low-rent housing. Later Congress authorized, but did not compel, the conversion of this housing to war purposes. The local housing authorities have voluntarily made this conversion, with regard to the 53,834 units that I have mentioned. Naturally, the war workers have fairly good incomes in these times, and, as I have indicated, the subsidies on these converted projects have been reduced to a nominal figure. And yet, we hear radio commentators and others berating and vilifying the local housing authorities and the public-housing program—because they have joined in winning the war instead of remaining on a peacetime basis—and because this war work has made the projects temporarily available to families with higher incomes.

A few days ago, I examined another one of the so-called plans which has been trotted out as a substitute for the low-rent housing and the slum clearance program. This is the so-called tax abatement plan. It rests upon the propcsition that the Federal Government should enable wealthy individuals to avoid Federal income taxes entirely as to that part of their income which they invest in land bonds and housing construction, and also exempt from taxation the income on these bonds and this housing. It is claimed that this would result in better housing at lower cost to slum dwellers—through a system which is attractively called "public housing privately owned."

Let us look at just a few figures as to how public housing privately owned would work, in comparison with the United States Housing Act plan. I have before me a table of figures which contrasts the two methods, but I will refer here only to the high lights. Under the United States Housing Act, a housing unit built on expensive central slum land, with the land costing $2,000 and the building costing $4,000, coming to a total of $6,000, might receive, for example, an annual contribution from the Federal Government of about $131 a year. This would achieve a shelter rent of about $16 a month, and would serve a family with an income of about $960 a year. Under the so-called tax abatement plan, in contrast, for the same unit, there would be involved a capital grant of $4,800 in the form of tax abatement (assuming that the taxpayer would receive income placing him in the 80 percent bracket), plus an additional contribution of $110 in the form of additional tax abatement. In addition to the tax abatement of $110, the Government would pay interest on the capital grant abated, which if paid, could be used to reduce the public debt. And these subsidies, so much larger than the subsidies under the United States Housing Act, would produce a monthly rent for the unit of $45, serving a family inome group of about $2,700. In short, despite much higher cost to the Government, this plan for public housing privately owned would serve the upper income half of the population, rather than the lower income third.

(See table marked "Exhibit A.")

So much for the opponents of public housing. I have come to talk to you, not as an opponent, but as a friend. But I would be less than a friend, if I did not tell you about your errors as well as your achievements—if I did not warn you of the difficulties which public housing faces—if I did not indicate what steps you should take to better your postition and strengthen your cause.

We must frankly face the fact that public housing before the war did not receive as much popular support as its merits entitled it to. In fact, 1938 was the last year in which the Congress approved the public housing program. This was only 1 year after the enactment of the original law and before any projects were completed. In the 3 years between 1938 and the outbreak of the war public housing gradually lost ground in the Congress. You know this to be true.

It is foolish to blame this trend on a few individuals. It is short-sighted to think that the situation can be changed after the war just by wishful thinking. There is only one sensible way by which this situation can be changed in a democracy—and that is by making public housing understood and popular in the communities throughout the country. When public housing is really popular and really wanted at home, Washington will respond.

If public housing is not sufficiently popular at home to gain congressional approval, that is not the fault of the people working in Washington for the Federal Government. There is very little that they can do about it. It is up to the local people, interested in public housing throughout the country, to create the urge. If the situation is remedied, these local people will deserve most of the credit. But if the situation remains as it has been in the past, they will deserve most of the blame.

For this reason I am particularly pleased with the reorganization that has recently taken place in the National Public Housing Conference. My understanding is that the conference is going to be a militant, aggressive organization. I hope that it does not confine its fighting to Washington or make the mistake of criticizing its friends. The housing advocates have already spent too much time criticizing each other. If the conference can work to stimulate the kind of local support and local action which I have mentioned, public housing will have a better chance to move forward. It is up to people like you who are here today to do this job.

A successful campaign for public housing involves something more than loud shouting, or agitation. The way to win this cause is to fight with the head as well as the heart. You must profit by your mistakes. You must conduct your fight in accord with the spirit of the times, and in the light of your past experience.

I should like to summarize some of this experience, and the conclusions to which it seems to lead:

The greatest handicap to housing, until 2 years ago, was the number of housing agencies in the Federal Government. Congress was first bewildered, and then antagonized—and may I add "agonized"— by 16 or more bureaus and agencies, each trying to aggrandize itself instead of making every effort to help housing. Even assuming the noblest motives on the part of all these agencies and bureaus, it was utterly impossible to work out an intelligent housing policy or program under such divided leadership.

The housing reorganization of February 1942, which put all of these 16 or more bureaus and agencies under the National Housing Agency, was long overdue. This reorganization has resulted in economy. It has led to increased efficiency. It has removed squabbling, wrangling, and much scuffling from the Washington housing scene. It has raised housing in the esteem of the Congress. My prediction is that, when Congress considers post-war-housing legislation, it will confirm and carry even further this consolidation of the housing activities of the Federal Government. Common sense makes this much certain.

It is my firm conviction that both public and private housing can go ahead most effectively after the war only as a part of this consolidated program, and under the roof of the National Housing Agency, or one similar thereto. The Administrator of the National Housing Agency, Mr. John Blandford, is a warm friend of public housing. He has utilized and helped to keep alive the local authorities during the war. He has used public financing for about half of the recent war housing construction. When he says that we cannot expect anywhere near so large a proportion of publicly financed housing after the war, he is merely stating a fact. From my discussions with Mr. Blandford, and from some of his recent talks which I have read, I believe that he is following a wise and balanced course, for now and for post-war housing, in terms of the over-all situation.

The Congress is tired of the fighting among bureaucrats. Mr. Blandford has about stopped the bickering and has achieved a more unified housing front. In his congressional relationships he has accurately sized up the situation and has won the confidence of the Congress. The National Housing Agency and the comprehensive approach which it represents is essential to a future in which the whole housing need can be met, private and public, each operating within its proper field.

Another reason why public-housing progress has been slow has been because the program has been too limited in its objectives. We can all agree that slum dwellers need help first, and need help most. But at the same time, we must realize that no community can solve its housing problems by public housing alone. Public housing should do only the part of the job that private enterprise cannot accomplish. Private enterprise should be encouraged and facilitated to do as much of the job as possible, in fact, to the limit of its capacity. Only in this way can we really rebuild our communities. Only in this way can we really succeed in obtaining decent housing for all groups of Americans. Only in this way can we raise the post-war housing program to a magnitude through which housing can make its full contribution to post-war employment, prosperity, and high national income.

This means that in the communities private enterprise and public housing should work hand in hand. Local housing authorities, if they are to survive and prosper, must expand their activities and raise their sight. They must take the broad comprehensive view, at the local level, which the National Housing Agency is taking at the Federal level. They must concern themselves with helping to serve the whole housing needs of the community, through good land planning, through stimulation of private enterprise, and through public housing whenever necessary. They should not limit themselves to one narrow job, because the country wants to see the whole job done. In short, each local authority should view the housing needs under its jurisdiction through the small end of the telescope.

I have said that the National Public Housing Conference and the local housing authorities should work for public housing. But they must also work for something bigger than that. The National Public Housing Conference should not get into the role of a pressure group, fighting only to protect one particular housing formula, or one particular housing method, or housing only for one particular group, or one particular kind of local housing agency. If the conference gets into that kind of role, it will not command any more respect or support than any other purely selfish pressure group. The real job of people who call themselves public housers is to express the whole public interest in housing, and not just in public housing, and to work for all the kinds of housing which the people need. I say this to you as a friend of public housing. I know the congressional attitudes, and I think I know the temper of the country. Public housing should not try to go ahead on the old, narrow, limited basis. But if the local authorities, at the community level, adopt the broad and comprehensive approach to the whole job that the National Housing Agency has taken, under the leadership of the National Housing Agency, they will be very likely to succeed, and I know that the Congress will cheerfully respond.

I am extremely hopeful that before long there will be an opportunity to propose and enact comprehensive legislation dealing with post-war housing. This legislation should follow these broad lines:

1. The National Housing Agency, and the consolidation which it represents, should be improved and made permanent.

2. The National Housing Agency should be furnished with all the tools which may help and stimulate private enterprise to do as large a part of the post-war-housing job as it possibly can do.

3. The National Housing Agency should also have tools to assist communities to provide publicly aided housing for those whom private enterprise—with all the help we can give it—cannot serve.

4. The post-war-housing program should operate on an entirely decentralized basis, with the communities determining their own housing needs and requesting such financial assistance as they may require from the Federal Government. The Federal Government should not build houses or conduct direct housing programs.

I know that the National Housing Agency is also moving along this direction. If all those interested in housing will help the agency to continue to follow that course, the prospects for housing will be brighter than ever before.

In addition, I believe that the State enabling legislation, under which local housing authorities were established, should be broadened, to the end that there may be local agencies of Government to perform the role of the National Housing Agency at the local level.

I have tried to be very realistic with you, telling you exactly what the situation is as I see it. Public housing can be stronger if it does not try to move solely on its own steam. It can gather greater strength and go further if it joins hands with private enterprise in a comprehensive approach. Both groups must accommodate their views, avoid any appearance of being ideologists, and move toward housing unity. That is what the National Housing Agency symbolizes. That is what the Congress and the country want.

Permit me to thank you for this opporunity to address you. It is a great pleasure to be here with you and, may I repeat, you may count upon me to continue to help you in every capacity within my power.

Extension of Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the statement made before the Banking and Currency Committee today by Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange, in relation to the extension of the Price Control Act, as amended.

On behalf of the Grange, Mr. Goss urged extension of the act for 1 year only, but with amendments which would cause the Government agencies concerned to use the act to balance the national economy, instead of unbalancing it.

The grange master reiterated his opposition to general subsidies, asserting that unless a halt is called they will continue to grow and to augment a most dangerous economic unbalance. Nevertheless, Mr. Goss added, we must be realistic.

He said:

We are already in so deep that any sudden cutting off of funds would create serious trouble.

We don't like subsidies but believe that it would be better to taper off their use than to make too drastic and sudden a change.

Mr. Goss recommended that subsidy payments should be restricted to three types. Type I, which he called the copper type, would include cases where it is deemed necessary to increase production for war purposes by bringing into production additional high-cost crops. Type II is the so-called sugar type, limited to commodities of which more than half are imported and where higher prices would redound to the benefit of growers in other nations, whether or not it was needed to maintain production. Type III, called the two-price type, would assist American farmers in moving surpluses into world markets.

Subsidies not falling under one of those three types should be reduced not less than 10 percent per month until they have been eliminated, Mr. Goss said. The ceiling prices should be increased at the same rate that subsidies are decreased, he said.

Thus—

Mr. Goss said—

we could gradually work out of a most dangerous situation which, if allowed to continue, will lead directly to chaos. To assure that no loophole is found permitting expansion, a limit of $1,500,000,000 for subsidies on farm products should be maintained.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Office of Price Administration was established primarily to aid in the prevention of inflation. The National Grange has pointed out to this committee on several occasions the serious dangers which lie in placing our chief reliance on price ceilings as a remedy for inflation. Neither will a combination of price ceilings and subsidies meet the issue. Before Pearl Harbor we laid down some basic principles which we may well pause to review. At the seventy-fifth annual session in 1941 the National Grange declared in part:

"The right to store up the results of skill and labor in the form of property is fundamental to the preservation of the American way of life. One of the greatest dangers this country faces is from inflation, which, unless controlled, may destroy the foundations of our democracy. There are two methods of control: First is the use of economic devices designed to lessen the pressure of surplus income on inadequate supplies; second is the arbitrary control of prices, labor, rents, commissions, etc.

"Among the economic devices are—

"1. Encouraging savings and building individual reserves, to meet the shock of post-war adjustments.

"2. Increase in income taxation, coupled with efficient and economical administration of government, which will serve to retard inflation and prevent the passing of an unnecessary debt burden to future generations.

"3. Encouraging investment (by individuals in preference to banks) in Government securities which finance the borrowing from which employment and excess income are derived.

"4. Maximum production of all consumer goods, which can be produced without hampering production of needed defense materials.

"5. Restricting credit to productive purposes and sound investments in order to discourage speculation.

"6. Voluntary reduction of selling prices, when increased volume results in lower costs and increased profits. This will promote the benefits of a cycle of plenty by reducing living costs, reversing the trend of the evils leading to inflation, and laying a firm foundation for post-war adjustment.

"If these measures do not serve to prevent prices advancing unreasonably it may be necessary to resort to measures of arbitrary price control. In that event certain definite principles should be borne in mind:

"First, some advance in price is a natural accomplishment of the great destruction of wealth as a result of war. This advance is not inflation. It is an unavoidable cost which all must bear. Any adjustments of prices, wages, rents, or commissions which relieve any group of bearing its share of the cost will result in increasing the burden of others, and are unsound.

"Second, any effort to increase profits because of the increased demands is inflationary. If arbitrary control is necessary it should be limited to profiteering.

"Third, if control is necessary, further than well-defined cases of profiteering, all should be subject to control so that equity among all groups will be assured."

You will note that stress was laid on those features designed to lessen the inflationary gap—production, taxing, and savings—while price ceilings were recommended only as a last resort. With proper application of the economic devices designed to close this inflationary gap, little need for price ceilings would exist. We have felt that not enough stress has been placed on such economic devices and too much reliance has been placed on ceilings, with the result that in some instances production has been curtailed, the gap widened, and the danger of inflation enhanced. This has led to the dangerous use of subsidies, in lieu of fair prices, in an effort to keep up production, and has started us on a perilous course which if long pursued will lead to the very disaster we are trying to avoid.

Our views on this subject are in the record of previous hearings. We will not repeat them. Our immediate problem is what to do with the O. P. A. Should it be allowed to expire, or should its life be continued? If continued, should its powers be enlarged, curtailed, or continued as at present?

While we believe that if sound policies had been pursued from the outset there would now be little need for price ceilings, we are faced with the fact that such policies have not been followed, and we have developed a system of regimentation extending far beyond the imagination of most of us 3 or 4 years ago. In our opinion, it would be disastrous suddenly to abandon all the arbitrary controls and expect our economy to right itself through natural processes. It is too badly warped by artificial rules, regulations, and directives to right itself easily. We, therefore, believe that the life of the O. P. A. should be extended, but that amendments should be made to the basic law designed to turn its activities to a sound course, so that gradually we may be able to dispense with practically all the regulations except those necessary to assure an equitable division of inadequate supplies and those designed to prevent profiteering. In the control of profiteering the O. P. A. has been of real service. This work should be continued and strengthened, while the uneconomic features should be curtailed and gradually eliminated. To that end we have some specific recommendations to make. In considering the suggestions to be made we debated whether we should recommend a minimum number of changes designed to correct the most glaring defects in the law and its administration, or should go into more detail. We determined that it would be best to express our views quite fully, realizing that the exigencies of the situation might make it impossible for the committee to adopt as far-reaching changes as we or the committee might desire.

STABILIZATION OF WAGES

You will note from the last sentence quoted in the Grange pronouncement that "if control is necessary, other than well-defined cases of profiteering, all should be subject to control, so that equity among all groups will be assured." This means everybody—industry, labor, and agriculture. If one group were allowed to escape control the others would have to pay the bill and we would develop an unbalanced economy. This is exactly what has been done. To start with, the Price Administrator vigorously opposed any control of labor, and we developed a great unbalance in our economy. The following table shows what has happened month by month for the past 4 years. You will note that the increase in living costs has lagged behind the increase in labor costs all the way and has been about one-fourth as large:

Economic trends—Corporate earnings based on average quarter, 1939—Others based 1935–39

The Price Control Act was passed while the Price Administrator was still resisting any control of wages. The last sentence of Section 1 (a) ends with the words "to work toward a stabilization of prices, fair and equitable wages, and cost of production." Section 302 (c) however, provides that nothing in the act should "be construed to authorize the regulation of compensation paid by an employer to any of his employees." Just why this should be in the section devoted to definitions was never clear, but it was very clear that labor was to be omitted. Reference to the table will show that advances in labor costs continued unchecked, at a rate four times as fast as the increase in living costs, while the advance in farm labor costs were nearly five times as fast as the increase in living costs. After some months of trial it became apparent that the price structure could not be stabilized with labor advancing so rapidly, so in September 1942, the President asked Congress for amendments to the Price Control Act. He asked for definite controls of farm prices and asked that labor be left to him. The amendment of October 2, therefore, provides that the President may suspend the provision which forbids wage control "to the extent that it is inconsistent with the act." The whole question of wage stabilization seems to be more or less ambiguous, and we recommend that the matter should be clarified by amending the last clause of the last sentence of Section 1 to read, "to work toward a stabilization of wages and a stabilization of prices at levels which will meet the cost of production."

EXTEND LIFE ONE YEAR

We recommend that section 1 (b) be amended by changing the termination date to June 30, 1945. We do not believe it wise to grant a longer extension for we believe that Congress should have an opportunity to review the situation carefully and make any modifications in policy or procedure at least once each year.

SUBSIDIES

Section 2 (e) authorizes the Administrator to buy or sell commodities or to pay subsidies under one condition only; namely, where necessary to obtain maximum necessary production. This is limited by the proviso that if the shortage is in a "strategic or critical material" the transactions shall be carried out only by corporations organized pursuant to section 5 (d) of the R. F. C. Act. The committee will recall that the question of making available vast sums for the payment of subsidies was discussed on the floor of the Senate, but the proposal was withdrawn. Because of the trend in this direction we called the danger to the attention of this committee on September 16, 1942, saying:

"Subsidies are not mentioned in the President's message. Subsidies are not mentioned in the bill, but all the powers are there for their use if the President so decides. Congress should not pass by such a vital issue without an understanding on it. We believe Congress should set forth the policy of meeting the costs of war dislocation now by assuring enough flexibility in ceilings to meet these unavoidable costs."

We then proposed definite language to make clear the intent to modify ceilings when necessary, rather than to resort to subsidies. The language finally adopted after setting up the September 15 base was: "Provided further, That modification shall be made in maximum prices established for any agricultural commodity and for commodities processed in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity, under regulations to be prescribed by the President, in any case where it appears that such modification is necessary to increase the production of such commodity for war purpose, or where by reason of increased labor or other costs to the producers of such agricultural commodity, incurred since January 1, 1941, the maximum prices so established will not reflect such increased costs."

It is difficult to understand how this clear mandate of law could be misconstrued or ignored but the fact is that it has not been obeyed. Apparently the position has been taken that it did not supersede or modify the subsidy provisions of section 2 of the January 30 act. Twice by an overwhelming vote in each House, Congress has expressed its intent and purpose. The law and amendment still stand and in our opinion are being evaded. To prevent further misunderstanding on this point, we believe that section 2 (e) of the January 30 act should be amended setting forth clearly just what would be permitted and what prohibited.

There are certain types of assistance which are justifiable as a means of securing an extra supply of a commodity for war purposes from a high-cost source. Practically everyone believes that it is a sound principle to pay some copper producers an extra 2 or 3 cents a pound in order to add 10 percent to our total production if such payments are needed to enable them to operate some high-cost mines. It seems obvious that this would be better than to raise the general price level of copper 2 or 3 cents, thus paying 90 percent of the producers an excess profit. This is a sound principle. The confusion arises from the fact that Congress has been asked to allow subsidies based on this principle, but subsidies have actually been used for an altogether different purpose. They have been used, not on a selective base to pay the high-cost producers, but straight across the board to both low-cost and high-cost producers for the sole purpose of reducing the cost of food to all consumers, rich and poor alike. In the one case a normal compensatory price level would be maintained and only the high-cost producers would be aided, while in the other case an artificial price level below cost is created and the high-cost producers receive no more aid in increasing production than the low-cost producers. The market is upset and becomes entirely artificial and dependent on Government aid.

There are three types of selective subsidies. Instead of permitting an unrestricted use of subsidies, these 3 types should be defined by amending section 2 (e) of the Price Control Act of January 30, 1942, and restricting all subsidy payments by any agency to these 3 types. In addition to these 3 types is the support price which ordinarily is no subsidy at all, and which possesses none of the dangerous characteristics of a general subsidy. This should be defined and clearly outlined so that the Administration may have no doubt as to the purpose of Congress with reference to it.

Type I: This may be called the copper type and has been described above. It should be limited to cases where it is deemed necessary by the War Food Administrator to increase the production of crops for war purposes and when the following conditions are found to prevail:

1. That expanded production of such commodity would be possible only by bringing into production additional high-cost crops or high-cost producing units which can be clearly identified, defined, and segregated from the normal cost units for the purpose of subsidy payment.

2. It would be impossible to increase the sales price of the product of such high cost units without affecting appreciably the sales price of the whole commodity or group of competitive commodities.

3. The product of such high-cost units does not exceed 25 percent of the volume of the commodity or group of competitive commodities.

Type II: This may be called the sugar type. When we import in excess of 50 or 60 percent of a commodity, if we should raise the selling price to meet increased domestic costs, 40 or 50 percent of the increased selling price would redound to the benefit of growers in other nations, whether or not it was needed there to maintain production. In such circumstances special payments to domestic growers might be justified. They should be limited to commodities of which we import more than 50 or 60 percent or possibly even a higher percent.

Type III: This may be called the "two-price" type. For 20 years we have failed to meet our farm problems squarely with a two-price system for those crops of which we produce an exportable surplus. The portion used in normal domestic trade channels should enjoy the benefits of our protective economy in the matter of price, while the surplus should be sold in world markets or for less remunerative uses. Never having provided such a two-price system, we find it difficult to price such crops as wheat and cotton so as to make the maximum use of these commodities where they are most needed. In such circumstances a subsidy to make a long over-due two-price system effective might be justified. Subsidies to permit the use of wheat for feed, or short staple cotton for special war purposes, would fall in this class. This is more difficult to define, but consideration should be given to limiting this type of subsidies to those cases "where in the opinion of the War Food Administrator an emergency exists which requires the use of any commodity in channels of trade other than normal which will not support a price equal to that obtainable in normal channels of trade.

Support prices: A support price differs from a subsidy in that it is a device for preventing any commodity from being depressed to a figure below its cost or true worth. If properly used, it should neither cause too high or too low a price. It should stabilize the market and prevent dangerous and costly unbalances. In most instances it should cost the Treasury nothing because the market should eventually absorb any surpluses purchased thereunder. In connection with a sound two-price system this should universally be the case. Lacking a two-price system there may be occasional losses. Payment of such losses is justified as an insurance against the disaster which would follow if the losses were not met. The problem would be to prevent their use as a subterfuge for subsidies. This could be safeguarded by providing that when it is deemed necessary to sell a commodity acquired in support price operations at a price involving a loss, such loss may be paid where maximum prices and support prices have been established in good faith without any intent or expectation of selling the commodity below the support price so established. There should be a prohibition against etsablishing or maintaining a price ceiling below a support price.

Adjustment of ceilings: In order to prevent the general use of subsidies and to confine them to the types of cases described above, Section 2 (e) of the Price Control Act of January 30, should be amended by providing that before any purchase or sale is made of any agricultural commodity, or any commodity manufactured in whole or substantial part therefrom, for the purpose of maintaining, controlling, or modifying the price thereof; or before any subsidy is paid to the producers, processors or handlers of such commodity, any maximum price which may be in effect thereon shall first be adjusted, so as to reflect any increased costs arising from increased labor or other costs incurred since January 1, 1941, without the use of subsidies, except that losses resulting from purchase may be paid or subsidies may be used under any of the conditions outlined above.

Example of operation: If the law were so amended, most of the most dangerous use of subsidies would be avoided. For example take soy beans or peanuts. We need this excess oil for war purposes. It is our most practical source to obtain oil in needed volume, but the cost is excessive as compared with normal oil sources. These crops can be segregated from the whole vegetable oil group and since they can be so segregated and do not compose over 25 percent of the total, a subsidy can be paid on them without increasing the general price level of oils and fats. The principle is sound and complies with that set forth in type III.

TAPERING OFF PRESENT SUBSIDIES

General subsidies are like taking dope. When once we start, the demand is for bigger and better subsidies and they are very hard to get rid of. A year ago Congress was asked for but a few hundred million. Last fall this was increased to $800,000,000. Now we are told it will take a billion and a half. They will continue to grow and continue to augment a most dangerous economic unbalance unless stopped. Nevertheless we must be realistic. We are already in so deep that any sudden cutting off of funds would create serious trouble. We don't like subsidies but believe that it would be better to taper off their use than to make too drastic and sudden a change. Subsidies now in existence should be reduced not less than 10 percent per month on all those commodities which do not conform to the principles set forth above until they are eliminated. It should be made perfectly clear that ceiling prices must be adjusted as subsidies are reduced in order to maintain production. Thus we could gradually work out of a most dangerous situation which, if allowed to continue, will lead directly to chaos. To assure that no loophole is found permitting expansion, a limit of $1,500,000,000 for subsidies on farm products should be established.

PROTECTING FLOORS UNDER PERISHABLES

Section 2 (f) prohibits any governmental agency from selling any commodity within the United States below certain limits imposed in section 3. These limits are designed to prevent injuriously low ceilings. It is impossible for any administrator to judge the volume of production of any commodity with complete accuracy at the time when floors are established to encourage production. To make a floor effective the Government must be prepared to buy whatever is offered to maintain the price. In the case of a surplus of a perishable crop, the supporting agency should be allowed to sell any surplus it has to prevent spoilage or waste. We suggest adding to the end of subsection (f) "except in the case of a perishable commodity upon which a support price has been established in good faith, such commodity may be sold at less than the limitations herein if necessary to prevent spoilage or waste."

PRICE LIMITATIONS

Section 3 (a) and 3 (c) have been modified by the amendment of October 2, 1942, which will be discussed later.

PARITY

Section 3 (b) provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine and publish parity prices. Each year the legal definition of parity becomes more obsolete and meaningless. If Section 3 is to provide any substantial measure of protection for our food supply, the formula upon which parity is determined must be changed. This whole question needs comprehensive research for which there is not now reasonable opportunity, but the formula can be greatly improved and made to serve as a reasonably satisfactory makeshift device by correcting two glaring defects. Then we would hope the Congress would authorize a thorough study of the question for later action. Pending that time, let us continue to assume that the 5-year period 1909–14 is a reasonable base to which to tie, and correct the two glaring defects.

The present theory is designed to restore the farm purchasing power to that of the base period 1909–14. If production costs have gone up, and selling prices of farm products are increased by the same percentage, the theory is that the farm purchasing power will remain the same as in the base period. To determine the increased costs, a properly weighted index of practically everything the farmer buys is established. The costs of those items during the base period are known. Current prices on those same commodities are obtainable. If they show an increase of 50 percent in the index, farm prices should increase 50 percent to yield parity.

The first trouble lies in the fact that the cost of farm labor was omitted from the index of what farmers buy. Since this is the largest item of cost and since labor has gone up faster than almost anything else, it has thrown the whole formula out of kilter. In his message to Congress of September 6, 1942, the President correctly stated, "Calculations of parity must include all costs of production, including the cost of labor." No one can defend the omission and it should be corrected.

The second trouble is even more far-reaching. In order to determine the parity price on any commodity, the present formula would require adding to the 1909–14 price of that commodity the percent of increased production cost as determined by the index as just explained. The difficulty is due to the fact that we have changed our production and consumption practices very radically during the past 30 years, while the formula attempts to freeze us to the conditions of 30 years ago. For example, cattle were worth about $5.42 then, making a parity figure of about $9.16 today. At the other extreme, we can illustrate with grapefruit which was selling at about $10 a box then, making a parity price of $16.30 today. Both prices are ridiculously obsolete. This can be easily corrected by employing an index on commodity prices. Let the base period 1909–14 equal 100, and develop a weighted index of crops farmers sell just as we have done on things farmers buy. Then let us take the average commodity prices of the past 3 or 5 years. This constitutes a modern base and reflects the change in production and consumptive practices. Let us assume that this modern base is 60 percent above the 1909–14 base, while costs are up 69 percent. To get an up-to-date parity figure on any commodity we would add 9 points to the price used in the modern base instead of adding 69 percent to the price of 30 years ago as we now do. These two changes are simple and just. They ought to be made.

VETO OF WAR FOOD ADMINISTRATOR

Section 3 (e) provides for approval of any ceiling on agricultural commodities by the Secretary of Agriculture (now War Food Administrator) before it can become effective. Technical disputes have arisen over what is a farm commodity. A hog is a hog until it is killed, then it is no longer a farm product. Other sections of the act include the words "or any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity." These should be included in section 3 (e); otherwise the approval by the War Food Administrator is meaningless because the Price Administrator can name a price on a commodity as soon as it reaches the processed stage, and this price would immediately roll back to the producer and nullify any approval action which the War Food Administrator might have taken.

This confusion raises the whole question of control. There is now divided authority with reference to the problem of production and distribution of food. We recommend that the whole problem of food production and distribution of food be placed under the War Food Administrator, including price control and rationing. We will then get better production and lessen the need for control.

COURT ACTION

Section 204 (a) permits any aggrieved person to petition the emergency court of appeals for an injunction or set aside order. Subsection (b) limits this right to cases of law violation or arbitrary or capricious action on the part of the Administrator. Subsection (c) sets up the emergency court of appeals and then prohibits it from granting any such temporary or restraining action. Subsection (d) grants the emergency court of appeals exclusive jurisdiction of O. P. A. cases and denies any jurisdiction to any other court. The result is that citizens are prevented from having a day in court. We recommend striking from subsection (c) the words: "except that the court shall not have power to issue any temporary restraining order" etc., to the end of the sentence.

We also recommend striking the last two sentences in subsection (d) granting the Emergency Court of Appeals exclusive jurisdiction. Since section 204 (a) limits the right of action to aggrieved persons, and presumably denies the right to marketing or farm organizations which represent farmers, we recommend that the first sentence of this section be broadened to permit marketing or farm organizations to have a right of action. We also believe that the 60-day limit for filing protests (section 203 (a)) should be removed. Frequently the aggrieved person knows nothing about the issuance of an order or regulation until he attempts to market a crop some months or years later. If an injustice exists there should be no time limit imposed on its removal.

WAGE CONTROL PROHIBITION

While the October 2 amendment gave the President power to suspend section 302 (c) (1), which prevents wage control, we believe it should be definitely eliminated, for all should be treated alike. We therefore recommend striking section 302 (c) (1) from the bill.

PRICE CONTROL AMENDMENTS OF OCTOBER 2, 1942

We have covered section 1 and section 2 in our discussion of the original Price Control Act. We have also discussed a just parity formula covered in section 3.

We believe the text could be simplified by adding after the word "commodity" where it first appears, the words "or commodity processed in whole or substantial part therefrom"; then omitting the similar reference after subparagraph (2). In order to avoid any further confusion, we believe that in the second proviso the words "without the use of subsidies" should be inserted after the word "President."

Section 7 (c) provides that nothing in the Price Control Act of 1942 shall be invalidated except as outlined in section 2. Section 1 changes the basic price level date from October 1941 to September 15, 1942. It would seem that this makes a conflict which could be eliminated by adding to section 7 (c) the words "(1) and" immediately following the word "section."

We are informed that section 8 (a) (3) means that a loan to a noncooperator would be made at 9 percent on that portion of his crop which is not subject to penalty and at 60 percent on that portion which is subject to penalty. We doubt if the language if strictly followed permits such interpretation, and recommend that the purpose be clarified.

If the changes which we have suggested are incorporated, the net effect would be to:

1. Limit any further use of subsidies to those types which will aid in increasing production and which will not further increase our economic unbalance.

2. Gradually eliminate any subsidies which do not conform to those principles.

3. Establish a sound price ceiling policy which will aid in obtaining maximum food production and thereby help to check inflation.

However, we wish to point out again that price control can have only a minor effect in a long-range program of inflation control and no extensive reliance should be placed on it. We renew our recommendations made to the Senate Finance Committee that the program be supplemented by a sound and effective tax and savings program. We believe such a program is an essential part of any effective plan for curbing inflation.

George Washington's Political Creed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Political Creed of George Washington," delivered by George W. Maxey, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, at Congress Hall, Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Sons of the American Revolution, on Tuesday, February 22, 1944.

This message is an historical and timely one, and I am sure it will prove to be thought provoking and worth while to all who read it. The estimate from the Government Printing Office indicates that the cost of printing the address will be $135.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This occasion suggests a text: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standeth is holy ground." Here this Republic functioned for a decade. Here on March 4, 1793, Washington took his second Presidential oath. In this room in 1796 he gave out his Farewell Address and here in 1797 John Adams became President.

No other man has been so reverenced by Americans as has Washington. Our capital bears his name; before his tomb kings, queens, and statesmen have stood with uncovered heads; the world's loftiest monument is erected to his memory. When we compare this lip service to our country's father with our governmental acts since 1933 I am reminded of what Camille Desmoulins said to his countrymen during the Reign of Terror: "Ye worship the goddess of liberty not in principle but in stone. Liberty is not a nymph or a dirty shirt; liberty is governmental respect for the rights guaranteed in the constitution." The 1791 Constitution of France had declared: "The aim of every political association is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man. These rights are liberty, property, and resistance to oppression." Within 2 years after that constitution was adopted there was no liberty and no security against spoliation and oppression. Desmoulins and his wife died on the guillotine. The French constitution had become a scrap of paper. Is this Nation now on Washington's Birthday worshipping him in principle or merely in stone?

If you wish to know the political creed of George Washington study the Constitution. He initiated the movement for it. He presided over the convention which drafted it and he was the first of 39 men to sign it. When he did so he said: "Should the States reject this excellent Constitution, the next one will be drawn in blood." The colonists were then "drifting toward anarchy," and anarchy always leads to bloodshed and a dictatorship. A good citizen wants neither anarchy nor chains. In Washington's 133-word second inaugural address he expressed two thoughts—gratitude for the honor of his reelection and absolute fidelity to the Constitution.

In creating the Federal Government the American people laid down four commands, and these are clearly implicit in the Constitution they ordained. They are: (1) The Federal Government shall keep to its sphere and the States to their proper spheres of government. (2) No official shall be entrusted with autocratic power. (3) Unrestrained power shall never be lodged anywhere, not in the President, not in the Congress, not even in a majority. (4) There shall be maintained an absolutely independent judiciary. That our first President clearly recognized these commands are revealed in his many utterances. In his Farewell Address he admonished his countrymen to be ever on guard against "the consolidation of the powers of all the departments of the Government into one," and he said: "Let there be no change by usurpation, for it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed." He declared that "to preserve the reciprocal checks" provided for in the Constitution "must be as necessary as to institute them."

An official who flouts any of the four commands so clearly implicit in the Constitution and so strictly adhered to by President Washington is a would-be dictator. Hitler's first act was to abolish home rule and to concentrate all authority in Berlin. When he was seeking power he declared the German states to be "the historical cornerstones of the German Empire," and he promised to respect them. When he got power he created a centralized autocracy.

How fares this first principle in this country? On June 7, 1938, Senator King, of Utah, declared that "if present policies continue, the States will become mere shells out of which all life has departed." Governor Lehman, of New York, declared a few years ago that the Federal Government is exhausting the sources of the States' financial support and reducing the States to vassals. At the present time Pennsylvania has 44,500 State employees, but the Federal Government has 215,000 employees in Pennsylvania. One hundred and thirty years ago, the Federal Government had 1 civil employee for every 5,308 of our population; today the Federal Government has 1 civil employee for every 45 of our population, or 3,132,600. James Madison, the Father of the Constitution, protested in 1798 against "extension of the Federal power to every subject falling within the idea of the general welfare" and declared that one consequence of such extension would be "an excessive augmentation of the offices, honors, and emoluments dependent on the Executive will" and that "This disproportionate increase of prerogative and patronage must evidently either enable the Chief Magistrate of the Union to secure his reelection from time to time or to regulate the succession as he might please." He further declared that by this extension of Federal power "the transformation of the republican system of the United States into a monarchy would be accomplished."

The second command is: Entrust no official with autocratic power. No such concentration of power in the Chief Executive as existed before Pearl Harbor, to say nothing of what exists now, has ever before been seen in this Republic. Washington in his Farewell Address warned us against "that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart," and he declared that the consolidation of "the powers of all the departments" of government "into one will create a real despotism." Washington never intended this to be a one-man government. The refusal of third terms by Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and later Presidents was based on the principle that we live under a government of laws and not of men, and that the well-being of the Nation does not depend on any one individual. In 1901, at the very height of his popularity, William McKinley declared that "under no circumstances would he accept a third term in the presidency." Jefferson declared that the two-term precedent set by Washington was "sound and salutary," and that it is as much a President's "duty to lay down his charge at a proper time as to have borne it faithfully." He added: "If some termination to the service of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance." Fifteen years later, at the close of President Monroe's second term, Jefferson said: "The example of four Presidents voluntarily retiring at the end of their eighth year, and the public opinion that the principle is salutary, have given it in practice the force of precedent and usage, insomuch that should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust that he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views." For a score of years before his death, Jefferson urged the adoption of a constitutional amendment prohibiting a third presidential term.

When the American people believe that a finite human being, and not they themselves, is the source of all their well-being, they are slaves in their souls and are ready for their master. This has been demonstrated often in the laboratory of history. Porfirio Diaz ran in 1877 for President of Mexico on a platform of "no reelection." He served one term and in 1884 he was reelected and was continuously reelected until he had served a total of 27 consecutive years as president in name but as dictator in fact. In 1911 it required a revolution to drive him out of power. When the German people "hailed" Hitler as their savior they lost their right to life, liberty, and property, and got forced labor, concentration camps, prisons, firing squads, and headsmen in swallowtail coats and with uplifted axes. A great Democratic statesman, Champ Clark, said in Congress in 1908: "I congratulate Theodore Roosevelt on turning a deaf ear to those selfish flatterers who have endeavored to persuade him to violate the wholesome precedent of 111 years and run for a third term as President, for no President of the United States will ever be elected to a third term until this republic is on its last legs."

Jeremiah S. Black, said: "A republic with executive power and patronage perpetually wielded by the same person will soon cease to be a republic. When Caesar refused to lay down his consulship, as his predecessors had done, at the end of a year, and was reelected time after time with the acquiescence of the Senate and the people, all that was real in Roman freedom ceased to exist. Two republics in France were brought to an end in the same way. Napoleon began by being consul for a term, then was elected for life, and finally became Emperor, with the powers of an absolute despot. The last Bonaparte was President for 4 years, was reelected for 10, and ended, like his uncle, in grasping the imperial crown."

The third command of the Constitution is: "Never permit unrestrained power to be lodged anywhere, not even in a majority." Those Americans who want no curb on the majority are in accord with Lenin, who declared that "the revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat is not bound by any laws." Wherever this doctrine prevails no man's life, liberty or property is secure.

The fourth command is: "There shall be an absolutely independent judiciary." Where courts are servile the people are enslaved. There was no liberty in England until the Revolution of 1688 made judges independent of royal favor. Hitler's first act as Germany's dictator was to declare all judicial power invested in himself. When he invaded Austria he revoked the commissions of every Austrian judge and put puppets in their places. Napoleon III reduced French judges to marionettes.

Too long a tenure in the White House enables a President to fill the Federal benches with judges who are imbued with his own elastic conceptions of constitutional limitations. It is only natural that many of these appointees should be ambitious for judicial advancement. Seventy percent of the present occupants of the Federal bench owe their appointments to the only President who has served more than two terms. Tens of thousands of bureaucrats, known as administrative officials, have invaded the province of the courts and pass arbitrarily on more competing claims than are now submitted to judicial decision, and from their edicts there is practically no appeal. The present Chief Executive has urged upon Congress the enactment of laws "regardless of well-founded doubts of their constitutionality"; and so contrary to the precedents of 150 years have been the present-day adjudications of the highest Court in the Nation that certain members of it recently declared that its decisions have become mere "games of chance" and furnish no reliable guide to lawful conduct.

Washington had convictions not only as to the decentralization and limitation of governmental power but also as to the restricted range of government. He knew that the more contacts government has with individuals the more their liberties are curtailed. Society and the body politic are two different things. Statesmen recognize that fact and always labor to keep government in its place; visionaries always invite government to encroach into the domain of private affairs. Government perverted from its legitimate purpose, i. e., government "out of bounds" is lawless, oppressive, wasteful, and futile. This was proved when for centuries it intruded into the field of religion. It was proved when it attempted to legislate total abstinence into individuals and make the sobriety of the American people dependent on the efficiency of sleuths. The Man of Galilee never preached salvation by statute. He spent no time in the antechamber of Caesar.

Our Constitution was wrought out by statesmen and ordained by the people to protect human beings from the meddlesomeness of government as they exercised their natural rights. The Constitution commands the Government: "You keep your hands off natural rights, administer justice among men, but do not attempt to administer the personal affairs of men." To men thus freed of governmental shackles this Nation owes the unparalleled industrial prograss Washington predicted. He wrote to Lafayette: "Many blessing attributed to the new Government are taking their rise from industry and frugality." The great American inventions: The cotton gin, the telegraph, the telephone, the electric light, the air-brake, the automobile, the airplane, all were produced by freemen working in free shops, to which no bungling bureaucrat ever sent his edicts. A bureaucrat is an official who has not a dollar invested in the business he is bossing from a far-off easy chair and who is not 1 percent as competent to manage it as is the man who has created it and owns it and lives with it. Nowadays tax-paying businesses owned by experienced men are being arbitrarily restricted by officials of no experience, who scorn the lessons of others' experience, who are under no restrictions and who are supported by the taxes paid by the businesses they are doing their best to destroy. Bureaucratic edicts have the same effect on enterprise as weeds have on growing grain.

Twenty-six billion dollars of the productive wealth of this country was created by the inventions of Edison and $7,000,000,000 are earned each year by persons employed by reason of those inventions. The Government had nothing to do with Edison's inventions or the management of his shops, except to protect the inventions for a limited number of years. The same was and is true of Henry Ford. Edison has gone and Ford will go but the creations of their brains and enterprise and management will shower benefits on the human race through all coming time. This Nation owes a thousand times more to the initiative of individualists than to the intrusions of bureaucrats.

We hear a lot today about some "new freedoms." They are "new," indeed, for the greatest thinkers and the greatest statesmen who ever lived never heard of them. These new freedoms are "freedom from want" and "freedom from fear." Any man who declares that government can and should provide these freedoms is either an ignoramus or a fraud. Freedom from want is not a gift of government at all, and it is a gift of God only to the extent the recipient cooperates, for God helps only those who help themselves. The Indians had all the natural rights but they had freedom from want only when they hunted and fished with skill and success. Life was intended to be a struggle—not a "donation party." The Creator gave man the good earth, but in order to subsist man must cultivate it, for weeds quickly claim a fallow field, and it was long ago ordained that "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." It was the creed of Washington that every man should "hoe his own row" and that he would hoe better if he felt the spur of want. President Washington never recommended that the American people should squander themselves out of want, borrow themselves out of debt, or regiment themselves into freedom. He was old-fashioned enough to believe that wastefulness was wicked, work the way to well-being, and that the chief function of government was to protect individuals in the exercise of their natural rights and in the enjoyment of the fruits of their toil. In his Farewell Address he admonished his countrymen to "cherish public credit" as "a source of strength and security" and he declared that the way to "preserve it" was to "use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense."

No government protected Washington from want. As a youth he worked amid frontier hardships. Before he was 21 years of age Governor Dinwiddie selected him to carry the ultimatum from Virginia to Fort Duquesne because he was trustworthy, intrepid, and "skilled in forest-craft." The government did not give him those qualities; he acquired them. Washington and Christopher Gist left Fort Cumberland, Md., on November 15, 1753, "in excessive rains and vast quantities of snow," but inclement weather did not daunt them. They believed with the old trappers that "hard winters make fine furs." They struggled on through snow and forest, and whatever "freedom from want" they had they achieved. Upon uncushioned ground they slept at night the dreamless sleep of exhaustion.

Whatever education Washington got he got for himself. The halls of higher learning never echoed to his footfalls, but from hardy, self-reliant ancestors he received the best of all inheritances, character, and in a youth replete with arduous toil and dangerous tasks he proved himself dependable and steadfast and gained what Tennyson called the wrestling thews that throw the world. The sturdiest timber is always found in oaks which on wind-swept hills have defied and survived the storms. Neither Washington nor any of his associates in war or peace had any illusions about establishing a government able to create either wealth or happiness. What they fought for and won was the right of men and women to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They were too honest and too experienced to make extravagant promises or raise vain hopes.

You can read everything ever said by Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Lincoln, and all the other great men of this Republic and you will not find one word fostering the idea that it is the duty of the Government to guarantee any able-bodied individual freedom from want. Let any government promise freedom from want and there will spring up a multitude of languid loafers to prey on the posessions of those who are willing to work and save. For 144 years no President of the United States ever encouraged the taxing of the thrifty to support the indolent. Thomas Jefferson said: "It is the American way to find means within ourselves to surmount our difficulties and not to lean on others." Washington and Jefferson knew that if a government encourages leaning, the leaners will eventually so outnumber the lifters as to cause a complete collapse. Our first President's ideal American was not a "kept man." He preferred producers to takers.

Nor was it ever any part of the political creed of George Washington that the Government should be the administrator of individual enterprise, the planner of all business affairs and the director of the daily lives of the people. Washington and Lincoln were the two greatest men who ever served as Chief Executives of this Nation and neither of them ever claimed that he or the Government possessed such Godlike power that he or it could do any of the things that visionaries today declare it is the duty of the Government to do. Washington, like all great men, was a modest man and knew his own and others' limitations. Mrs. John Adams saw George Washington when he took command at Cambridge in 1775 and she wrote that "modesty marked every line and feature of his face."

Any man in public office or elsewhere who promises that through legislative magic the struggle of life will be abolished and that there will be equal rewards for the industrious and the indolent is not a leader but a misleader of the people. He is encouraging legislative hocus-pocus. He is catering to the people's wishbones and weakening their backbones. The baiting of electoral traps with political hokum is well known in the history of the fall of republics. Plato said: "Every tyrant made his first appearance as the friend and protector of the people." Alexander Hamilton said: "Of those men who have overturned the liberties of republics, the greatest number have begun their career by paying obsequious court to the people, beginning as demogogs and ending as tyrants."

No government can guarantee human beings freedom from fear any more than it can guarantee aviators freedom from falls by promising to repeal the law of gravitation. Fear is a useful part of the mental equipment of every human being. Salutary fear makes the general vigilant and prompts the soldier to take cover so that he will live to fight again. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and only those possessed of prudent fear are ever vigilant. Edmund Burke said: "Early and provident fear is the mother of safety." It was the absence of this provident fear that made it possible for the Japanese at Pearl Harbor to surprise our forces and in 2 hours kill 700 more Americans than were killed on either side in the battle of Gettysburg. It is fear of submarines that keeps our Atlantic patrol ever on the alert. It was provident fear that prompted Washington to conduct his masterly retreats in the face of overwhelming odds and thus save his slender forces for the crowning triumph at Yorktown. Fear of want and hope of gain have been the mainsprings of human ambition. They led your ancestors and mine to make the dangerous journeys in sailing ships from the Old World to the New. Coal to be mined, forests to be felled, fields to be plowed and planted, beckoned them. They hoped to gain economic security by honest work and frugality. All they asked was a free field, a fair chance, and the protection of the fruits of their toil. They had no desire to become wards of a paternalistic President. They were expecting work-outs, not hand-outs. None of them had learned to walk by being carried.

Washington's conception of government was that it is an agency to protect life, liberty, and property. The Constitution promises that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation and the United States Supreme Court of 70 years ago in applying this principle declared that, "To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals is nonetheless a robbery because it is done under the forms of law."

In his zeal to protect life, liberty, and property Washington ever emphasized as an article of his creed the maintenance of law and order, and that by force if necessary. When during his administration large groups in Massachusetts defied the law Washington wrote to a Member of Congress: "You talk of employing influence to appease the present tumults in Massachusetts. Influence is not a proper remedy for disorder. Influence is not government. Let us have a government by which our lives, our liberties, our properties will be secure, or let us know the worst at once." In other words, his idea was that if the Government was too feeble to maintain law and order it should be abolished for a better one.

When the Whisky Rebellion began in western Pennsylvania Washington issued a proclamation saying that the issue was "whether a small portion of the United States shall dictate to the whole Union," and he summoned armed forces, took command of them himself, and was on his way to lead them into action when the lawless bands decided that George Washington was not a President to be trifled with and so laid down their arms and surrendered. In his Farewell Address Washington said: "All combinations and associations under whatever plausible character to overawe or control the action of the constituted authorities are destructive of the fundamental principles of government." In the same address he warned the people against what he called "cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men" who "usurp for themselves the reins of government." He also warned us against those "disorders and miseries which incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual."

An important article of Washington's creed was preparedness. In his first annual address to Congress on January 8, 1790, he said: "To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace. A free people ought to be not only armed but disciplined." From 1776 to his last message to Congress in 1796 he urged and worked for the establishment of a military academy. In his fifth annual address to Congress, in this very room, he said: "The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

If this Nation had during the 1930's been mindful of that portion of Washington's creed, there would be no global war today. When Hitler began his conquests in 1939 he knew that we could then put in the field only 60,000 well-armed, well-trained troops; and a number of our short-sighted appeasers in Washington had done their best to give Hitler to understand that no matter what brutalities he heaped upon the rest of mankind this country would not fight. We even agreed to keep American ships off the seas so that Hitler's pirates could roam and rob and kill at will. All honor to Senator CARTER GLASS who shamed by the cowardly action of his country declared: "To keep American ships off the seas at the behest of that arch-assassin Adolf Hitler is a blot on American history and a dishonor to our dead." In saying that, CARTER GLASS showed the spirit of the Virginia statesman the world honors today, for Washington said in his last message to Congress: "To secure respect to a neutral flag requires a naval force organized and ready to vindicate it from insult or aggression. This may even prevent the necessity of going to war by discouraging belligerent powers from committing such violations of the rights of the neutral party as may, first or last, leave no other option." Washington knew that wealth plus weakness invites aggression and that a nation which is not prepared for war is ripe for slavery; some Genghis Khan is always ready to begin its subjugation. "Around every Rome hover the Gauls, around every Athens some Macedon."

It will always prove less expensive for a nation to be well armed in peace than to be ill armed in war; and this Nation may some time make the discovery that it is too late to prepare for war after war comes. Thanks to our allies in two wars our lack of preparedness did not prove fatal to our independence and freedom but its cost can be computed only in tens of thousands of lives and in billions of treasure. Some time we may tempt fate once too often. Adequate American preparedness would have prevented this present war. A mental and physical readiness to fight usually makes a fight unnecessary.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding about what Washington said in his Farewell Address as to our foreign relations. He never warned us against "entangling alliances"; he warned us against "permanent alliances" with foreign nations, so that we might at all times be free to act as our own interests should dictate. He declared that we could "trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies." That is what we did in 1778 when we temporarily allied ourselves to France, in our fight for independence. That is what we are doing now when we become one of the United Nations to save us and them from subjugation by barbarians. I think Washington would agree with William McKinley, who in the last speech he made said: "The day of America's exclusiveness is past," and that Washington would also agree with Woodrow Wilson, who said: "We are a part of the world and nothing that concerns the essential rights of mankind can be foreign to us. There is no 'entangling alliance' when all unite to act in the common interest and are free to live their own lives under a common protection."

There is nothing in Washington's character or in his career which indicates that he would be any more tolerant of international disorder in the 1930 decade than he was of domestic disorder in the 1790 decade. International peace, like domestic peace, is an order and there can be no order without compulsion. Organized force is a prerequisite not of war but of peace. Without international law backed by force, international order dissolves into anarchy, just as our cities when without police forces become the prey of criminals. The lawless hordes of the world are always ready to rise, and static right is never any match for dynamic wrong.

The United States has everything to gain and nothing to lose by its present powerful temporary alliances. Our Army and Navy will return from this war as they have returned from other wars, with new victories on our banners, new glories in our history, and our long record of heroic deeds will be enriched with new and shining pages. Then when peace comes and we are burdened with a debt of over $300,000,000,000, this Nation will be faced with the greatest crisis in its history, for while government can create debts they have to be paid by the labor and sacrifices of human beings. They cannot be liquidated by legislation.

To equip us to meet the crisis ahead of us let us begin at once to worship Washington not "in stone" but "in principle." Let us not commit the follies which in France led through wild extravagance and mob rule to bottomless bankruptcy and bloody festivals of destruction. That profound philosopher, Gustave le Bon, said of the French people of that period: "They resolved to break with the past, to establish a new era, and to legislate for the human race. They wanted to annihilate the past, but in the end they were annihilated. Their faith in the power of laws was absolute, but after 10 years of violence and destruction, of pillage and murder and massacre they fell into universal reprobation. The possibility of remaking society by laws has been given the lie by experience."

A so-called "planned society," or totalitarian control of all activities of human society, is only a new name for socialism, and socialism has never worked anywhere well and never worked at all except under a regime of slavery. The so-called "social democracies" of Russia and Germany were treadmills run by human beings under the prod of the bayonet, and with the mill's hum broken only by the salvos of firing squads. That clear-visioned labor leader, Samuel Gompers summed up socialism when he said to the socialists: "I have studied you and your doctrines; I have found them socially wrong, economically unsound, and industrially impossible." Samuel Gompers sensed the difference between statesmanship and political humbuggery. He knew that no government is able to guarantee any individual both civil liberty and economic equality. God did not standardize all human beings, and government cannot do it. When government attempts to make everybody economically equal, it ceases to be an administrator of justice between individuals and becomes an oppressive tyrant.

Ladies and gentlemen: In place of a totalitarian state controlled by a permanent occupant of the White House, I am for a Federal Union of 48 self-governing Commonwealths; in place of a tyrannical and enfeebling paternalism my vote is for a free and invigorating individualism; in place of socialism masquarading as planned economy, I make an appeal for the rugged Americanism of our forefathers; and in place of the myriad confusing edicts of a blundering bureaucracy, I propose the simple creed of George Washington: The Constitution of the United States!

Evacuation Day Speech by Senator Walsh of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an Evacuation Day speech delivered by me at the South Boston Citizens' Association banquet on March 16, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The 17th of March is a memorable day, not only in the history of Massachusetts and America but in the annals of the Irish people, for on that day 168 years ago an event took place here in the city of Boston that ended gloriously the first blow struck for freedom by the colonists of Massachusetts. And on this same date nearly 2,000 years ago there passed out of this life the saintly man who made the men and women of the Irish race Christians—followers and lovers of Christ.

It will serve no special purpose to enumerate the military events that took place prior to and following March 17, 1776. It is, however, important to realize and recall the inspiring objectives of the men who participated in those events and the heritage that they have bequeathed to us.

Our thoughts tonight turn instinctively to the great cataclysm which is rocking the very foundation of civilization—the present world war into which our country has been forced. Particularly in this crisis must we turn to Washington and the founders of this Republic as an outstanding example of the spirit of service, sacrifice, and courage that they displayed. We, too, during these days of anguish will march to a glorious victory if we emulate the band of patriots who witnessed 168 years ago the evacuation of Boston by the British soldiers.

We should be proud of our Massachusetts citizenship, for here the little flame burst forth that kindled the fire that finally set the whole world burning. This tremendous fact must never be lost sight of. Here was born the proposition which has leavened America and all the world—"Government of the people, by the people, for the people"; here was preached the inspiring doctrines that all men sowed in sweat, that every man could worship God according to his faith and conscience without let or hindrance from any man.

Every son of Massachusetts may well hold his head higher when he thinks of the glorious history of his native State and its contribution to freedom; yet to these splendid emotions the sons of the immigrant born on this soil add that of reverent gratitude; for here in the heart of this peaceful and well-governed community their fathers and mothers found that refuge and peace from enslavement which enabled them to labor in hope and security, build a home and bring up their children in the full knowledge that education and opportunity were free to all, and an unhampered future given to those who had the courage and industry to make a place for himself in this Republic.

Though of different racial stock, there were two common qualities of mind and soul between the colonists who successfully waged the Revolution and brought about the independence of the Republic, and the Irish immigrants who have come to America in large numbers. A strong religious faith and an intense love of freedom were characteristic of both.

The founders of this Republic never failed to turn to the Almighty for guidance and support in their conflict with the mother country, and particularly in their efforts to establish this, the Government of the United States of America. Washington never failed to recognize that religion was the main support of religious institutions.

"In God we trust" was their constant inspiration. In all their undertakings and pronouncements even before they first proclaimed those inspiring political truths which, like the shot at Concord Bridge, were heard round the world, they never forgot to place their reliance upon the Almighty. On the very first coins of the new Republic, as a check and reminder of the dangers of the materialistic philosophy of the Old World, they inscribed the words, "In God we trust."

Irish immigrants who came to this country, whether Catholic, Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, were deeply religious. Religion (their priceless bequest from St. Patrick) was their first and last consolation; their strength and their discipline in every avenue of life; their labors and hopes; their duties and their enjoyments. Their religion encouraged and consoled them when all else was lost in their fatherland. Exiled Irish who came to America clung to their reverence for and worship of the Supreme Being. Like the fathers of the Republic they had a devotion to freedom, an unshaking confidence in democratic institutions and a hatred of the tyrannical governments of the Old World. They, like the colonists, possessed a hatred of tyranny that permeated every fiber of their being. People who have a profound spiritual nature are naturally lovers of peace, haters of war, and can never countenance intolerance or persecution.

Let us preserve in this land of material plenty these two priceless heritages that have come down to us from the founders of this Republic and from our racial forbearers—religion and freedom. To the preservation and defense of these we pledge, as the signers of the Declaration did, our fortunes and our lives and our sacred honor.

As we meet here there is much discussion about the attitude of men and women of Irish ancestry toward the neutrality of Eire in this present war. First of all, let it be said that their Americanism is unquestioned. They are for America first and last. They seek no favors or special consideration for the little nation of their ancestors. Eire, like all other nations, has a right to decide her own domestic policies. It is in no conflict with the spirit of America, however, to ask that all neutrals in this global conflict who are honestly neutral and not officially interfering with or knowingly permitting their citizens to interfere with the war effort to aid the enemy should be treated alike by the United Nations. That is fundamental justice. Moreover, if any other course is pursued it is bound to follow that henceforth in any war there will be no neutrals—all small nations will be forced into war, regardless of sovereignty and the desires of their own peoples, by their more powerful neighbors. This would be the negation of every accepted and established principle of international law which defines and protects neutral rights.

There have been many plans proposed for a lasting peace at the end of this war. There is an almost universal belief among Americans that unless certain definite terms are incorporated in the peace our people will be greatly disillusioned. From the many suggestions made let me enumerate what seems to me and others to be fundamental principles necessary to obtain what seems to be essential to the future security of America and the peace of the world:

1. We must continue with the magnificent efforts thus far advanced to prosecute this war with absolute unity and determination to a victorious end.

2. Provide an Army, Navy, and Air Force for our own defense so strong that it will forever convince other nations of the futility of a successful attack upon us.

3. After the initial period of relief and reconversion we must keep out of the internal affairs of other nations; and we must learn to treat with tolerance conditions and idealogies which we do not sympathize with and which we do not want in America.

4. Following the establishment of a durable peace based upon charity and justice, we must whole-heartedly give our support to effective international cooperative action designed to prevent the recurrence of war anywhere in the world.

5. The peace treaty must remove some of the certain basic causes of war and this can be done only by acknowledging boundaries that will prevent any country being forced to remain poverty-stricken; that will assure necessary raw materials and trade opportunities to all small nations.

6. The peace terms should provide for the self-determination of nations that President Wilson so strongly advocated, avoiding the inequities of Versailles.

7. We must insist that those objectives named in the Atlantic Charter relating to self-determination be realized in order that no territorial changes should be made that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned and that sovereign rights and self-government be restored to each and every nation which has been forcibly deprived of them.

Let me recapitulate and reemphasize:

Before we abandon the old policy that we have pursued since the foundation of our Government—what is known as the free hand; namely, to make our decisions in regard to our relations with other nations as circumstances and events develop—we should be certain that we are entering a new policy that we believe will be successful in insuring freedom and peace for the future of the United States, in order that our people may work out their destiny at home without interference.

In considering our post-war foreign policy we must keep in mind some basic principles and truths. We should not forget that regardless of treaties and agreements and neutrality laws, which we ourselves rapidly repealed after the war broke out in Europe, a nation that does not pursue peace with the same zeal it is forced to pursue war, when war comes, will find soon enough that it is involved in the wars of other nations. Any nation that does not seek, plan, and cherish peace wholeheartedly cannot long resist war. Any nation that flirts with war, or is indifferent toward its neutrality, can easily find it.

Let it be clearly understood, however, that if the peace treaty is not founded on justice, then its terms can never be carried out except by force, and perhaps not even then. Certainly America will never join hands with other nations to enforce a treaty that fails to accord with the principles of justice and freedom.

Now a final word. Let us thank the Almighty that He has seen fit to preserve the American way of life for all Americans throughout the years. Let us strive for unity in America, not only during the war but after the war. We want no racial or religious prejudices in America. The people of South Boston, as all Americans should be, are opposed in any form to fascism, to nazi-ism, to communism. We want all races to be conscious of their racial dignity and to cooperate with one another for the preservation of America.

In memory of the founders of this republic and the gallant men who fought here at Dorchester Heights and later won for us our freedom, we pledge to America that we will ever live to defend her freedom, or, if called upon we shall die to preserve it against enemies at home or abroad.

Your Congress and Its Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. Samuel B. Pettengill, former Representative from Indiana:

YOUR CONGRESS AND ITS NEEDS

(By Samuel B. Pettengill, Member of Congress, Democrat, Indiana, 1930–38)

When an American first visits the Nation's Capitol he sees the old Supreme Court chamber now restored as it formerly was when Webster and Clay and Calhoun and their colleagues of the Senate of a century ago met to debate the great issues of their time. The attendant will point out the very seats which these great men used.

"There were giants on earth in those days, mighty men which were of old." It is easy to see Webster, "the Godlike Daniel," standing by his chair as he made his magnificent reply to Hayne. It is said that when he finished someone asked Webster how long it took to prepare that speech, and his reply was "25 years."

This answer illustrates what has happened to Congress and parliamentary government everywhere in the intervening century. Twenty-five years. Men had time to think and brood and ponder a hundred years ago. In contrast, I recall former Governor Montague, of Virginia (then a Representative), telling me in my first year in Congress that "We don't have 15 minutes a day of uninterrupted time for the real business we were sent here for—to write the Nation's laws."

The contrast shows not only what has happened but how necessary it is for us to understand the difficulties and the hurried atmosphere in which a modern Congress meets. The independence and effective functioning of Congress is more important now than then to millions of Americans and to their children.

When Webster spoke in 1830, there were only 48 Senators in place of 96; 203 Congressmen in place of 435; a population of 13,000,000 instead of 135,000,000. The first locomotive was still scaring old dobbin; the first oil well had not been dug. The modern age of technology, chemistry, medicine, and power was just knocking at the door. It is probable that in the intervening century a greater advance has been made in technical progress than in all previous time. The span of life has been doubled; modern tools have quadrupled the productivity of worker and farmer; famine and pestilence have been abolished over great stretches of the earth. Only war, death, and taxes remain.

But while mankind has been scaling the peaks of science and invention, we have not only failed to climb—we have slipped downward in the field of constitutional government. That in part is the meaning of this World War No. 2. At home for the past 20 years at least we have seen the executive power grow at the expense of Congress, and the Federal Government at the expense of the States and local communities.

Here, as abroad, we have been moving toward one-man government. No one who loves his country—and his children—can view this trend without deep misgiving.

It seems, therefore, of the utmost importance for the average citizen to increase his respect for Congress—the sheet-anchor of his liberties—and for Congress to earn his increasing regard. And the beginning of that wisdom is understanding.

I think of great-grandfather, perhaps, listening to Webster, and you of today seeing Congress in action for the first time. How many times I have thought of the poor impression Congress must make on those who see it for the first time from the gallery. Yet, if the visitor followed his own Congressman around for 1 typical day, I am certain he would come home with a growing regard for one of the hardest working groups of men in America.

Let us look both at the appearance and the reality.

From the gallery one ordinarily sees few Members on the floor. Those present seem to be paying little attention to the proceedings. They are coming and going, talking with one another, reading the paper. Compared to the picture of Webster replying to Hayne, one is bound to have a distinct let-down.

But the visitor is there for only a few minutes, an hour at the most. He does not stop to think that the session he is witnessing began sharply at noon and will continue for 4 or 5, sometimes for 8, 10, or 12 hours. Long before such a session adjourns, even the visitor in the gallery would want to get up, stretch his legs, talk to his friends, and perhaps glance at the latest headlines.

The real work of Congress is done in committee. What the visitor sees from the gallery is actually a ratification meeting on some proposal that has been already thoroughly threshed out in committee.

Every session, thousands of bills are introduced. They are referred to some 40 committees of the House of Representatives and a corresponding number in the Senate. An important committee such as that on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I was a member, will have referred to it in a single session several hundred bills. Some of these are of the greatest importance. When a committee takes up one of these bills, hearings are held in which a "day in court" is given both to those who favor and those who oppose. This is the American way. No judgment is formed on the important matter until both sides have been heard.

BEHIND THE SCENES

These hearings are held in the forenoon; consequently, the Congressman has already done half of a day's work before Congress assembles at noon. On an extremely important bill, it is not unusual for hearings to last 2 months or more and then when they are concluded it often happens that the committee will spend another month in rewriting the bill. Some of these bills are in themselves 200 to 300 pages long. I recall one in particular which my committee considered practically every working day for 5 months. If the visitor in the gallery had ever been a member of a jury back home trying a case which lasted 5 weeks, to say nothing of 5 months, he would know better what his Congressman is up against.

When one of these 40 committees finally reports a bill for action to the full House or Senate, the subject matter will generally have already come to the attention of all of the Members, for the reason that, if the bill is at all important, each Congressman, even though not a member of the committee having jurisdiction of the bill, will have probably been bombarded for weeks with hundreds of letters and telegrams, both for and against its passage. Constituents from his district interested in the bill will have come down to Washington to present their claims to him in person.

The result is that by the time the bill reaches the floor, the average Member already knows a great deal about it and has probably made up his mind how he is going to vote. Occasionally, argument on the floor is fresh and new, but to a large extent it simply repeats what the Member has already heard over a period of weeks or months. This being the case, it is not strange that the Members are not in unanimous attendance when a bill is under discussion on the floor previous to the time it comes to a final vote, that they apparently pay so little attention to what is being said.

Each of the 40 committees is a little Congress in itself. Unless the work were thus subdivided, it would be impossible for Congress to consider a tenth or a hundredth part of the legislation that actually passes during a session. These committees have from 3 to 43 members in which both the majority and minority parties in Congress are represented, which again assures against arbitrary action.

All Members of Congress have a great deal of confidence in the members of various committees. When a committee, therefore, reports a bill favorably, either by unanimous vote, which is true in the greater number of cases, or by an overwhelming majority, it is natural that the other Members of Congress, who have been themselves busy on the work of their own committees, will accept the recommendations of the committee having charge of the bill. It is only in the exceptional case, where there is a strong minority report from the committee reporting the bill, that there is apt to be serious and heated discussion on the floor.

In addition to his legislative work, the modern Congressman often receives from one hundred to five hundred letters a day and sometimes an equal number of telegrams. The senders always expect at least the courtesy of an acknowledgment and most of them really desire a careful reply. In addition, he receives hundreds of requests to go up to one of the departments and plead the cause of a constituent. For example, in applications for pensions before the Veterans' Administration, the Congressman often participates almost as a lawyer in court, for which, of course, he makes no charge. Then there is the constant round of people dropping in from the district who want cards to the White House or some other courtesy.

It is a killing pace. The mortality of Members is much higher than the average in civil life for men in the same age limits. Sessions that formerly lasted only 3 months are now almost year-round affairs.

WHY BELITTLE CONGRESS?

A number of things contribute to put Congress in the mother-in-law class before the people. One is the general attitude of the newspapers, press correspondents, and citizens of the District of Columbia. The feeling between Washington City and Congress is seldom very friendly. There are many reasons for this. One is the old story that familiarity breeds contempt. More important, however, is the fact that the downtown departments wage a ceaseless war against Congress to increase the appropriations of public money for the departments to spend. No downtown department ever thinks of saving money. Congress, therefore, which has direct responsibility to the taxpayer—and you are one—is the inveterate opponent of downtown Washington. Congress is always a stingy old tightwad to the bureaucrats.

Moreover, the support of the municipal city of Washington, D. C., comes in part from congressional appropriations, and there is a constant struggle on the part of the people who own property in Washington to shift the tax burden from their own shoulders by getting larger appropriations for the District from Congress. All of this creates an unfriendly attitude toward Congress in the Nation's Capital, for which I think Congress is very little at fault, but with the unfortunate result that the news pouring out from the Capital concerning Congress is often tinctured with malice.

A certain type of Washington correspondent or cartoonist is never happy unless he is ridiculing Congress. I give two illustrations among many: One is the recent uproar about gasoline ration books for Congressmen. You would have thought that Congressmen were using most of the petroleum in the United States, whereas it was not a drop in the bucket to the tank cars emptying into the tens of thousands of automobiles in the executive departments. Another illustration is the furor against Congressmen using the frank to send speeches into their districts. Again, the amount of free mail franked out by the executive departments is 20 times that sent out by Congress, yet these razzle-dazzle boys who make up so much of the alleged news never tell you that. To listen to them, you would think that Congress was sending you to the poorhouse on account of their franked mail. The congressional frank is sometimes abused but, on the whole, I thoroughly approve of its use by Members of Congress. It is often true that not a single newspaper in his district is friendly to the sitting Congressman, although he is actually there because a majority of his people want him there. If he were not enabled to state his position to his constituents by franked mail, he would often be precluded from any real chance to have them understand his position on important matters. Meantime, a rival back home who has no congressional duties could constantly undermine him.

OUR GREATEST SAFEGUARD

Congress makes the laws, the executive administers them, the judiciary interprets them in litigated cases. Our fathers intended each branch to be coordinate and independent from each of the others. They recognized the teaching of all history—that unlimited power can be trusted to no one, "not even to the largest majority," as the Constitution of Wyoming says.

This is our great system of checks and balances—perhaps the most important political idea that ever came from the mind of man. Incidentally, don't let anyone tell you that the Bill of Rights—the first 10 amendments—is the heart of the American Constitution. If I had to choose the chief safeguards of freedom, I would put in first place this great principle of checks and balances embedded in the original Constitution before it had been amended. Preserve that and "Liberty has still a continent to dwell on."

However, there have been times when Congress has encroached on the Executive, as in the reconstruction period following the Civil War, and times when the Executive power has put Congress in the shadow. Heretofore, however, the common sense of a great people has in time always put encroachers back in their places. Our soldier sons are doing that right now.

As you see, I am frankly a friend of Congress. It is historically true that no parliamentary body ever destroyed the liberties of a people. They may have finally ratified the destruction of the people's liberties, as did the German Reichstag, but they did not originate the destruction. The danger to constitutional liberty comes from other sources.

The huge bureaucracies which now administer Government, consisting of some 3,000,000 civilians, do not owe their positions to the people except indirectly, nor can they be fired by the people. The Federal judiciary holds office for life. The one agency of our Government at Washington that is close to the people is Congress. It is the people's champion, as has been fully demonstrated in recent months. It listens to the people's grievances and fights their battles against the bureaucrats.

It was to preserve the blessings of liberty "to ourselves and our posterity" that the Constitution of 1787 was written. A feature of the Constitution, the value of which is too little appreciated, is the fact that all Members of the House and a third of the Senate must submit themselves to the people every 2 years in elections that cannot be postponed. A body of Representatives over whom the people have such a close control can be trusted with the people's liberties. The people can dismiss them if they fail. Different from the law with reference to many minor officials back in the States, who sit until their successors are elected to actually qualify, no Congressman can sit for a single day after the expiration of the 2-year period for which he was elected unless, of course, he is reelected.

In England there is no such basic law. The British Parliament is supreme. It can vote itself indefinite tenure in office and there is no law to prevent Parliament voting itself office for life or to make the office hereditary to their own sons. As a matter of fact, the present British Parliament, whose term normally should have expired in 1940, has voted itself continuance in office without an election. In England there has been no parliamentary election for 8 years and no one knows when one will take place. It is probable that the British Parliament, or at least a majority of its members, have the continued confidence of their constituents, but there is no way to prove it. To me, it is a somewhat ominous thing that the chief legislative body of one of the few remaining democracies left in the world declines to submit itself to the people.

WHERE DANGERS LURK

Many Americans who are ignorant of our Constitution sometimes express the fear that a congressional election might be suspended in this country under some so-called unwritten law of survival in time of war or by the will of the Army under orders from the President. I have no such fear. The damage to our form of government will come in more subtle ways. Among them may be the following:

(1) Disparagement of Congress. We have seen signs of this, especially by left-wing groups in this country whose members could not win a single seat in Congress in any State, and therefore seek places of power by boring from within in the executive department;

(2) The gradual transfer of the powers and responsibilities of Congress to executive departments and bureaus, which in increasing fashion are writing rules and regulations having the force and effect of law;

(3) Another danger that confronts Congress as an institution of freedom, is the power of propaganda which has been so tremendously augmented in recent years by the silver screen and the radio. There is no one man who can speak for the 531 members of the House and Senate. There is no way for all of them to speak collectively over the radio. When the President or a Cabinet member presents his case to the people, the press, the radio, and the silver screen focus upon him as a single human being. In the use of propaganda, Congress is at a great disadvantage.

These new inventions in the field of mass communication have been largely responsible for the rise of dictators and the twilight of representative government in many hands. We must recognize them in this country for what they are—instruments capable of great good or immense harm. It is possible that we will have to devise methods by which Congress, or the "opposition" on every important question shall have equal radio time with the President on an equal number of stations. The American people are entitled to hear both sides. That privilege is enjoyed by few people on this planet today.

But Congress is itself at fault in failing to keep abreast of the stream of events. It has become too habit-bound. It needs to modernize itself. It needs a new set of tools with which to work.

DESIGN FOR NEW TOOLS

As a suggestion, Congress should cut off $100,000,000 or more to the Washington bureaucrats and vote itself $10,000,000 worth of expert help. That would save $90,000,000 at the outset and hundreds of millions, if not billions thereafter. You should insist that this be done. It would be one of the best investments you could make. Let me illustrate:

At the present time there are only two standing committees of Congress that have any competent full-time assistance in the necessary analysis and research on bills. These are the House Committee on Ways and Means, and the Senate Committee on Finance. They have a small but excellent staff of year-round technicians to help them prepare tax legislation. These men are not appointed by the President. They are appointed by the tax committees and generally stay on year after year regardless of changes of administration. They cannot be hushed or cowed by Treasury officials either through fear of losing their jobs or through ignorance of the subject. They can concentrate on tax legislation the year round and advise committee members what questions to ask the Department representatives, in the same way that a lawyer trying a poison murder case gets the competent advice of toxicologists, physicians, etc., to aid him in examining witnesses.

Every standing committee of Congress should have similar expert, year-round help—the committees dealing with interstate commerce, agriculture, banking, mining, Army, Navy, foreign affairs, judiciary, public lands, veterans, irrigation and reclamation, civil service, immigration and naturalization, pensions, Indian affairs, labor, merchant marine, patents, post offices, rivers and harbors, roads, etc. Without such assistance, independent of "downtown" influence, Congress is handicapped in analyzing legislation, finding the bugs in it, or where millions can be saved. Congressmen have to rely on the advice of the brain trusters in the Chinese maze of executive departments, commissions, and bureaus, or upon the views of outside pressure groups—both of which are colored by self-interest.

A CURB ON TAXEATERS

The executive departments always want money. They are the spending branch—and, believe me, they spend. They know how to dress up their recommendations to get more money to hire more pay-rollers. Congress is the appropriating and taxing branch responsible to you. It must take steps to insure its capacity for independent judgment.

Aside from executive pressure for appropriations, unwise legislation throws terrific burdens on business, and is constantly being amended by patchwork. Congress today doesn't have the time, nervous strength, or information to write legislation so thoughtfully that it will stand up for years. The important paragraphs of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1889 were studied so thoroughly and written so carefully that they haven't been changed in 54 years. And, paragraphs of the Judiciary Act written by the First Congress in 1789 have scarcely been changed by a syllable in 154 years. Then, men had time to think.

IN PLACE OF A POET

Don't blame Congressmen or Senators for not doing a better job today. They neither have time to carefully answer their mail nor run all the errands for their constituents, and certainly not enough to spend months of uninterrupted study of important bills. If they did take the necessary time to be legislators, as men could do in 1789 or 1889, they would be defeated at the next election for failing to answer letters.

In addition to a small staff assigned to each important committee, there should be available to Congress a research body under its control, something like the Brookings Institution or the National Industrial Conference Board—recognized economists, engineers, statisticians, library researchers, field investigators, etc.

The Library of Congress was originally supposed to be the expert arm of Congress. But it has lost its prime function and should be reorganized from cellar to garret. It is just plain foolish that the Librarian of Congress should be appointed by the President and be responsible to him, rather than be appointed by the majority and minority leaders of House and Senate and be responsible to them. At the present time the Librarian is a poet, an appointee of the President, and that affects the attitude of his hundreds of assistants. During the fight to prevent the packing of the Supreme Court it was like pulling teeth for the opponents of that bill to get any real research material from the Library.

GET BEHIND THIS BILL

Senators TYDINGS, BYRD, GEORGE, and Congressmen DIRKSEN, of Illinois, LANHAM, of Texas, LAFOLLETTE, of Indiana, and many others of both parties are trying to get Congress to hire itself a set of modern tools. The country should tell Congress to go ahead.

Thomas Jefferson said to President George Washington that "If the equilibrium of the three bodies—legislative, executive, and judiciary—could be preserved, if the legislature could be kept independent, I should never fear the result of such a government; but that I could not but be uneasy when I saw the executive had swallowed up the legislative branch."

Congress is the great board of directors of the American people. It is the policy-forming agency of a free people. It can declare war. It can draft your sons. It can make money sound or worthless. It can make free enterprise flourish, or cause it to wither and die under execessive regimentation or by bleeding it to death through ruinous taxation. Its decisions for weal or woe affect every hearthside. Depending upon its wisdom and courage, your children will live to be free men in a free land, the masters of their government—or its slaves.

Whatever diminishes the authority of Congress impairs the security of your liberty. The lights of liberty have gone out all over the globe. Will they shine bright and clear from our windows when our soldier sons come home?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the House has just passed an amendment forbidding A. A. A. employees to require farmers to join up with the A. A. A. as a condition of draft deferment or for the granting of a priority certificate for any rationed article or commodity. This amendment was adopted as a result of the innumerable complaints that have come to Congressmen from farmers who did not belong to the A. A. A. that if they did not join up they would not be allowed to have any more gasoline or purchase farm machinery or be allowed draft deferment.

The letter which follows shows another arbitrary and tyrannical A. A. A. regulation. Here is a farmer who never took part in the A. A. A. program because he did not believe in it. Inasmuch as he could not get a fair price for his product in the market and along with the other farmers of the country is being forced either to accept a milk subsidy or operate at a loss to the amount of the difference between a fair market price and the O. P. A. ceiling price, he decided he had better take the subsidy. But upon making application for the subsidy he was turned down by the local A. A. A. officials because he had never filled out crop reports.

The farmers may well wonder what is going to happen to them should the A. A. A. continue increasing its interference with farming operations and issuing these arbitrary rules and regulations. Even the farmer who once believed in the A. A. A. is learning that it is not his friend. The A. A. A. is right now turning its back on the farmer in spinelessly standing by and allowing the Government to take farm machinery out of 1944 farm machinery production and give it away to peoples in far off foreign lands under the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, U. N. R. R. A., when our own American farmers need it so badly to produce the necessary food for our soldiers and our food-rationed people.

ARLINGTON, OHIO, March 24, 1944.

Dr. FREDERICK C. SMITH,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regard an incident which I think you should know about.

I am 35 years of age and have been a farmer all my life, and have never believed in the A. A. A. program and never participated in it at any time. This has led to a great many differences, as they have insisted upon sending their men to have me fill out this form and that, which you must know about.

When the milk subsidy was forced upon us in lieu of a fair price for feed, I considered it my privilege to collect the same as others. However, upon presenting my milk slips to the A. A. A. offices at Findlay I was definitely informed that I could not be given my payment because "I had never filled out my crop reports." I tried to explain to the member that I thought that the milk subsidy had no connection whatsoever with the A. A. A. program and that they were just acting as an agent for the C. C. C. in making these payments. I was definitely refused, however.

This was for the first month and I have never been back since, feeling that it would be of no use.

Yours respectfully,

THERON F. EDIE.

Collective Bargaining, 1943 Model

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Collective Bargaining—1943 Model," delivered by Hon. Edward R. Burke, a former Member of this body, at the annual meeting of the Operators' Association of Williamson Field, Williamson, W. Va., on February 24, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Few will be heard to challenge the theory of collective bargaining. It offers the only alternative to some form of collectivism. In an industrial age some means must be found for good-faith bargaining between management and workers for the adjustment of wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment. Private capital and the profit system, as well as free labor, are dependent upon the success of the bargaining process. Otherwise organized society—the state—will dictate to both sides.

Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act in 1935 to foster collective bargaining. The purpose of the act is beyond criticism. Not so much can be said for the means adopted to accomplish that purpose. The sponsors of this legislation frankly admit that it is heavily weighted in favor of one of the parties—organized labor. You will recall the imposing list of actions that constitute unfair labor practices. Upon whom do these restrictions rest? Upon the employer only. It is as if the framers of the act were of the opinion that there are no unfair labor practices that organized labor could, or would, commit. Every impartial person of any sense whatever knows that labor has a whole arsenal of such weapons. The most up-to-date weapons. Always loaded. And no hesitancy in using them.

There is a reason sometimes given in justification of the one-sidedness of the Labor Relations Act and in its administration by the first Board set up under it. On numerous occasions I have heard the first chairman of that Board say that it was his belief that through the years the scales had been weighted in favor of the employer. His conclusion was that since that was so, it is only fair now to put the weights all on the other side for a while. Even if we grant that employers did have the advantage, and did use it unfairly, it does not follow that the correct procedure now is to give an unfair advantage to labor. Far better for labor in the long run, and for the country as a whole, to strive now for even-handed justice. One of the imperative needs is to have enacted some fundamental amendments to the Wagner Labor Relations Act. On another occasion I shall give my views on that subject.

It is my purpose at this time to talk about collective bargaining in actual practice in the industry in which we are all vitally concerned. Just about a year ago your representatives went to New York in compliance with the contract requirement to consider with the U. M. W. A. what changes, if any, should be made in the contract then in force in reference to wages, hours, and conditions of work. That contract had been executed only about 18 months prior thereto. In it the union had been granted every demand that it urged, including a wage increase that amounted to 25 percent for most miners in the southern fields. The union was so well pleased with its efforts that when it secured the operators' signatures it declared that the contract was the best under which miners anywhere in the world had ever worked. That it changed into reality for the men who mine coal what had theretofore been only an idle dream.

With those thoughts in mind it seemed to your negotiators that the sensible thing for the parties to do would be to renew the contract for the duration of the war. Even that fulsomely praised agreement had been twice amended for the great benefit of the miners. The vacation clause had been changed so that workers received full pay for that period in addition to the vacation payment.

The workweek had been extended with payment at time and one-half and rate and one-half for all work performed on the 6th day.

The union scoffed at our suggestion. It was evident that they proposed to capitalize to the fullest extent possible on the imperative necessity for coal for the successful prosecution of the war. So they presented some 19 demands. Three of these were major items, and it is these only that I will discuss. (1) A straight wage increase of $2 per day. (2) Portal to portal pay. (3) Elimination of the exemption clause so that all supervisory officials could be taken into the union. We were told in plain language, and repeatedly, that no contract would be negotiated that did not grant each and every one of these three demands. Let us now discuss them, but not in the order stated.

I. UNIONIZATION OF SUPERVISORY OFFICIALS

Until October 1942 the constitution of the International Union, U. M. W. A. had expressly prohibited union membership for foremen, supervisors, technicians, or anyone connected with management. The wage agreements contained a like exemption. This was in accord with sound policy. Discipline, safety, efficiency, real collective bargaining, all require that everyone connected with management be primarily loyal and responsible to management. That is just another way of saying that a person subject to that requirement cannot belong to a union. For the union demands loyalty to it first and foremost. Some events of 1943 indicate that loyalty to union, in the minds of many, comes ahead of loyalty to country.

However, due to administration policy, labor in 1942 was riding the crest of a unionization wave. Organizers looked upon supervisory classes as a fertile field. What was called a mine officials union was formed at the Union Collieries Co. in western Pennsylvania. It demanded recognition as a collective bargaining agency. The demand was denied. Eventually the case reached the National Labor Relations Board. Your spokesman intervened. Argued. Filed briefs. It was of no avail. In September 1942, by a two to one decision it was ruled that such a union was an appropriate unit for collective bargaining purposes under the National Labor Relations Act.

The majority opinion called attention to the fact that it was dealing with an independent union. It emphasized that it was not giving its approval to one union composed of both a segment of management and of workers. The minority member, more realistic, expressed the fear that distinction was theoretical rather than real since the same bargaining representatives would undoubtedly speak for both.

As a matter of fact, scarcely had the ink dried on the signatures of the misguided majority in the Union Collieries decision when the organizers of this so-called independent mine officials union appeared before the high officials of the U. M. W. A., hat in hand, and petitioned for admission. With tongue in cheek, Mr. Lewis listened. You have already guessed the answer. He acquiesced. The independent union agreed to dissolve effective as of March 31, 1943. The U. M. W. A. agreed that on midnight of that day these new members would become regular members of its organization and thereafter would be represented by it in all matters. In a communication to all his district and local officers, Mr. Lewis bade them welcome with open arms—these 600,000 new members; $600,000 more for the already overflowing treasury by way of the initiation fee. Something like $120,000 a month additional regular income in the form of dues. But more than all that, a new and powerful club to use on the heads of an already distraught management.

No wonder Mr. Lewis and his associates would not agree to continue a contract that contained a clause forbidding this whole program. Nor is it hard to understand the extreme vigor of the attack on your negotiators to try to force them to agree to a contract with the exemption clause eliminated. It was an effort, however, that did not succeed.

Then in May 1943 there came to pass a miracle. The National Labor Relations Board reversed the Union Collieries case. Former Congressman Houston, of Kansas, had replaced Leiserson as a Board member. There came before the Board a new case, Maryland Dry Dock Co., involving the same question. Now, by a 2-to-1 majority, the Board ruled that a union composed of supervisory officials is not an appropriate unit for collective bargaining. That is the law today. No employer need engage in collective bargaining with, or recognize in any way, a union which contains any supervisory officials.

There was a hearing before the National Labor Relations Board on February 15, 1944. The sole issue in the case on appeal was whether it would be an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge a foreman because of his membership in and activities on behalf of a labor organization composed of supervisory officials. The matter was argued in a day-long hearing. Briefs are to be filed. In due course the Board will determine whether the Labor Relations Act affords protection in such a case. Whatever the decision of the Board may be on that specific point there is no indication that any consideration is being given to changing or relaxing the ruling that supervisory officials are not an appropriate bargaining unit.

II. WAGE INCREASE

Congress passed a wage stabilization act in October 1942. There were to be no general wage increases thereafter. Inequalities could be corrected. Substandard wages might be brought up to standard. The National War Labor Board had already promulgated the Little Steel formula, which allowed up to a 15-percent increase in straight hourly wages over January 1, 1941, to compensate for increased living costs.

Where do you fit into that program the union demand for a $2 a day over-all increase, an increase of 28.57 percent? It just doesn't fit in at all. Your representatives pointed that out over and over again. But Mr. Lewis insisted that he would have that increase or there would be no contract. We declined to join with him in a movement to break down the Government stabilization program. We urged that the case be taken at once to the War Labor Board. If he could convince the Board that he was entitled to the demanded increase, or any increase, we would gladly submit. The only reply he gave was a vituperative attack upon the Board.

Eventually the case reached the Board. Of course, the decision was that there can be no increase in the regular hourly rate of pay for bituminous miners. There could be no other decision until the Board is ready to discard the Little Steel formula. Until President Roosevelt is ready to break his hold-the-line order. Until Congress is ready to amend the wage stabilization statute.

Some of our own operators thought for a time that a mistake was made. That it would have been better to have yielded to Mr. Lewis and made a contract providing the increase he demanded. That view can be held only by one unfamiliar with the facts as stated herein, or one who has failed to think the matter through. On that ground, I exonerate the few operators who have expressed such an opinion. There is no such mantle of excuse available to cloak the erroneous statements repeatedly coming from Secretary Ickes. He persists in challenging the good faith of the operators by alleging that we could have negotiated a contract had we been so inclined. He knows the facts and he has had plenty of opportunity to think them through. He knows that we could not have made a contract with Mr. Lewis without giving him a straight hourly wage increase. He knows that to have done so would have been in direct violation of the order of the President in whose Cabinet he sits, of the ruling of the War Labor Board, which is a duly authorized agency of the same Government which he serves, and of the wage-stabilization policy established by the Congress of the United States.

It may be that Secretary Ickes will reply that he made a contract with Mr. Lewis that gave him the money he wanted and that was approved by the War Labor Board. There are two things to be said in respect to that contention.

The Ickes-Lewis contract assumes an extra hour of productive work and pays for it at time and one-half the regular contract rate. Had Mr. Lewis been willing to agree to an actual, instead of an assumed, extra hour at the face, he could have had a contract long before he laid one down for Secretary Ickes to sign. He can have such a contract today, and any day hereafter.

The other thing to be said about the Ickes-Lewis contract has to do with the now exploded fantasy that by legal requirement travel time in bituminous-coal mines must be considered as work time. That calls for a discussion of the last of the three major union demands at the last wage conference.

III. PORTAL TO PORTAL

If there was any one thing upon which the U. M. W. A. and every bituminous coal operator in the country were in complete and undeviating agreement throughout the years, it was that the proper basis for computing miners' pay was for hours spent at the face or usual working place. Of course, in determining the proper rate for those productive hours consideration had to be given always to the fact of travel time—the recognized fact that all underground miners of necessity spent varying amounts of time in getting from the portal to the working place and back again when the day's work was done.

What is a proper rate for mining coal depends upon a fair consideration of many factors: The difficulty of the work, dirt and unpleasantness, danger, also many other things, not the least important of which is that feature known as underground travel time. That is likewise of importance in determining the hours of work.

Why did the union and the operators always agree that travel time should not be paid for as such? First of all because it is not work and everyone knew that was so. Because also it varies between every mine and within the same mine. To pay for travel time as such would run contra to the union's policy of equal pay for equal work. It would disrupt wage schedules and result in constant friction between workers. It would so distort costs as to inevitably force the closing of older mines with longer travel time.

In 1938 Congress passed the Fair Labor Standards Act, popularly known as the Wage and Hour Act. Its purpose was simple. To provide a floor under wages, 30 cents an hour, to be generally increased to 40 on an industry-wide basis. To provide a ceiling over hours. Forty-four the first year. Forty-two the second. Thereafter 40. For all work above the specified work week there should be paid time and one-half the regular rate.

Mr. Lewis appeared as a witness before the joint Senate-House Committee. He testified that long since the U. M. W. A., by collective bargaining, had secured a minimum wage far in excess of that specified in the proposed act, and a work week of 35 hours instead of the longer maximum therein specified. His only concern was that nothing should be put in the act that would interfere with his right to get additional benefits both as to wages and hours whenever he was able to do so by collective bargaining. The act was so written.

Not a word was said before the committee, in the debates in House and Senate, or in the act itself, that lends the slightest substance to the contention that Congress intended to lay down any rule as to what should be counted as work time. I can make the whole point in one sentence. Mr. Lewis did not ask that Congress so define work as to include travel time, and Congress did not attempt to do so.

The act went into effect October 24, 1938. In March 1939 the Appalachian Joint Wage Conference assembled and wrote a new contract. Not a word from Mr. Lewis or anyone else that the Wages and Hours Act affected the situation at all. Travel time was treated as it always had been.

Then in the spring of 1940 an inspector for the Wage and Hour Division in making a routine investigation of a coal mine in central Pennsylvania queried whether travel time should not be counted as work time in determining when the 40-hour limit was reached, after which overtime must be paid. Immediately there was a great hubbub. It is hard to tell whether the operators or the U. M. W. A. was more surprised and more alarmed over the suggestion and the disrupting influence that such a ruling would have.

The matter was taken up at once. Mr. Lewis himself made an appointment with the Wage and Hour Administrator so that the facts could be laid before him and he could be prevented from making so serious a mistake. At the suggestion of the Administrator, a written statement was prepared jointly by operator and union representatives on July 9, 1940. This was the famous Houck letter, a letter not equaled in fame until the apparently spurious Hopkins letter was made public. No one has yet questioned the authenticity of the Houck letter. Mr. Houck himself sat in Federal court at Roanoke last November and raised no question when the letter was read and commented on at great length.

The Administrator ruled, in the light of the facts presented, that in bituminous coal mines the face to face method of computing pay is in full accordance with the act.

In March 1941 another wage conference assembled. Again there was no contention that travel time is work time. Seven hours at the face, or usual working place, was declared to constitute the day's work; 35 hours at the face, or usual working place, the workweek.

Meanwhile, in the ore-mining industry the Administrator and a lower court had reached a different conclusion. There were reasons given for the distinction. Whether the ore mining ruling is erroneous or not, we will not argue. We do say with firm conviction that it in no way affects the decision in the bituminous coal industry.

We come to March 1943. The U. M. W. A. demanded portal-to-portal pay "in accordance with the legal requirement." However, it was stated that travel pay would be included in the general wage increase. At no time during the long extended conferences in New York was there ever the slightest suggestion that the face-to-face method should be abandoned.

When the negotiations resumed in Washington the War Labor Board had explicitly ruled that no wage increase could be allowed. The Board said that it was not its function to pass on the question of the applicability of the Fair Labor Standards Act to travel time. If the parties considered there was a possible liability running back to 1938 and would submit an agreement the Board could approve, it said, if it were definitely related to settlement of a possible legal liability and were not a wage increase in disguise.

Mr. Lewis immediately seized on that language and wanted a contract giving him his $2-a-day increase based on this formula. Average travel time, he insisted, was one hour and a half. Since 7 hours was to be retained at the face, the travel time would be paid for at time and one-half. This would mean on the basic rate of $1 per hour, $2.25 per day for all underground men. By taking away the 25 cents and distributing it to the outside men, all workers would get a $2-a-day increase. The operators refused to make such an agreement, which was clearly a thinly disguised wage increase.

You will notice that Mr. Lewis was not yet talking about portal to portal as a basis for computing pay. He was not doing so when he made the first Illinois agreement. That provided for $1.25 per day in settlement of alleged portal-to-portal liability. The Board rejected the contract.

By this time Mr. Lewis was getting desperate. He was under the most severe criticism for his series of strikes that were interfering with the war effort. The War Labor Board was standing by its guns. He was having the unusual experience of not being able to bully and brow-beat the operators into submission.

The U. M. W. A. chief had still one ever-ready ally who was in strategic position to render him yeoman service. He had never failed to come through with just what Mr. Lewis wanted and subsequent events showed that Secretary Ickes could still be counted on.

So, the second Illinois agreement was submitted to the Board. For the first time in the history of coal mining in the United States the work day was to begin at the portal and end at the portal. They agreed that travel time is work time. The parties assumed that travel time average in Illinois 45 minutes. With 9 hours from portal to portal this would leave a certain extra work time that could be paid for at time and one-half. Forty dollars per employee was to be paid in settlement of an assumed past liability.

The Board rejected the contract because it called for a greater payment than the assumed extra work justified plus the payment arrived at by counting travel time as work time to reach the 40-hour limit.

Then followed the fourth strike. The mines were seized by Government. The Ickes-Lewis agreement was submitted to the Board. By ostensibly reducing the lunch period to 15 minutes the assumed extra work time that was required was found and Lewis got the payment he had been demanding. The Board approved the contract for the period of Government operation.

Immediately the effort started to unload the contract on the operators. The South refused to submit. We were unwilling to assume that an extra hour of work was provided and offered instead to pay for 8 hours at the face. We denied any basis for holding that travel time is work time, which is the basis upon which the proposed contract rests. Specifically we refused to agree that the industry should pay $20,000,000 in settlement of an assumed liability which we hoped would be disproved.

While all this was going on the Southern Coal Producers' Association had taken steps to have a competent court declare whether the Fair Labor Standards Act has transformed travel time in bituminous coal mines into work time. The suit was brought in Federal court in Virginia. One reason for going into that jurisdiction was to make possible the service of summons personally on Mr. Lewis at his Alexandria home.

The court proceeding went through all of the necessary stages. A convincing array of witnesses took the stand. Capable union attorneys, drawn in from Washington to Alabama, used every art at their command. The case was orally argued. Briefs were filed.

Then came January 25. Judge Barksdale handed down a decision. In clearness of statement and cogency of reasoning, you will search the books in vain to find a decision that excels it. The court sustained every contention of the operators. Travel time in bituminous coal mines is not work time. The workday and the workweek are to be determined just as if the Fair Labor Standards Act had never been passed.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the way is now opened for an agreement by collective bargaining. There is no longer any subterfuge by which a wage increase can be disguised. There is no longer any basis for assumptions as to travel time, either as to the amount thereof or its importance in fixing wage scales.

As long as the stabilization program remains unchanged there can be no extra wages paid to miners except for additional work. You may say, "Aye! There's the rub." Will the stabilization program remain unchanged? I do not know. It may well be that until that question is settled, nothing can be done in the way of reaching an agreement. Time alone can furnish the answer.

A Phi Beta Kappa Nisei Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, one of the most temperate and best-balanced statements I have seen regarding the problems of the American citizen of Japanese ancestry was written by one of them, a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Whitman College writing in the Key Reporter. It illustrates afresh that no race or nationality has a monopoly of any virtue or vice. There are good men and bad men in every country, faithful and treacherous, noble and craven.

Some of us who have worked longest and hardest and at times almost single-handedly against Japan's military clique and its dreams of world conquest have known many Japanese who are as loyal and devoted citizens of this Republic as are the descendants of immigrants from England or the Scandinavian countries or France or Russia or Germany. Some of them I think appreciate America even more deeply than some of us, because they are acutely aware of how different it would be in Japan. For us to deny each American citizen regardless of his origin the right to be judged on the basis of his own individual merits and character, good or bad, is for us to deny the foundation principles of this Republic in seeking to preserve it.

What America means to this young American citizen and his wife makes me realize afresh how much it means to me:

A PHI BETA KAPPA NISEI SPEAKS

(By Robert M. Hosokawa)

Minidoka is a community born of war, a city of drab tarpaper barracks with a population of 8,867. It borders an old irrigation canal on a rocky portion of sage-covered Idaho desert.

It is not a prosperous community, but has schools, a hospital, some stores, a weekly paper, churches, and a cemetery. Minidoka's inhabitants are of all temperaments and trades. They are civic minded, aloof, selfish, dishonest, generous, and progressive. There are office clerks, doctors, coal shovelers, policemen, loafers, preachers, students, and housewives.

As in all America, the windows of Minidoka hold service stars. Some have two and three, even four, each representing an American soldier.

For all of this apparent normalcy, Minidoka is a lonely place, spiritually bleak, devoid of hope and warmth. It is surrounded by barbed wire, and watch towers punctuate the horizon. The only gate is guarded by military police. No one enters or leaves without credentials.

Yet this is an American community. More than two-thirds of its inhabitants are citizens. The remainder are aliens who have lived long in the United States but are ineligible for naturalization because of congressional legislation.

Minidoka is mono-racial and its inhabitants who look through the fencing are of Japanese descent. They were moved to Minidoka and to 10 inland centers in the summer of 1942 when mass evacuation from the Pacific coast was deemed a military necessity.

There is nothing lavish at Minidoka. Many inadequacies exist. However, most of its residents do not complain. They realize their discomforts are not serious. My wife and I often discussed how trifling our troubles were in comparison with those being endured by thousands of America's fighting men.

Subnormal conditions make home life and training of the young a difficult job. There is no privacy, for each family has only one room. There are central mess halls where residents stand in line thrice daily.

Recreational facilities are few, but the Nisei and the Caucasian staff members have made attempts at constructive activities. The depressing limitations of concentration are killing initiative and responsibility.

Younger children cannot recall their former homes. And to them the crowded existence as Government wards is normal. They eat in mess halls, often apart from their parents, and training in such little things as table manners is lacking. Their social contacts are wholly with other evacuees. It will take much readjustment when they are free to return to normal living.

Schools in the center are handicapped by lack of equipment. Textbooks are few and individual research is difficult. Zoology students finish courses without having dissected the earthworm or the frog. Incentive for study is often dulled in even the brightest students.

Classes are held in made-over barrack rooms with children sitting on benches. The physical handicaps are not as important as the effect they have on these young students. Most of them know only that they are being confined, "because we had the wrong ancestors," as one evacuee put it. They are conscious of the stigma and do not know what they can do about it. They wonder if America wants them when they read reports of "mass deportation," or at least permanent exclusion from the coast.

Some students are finding their way to schools in the Middle West and East, through efforts of the National Student Relocation Council and its supporting groups.

There are more than 5,000 Nisei now training in United States Army camps. Some are already fighting in Italy and in the Pacific. Those not yet in the service are hoping for early reinstatement to Selective Service so that they may execute their responsibilities as Americans.

In cooperation with military intelligence and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the War Relocation Authority has set up machinery permitting those residents who can pass stringent investigation, to leave the project. To date about 2,300 have secured their indefinite leaves and have passed through the gate for cities, towns, farms, and schools outside the Western Defense Command. The W. R. A. was created by the Government to carry out this resettlement and is doing a commendable job under trying conditions.

Most of those who leave the center are Nisei—American born, American schooled. Few return to Minidoka. The W. R. A., with offices in a dozen midwestern and eastern cities, is finding community acceptance the least of its worries. It is avoiding concentration in any area. Stories of successful relocation and assimilation are many, but the present egress is still a trickle.

Nisei are being employed in war factories and farms, in homes and offices. They are contributing to the victory effort in practically every State. They have relocated most heavily in the Middle West and least of all in the South.

Greatest blessing to loyal Americans of Japanese descent was the segregation recently completed in which 15,000 found disloyal or unworthy of Americanism were weeded out and transferred to the Tule Lake project in California.

The other 85,000 stand a better chance of having their faith in America recognized. They did not lose faith even though they had been sent from their homes and placed in camps. They want to be wholly American, to have a part in the American dream.

My wife and I were released from Minidoka last March when a news job was located in the Middle West. We passed Federal scrutiny and made the transition without difficulty. We have been happy and thankful for our freedom and we treasure it deeply.

Now that we have been here a year, we are hoping to move farther north or east, to greener and more permanent pastures, perhaps to New England, where we can try our roots in the soil which nurtured the first Americans. We believe in America and want it to believe fully in us.

What He, Also, Said

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank C. Waldrop from the Washington Times-Herald of March 29, 1944:

WHAT HE, ALSO, SAID

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

This being a campaign year, politicians who have gone on the record in times past with large round promises are following out an old custom in trying to help the public concentrate on the new promises and just forget what has gone on before.

For instance, there is the case of Wendell Willkie who keeps on trying to deny that in 1941 he said he was only using "campaign oratory" in his 1940 declaration that many Americans suspected Mr. Roosevelt was "deliberately inciting us to war."

But Willkie did say that, and the official, public record of his testimony shows that he did.

Another candidate for the Presidency in 1940 whose campaign words have been clouded in controversy was Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Most people remember vaguely that Mr. Roosevelt, in a radio speech, promised mothers and fathers of America something or other about keeping their sons out of foreign war.

But the ear is an uncertain recorder of radio or any other kind of promises.

And so it is possible now to start a pretty hot argument in the average American household as to what Mr. Roosevelt promised, or didn't.

Well, here are the facts of record. Mr. Willkie, with his cracks and charges that Mr. Roosevelt was a war monger, got the President's goat. Campaign oratory or not, his stuff was tough for any man to take, as when he said:

"The President's attacks on foreign powers have been useless and dangerous. * * * He has courted a war for which the country is helplessly unprepared. * * * He has secretly meddled in the affairs of Europe and he has even unscrupulously encouraged other countries to hope for more help than we are able to give. * * *

"But while he has thus been quick to tell other nations what they ought to do, Mr. Roosevelt has been slow to take the American people into his confidence. He has hesitated to report facts, to explain situations, or to define realistic objectives."

That kind of talk could get a rise out of a far less quick-tempered and imperious man than Mr. Roosevelt.

Willkie's needling of the President on foreign policy, Army, Navy, and such items finally brought Mr. Roseveolt onto the platform at Boston, October 30, 1940, for a full-sized declamation on the subject.

You can find the whole speech beginning on page 514 of volume 8 of the Public Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Rosevelt, published in 1940 by the Macmillan Co., of New York City.

Herewith the controlling paragraphs. First as to the Navy:

"The construction of this Navy has been a monumental job. In spite of what some campaign orators may tell you, you cannot buy a battleship from a mail-order catalog.

"We have not only added ships and men to the Navy, we have enormously increased the effectiveness of naval bases in those outlying territories of ours in the Atlantic and Pacific.

"For our objective is to keep any potential attacker as far from our continental shores as we possibly can."

Then he reminded everybody of the destroyer-for-bases deal in which we gave Britain 50 destroyers in return for leases of air bases along our eastern coast, and repeated his declaration that all this was to keep any potential attacker as far from our continental shore as possible.

Turning to the Army, he reviewed its development, denounced the Republicans for their criticisms of Army equipment, housing, and so forth, and then he got off his famous promise (p. 517 of vol. 8 of his speeches and papers):

"And while I am talking to you, mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

"I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again:

"Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

"They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores.

"The purpose of our defense is defense."

There, in full, is the promise as given at Boston, October 3, 1940. The President did not revise or extend his remarks later to qualify that promise. He didn't say anything about "in case we are attacked we'll fight." He just made the flat, bald promise. No American boys to foreign war.

But soon after his reelection for the third term he sent the lend-lease bill to Congress.

American warships began to convoy lend-lease goods to Britain, and the President issued his historic order to the Navy to "shoot on sight" any Axis submarines that might cross the convoys' trails. Then he divided our naval power between the Atlantic and the Pacific, just when the Nation was struggling to build military power equal to the Administration's commitments.

You know how it all came out. Our divided fleet was smashed at Pearl Harbor, December 7, 1941. Our unprepared Army was defeated in the Philippines. And now we are at war all over the world, no matter what kind of war you call it.

That is the record.

Nathaniel Bacon and the Cause of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, "victrix causa deis placvit"—"a victorious cause is pleasing to the gods." Nearly 100 years before the men of Concord fired the shot for freedom heard round the world, the torch had been lifted by a little-known but highly connected Virginia colonist named Nathaniel Bacon, a cousin of the Lord Bacon whom the Anglo-Saxon people could justly place in the hall of fame of immortal minds along with Socrates and Plato.

In 1916 the Society of the Colonial Dames of America in the State of Virginia erected a beautiful marble tablet to the memory of Nathaniel Bacon which, by act of the General Assembly of Virginia, was placed immediately behind the speaker's chair in the hall of the house of delegates. The inscription on that tablet reads:

To the memory of Nathaniel Bacon; born in England January 2, 1647; came to Virginia 1674; a great patriot leader of the Virginia people who died while defending their rights, October 26, 1676. Victrix causa deis placvit sed victa catoni.

By a singular coincidence, that tablet was erected to the first great hero of the cause of freedom in America in the midst of a World War which we entered the following year for the purpose of preserving not only our democracy but likewise for the broader purpose of making it possible for all nations throughout the world who desired a democratic form of government to have it. On November 11, 1918, we engaged in a national celebration of what we then regarded as a victorious cause pleasing to the gods. We won the war, but we did not win the peace. We turned a deaf ear to the earnest pleas of Woodrow Wilson when he told us that we were in the midst of a world-wide struggle of the masses for a larger measure of personal freedom and that what happened to the struggling masses of the people of other nations would vitally affect us. We acted on the assumption that we could live unto ourselves and die alone. We ignored the warning of Woodrow Wilson that unless we cooperated with the other democracies of the world in the cause of personal freedom, the time would come when we would be forced to fight again to preserve our own freedom. When the democracies of Great Britain and France attempted at Munich to appease the German dictator, who was the sworn enemy of personal freedom, many realized it was the commencement of the fulfillment of Wilson's predictions. Even after Hitler's juggernaut had rolled over Poland and then over the lowlands of western Europe there were those in this country who refused to admit that what was happening in the rest of the world would affect us. On December 7, 1941, at Pearl Harbor that illusion was shattered.

On far-flung battlefronts the flower of American youth is again battling for the cause of personal freedom. While we have no doubts concerning the ultimate victory of our cause, a victory will not be won that is pleasing to the gods unless through international cooperation in the post-war era we win the peace. In the firm belief that this time we will win a victory at the peace table, as well as on the battlefield, I have asked the distinguished scholar and champion of personal freedom, Dr. Archibald MacLeish, the Librarian of Congress, to prepare for me the little-known story of the first fight in America for that cause, taken from material that came to the Library of Congress as a part of the library of Thomas Jefferson. The following is Dr. MacLeish's story of Nathaniel Bacon and the Cause of Freedom:

"About the year 1675," so begins a fading chronicle of Virginia, "appear'd three prodigies in that country, which from th' attending disasters were look'd upon as ominous presages.

"The one was a large comet every evening for a week, or more at South-west; thirty-five degrees high, streaming like a horse taile westwards, untill it reach'd (almost) the horison, and setting towards the North-west.

"Another was, flights of pigeons in breadth nigh a quarter of the mid-hemisphere, and of their length was no visible end; whose weights brake down the limbs of large trees whereon these rested at nights, of which the ffowlers shot abundance and eat 'em; this sight put the old planters under the more portentous apprehensions, because the like was seen (as they said) in the year 1640 when th' Indians committed the last massacre, but not after, untill that present year 1675.

"The third strange appearance was swarms of flyes about an inch long, and big as the top of a man's little finger, rising out of spigot holes in the earth, which eat the new sprouted leaves from the tops of the trees without other harm, and in a month left us."

Thus, prefaced by omens of disaster, opens the manuscript narrative of Thomas Mathews, planter of Stafford in Virginia, entitled "The Beginning, Progress, and Conclusion of Bacon's Rebellion," written thirty years after the events it describes, at the request of Robert Harley (subsequently first Earl of Oxford), then British Secretary of State for the Northern Department. It was purchased by Rufus King from the stock of a London bookseller in 1801 and came to the Library of Congress as part of the library of Thomas Jefferson in 1815.

But there were omens other than comets, and flights of birds, and swarms of flies observable in the Colony; there were, in addition, signs of political discontent. Professor Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker in his Torchbearer of the Revolution has given them historical emphasis:

"As it was the Sugar Act which brought distress to the merchant class in the colonies in 1764, so it was the Navigation Acts which undermined the prosperity of Virginia in the years from 1660 to 1676 and reduced the planters to poverty. As it was, the Stamp Act, which threatened representative government in America by wresting from the assemblies the control of taxation, so it was Berkeley's system of corrupting the burgesses and then continuing them on indefinitely without an election which turned representative government into a farce in Virginia. As the patriots of 1775 rose first to defend their liberty, seeking independence only when they found that they could not have one without the other, so the patriots of 1676 had no thought of breaking away from the mother country until they learned that English frigates and English redcoats were on their way across the Atlantic to suppress them."

And Professor Robert M. McElroy, in a paper read before the Society of Colonial Wars in the State of New York, on November 9, 1911, summarized the causes of increasing unrest under three heads:

"(1) A House of Burgesses of fifteen years' standing, whose Members no longer represented their constituencies; (2) The overthrow of their ancient freemen's suffrage by the enforcement of a property qualification; (3) the enforcement of navigation laws which were regarded as ruinous to the chief industry of Virginia. Added to these was the restriction of the people's share in purely local government."

At Jamestown a most royalist of royal Governors, old Sir William Berkeley, a man "more than a little addicted" both to passion and avarice, presided over a council which conducted the affairs of state on the principle that "the wise & the rich were prone to ffaction & sedition but the fools & poor were easy to be governed." Therefore they had excused themselves from taxes, claimed the fairest lands, and administered the Colony in agreement with their own fortunes, with the result that the more honest and timorous planters "never had inclinac'ons to tamper in the precarious intrigues of Govern't."

It began, so Mathews tells us, with murder:

"My dwelling was in Northumberland, the lowest county on Potomack river, Stafford being the uppermost, where having also a plantation, servants, cattle &c. my overseer there had agreed with one Rob't en to come thither, and be my herdsman, who then lived ten miles above it; but on a sabbath day morning in the summer anno 1675 people in their way to church, saw this Hen lying thwart his threshold, and an Indian without the door, both chopt on their heads, arms & other parts, as if done with Indian hatchetts, th' Indian was dead, but Hen when ask'd who did that? answered Doegs, Doegs (an Algonkin tribe) and soon died, then a boy came out from under a bed, where he had hid himself, and told them, Indians had come at break of day & done those murders."

The period of peace had been broken. The county militia under Col. George Mason, of the regiment of foot, and Capt. George Brent, of the troop of horse, was mustered and gave chase "20 miles up and 4 miles over" the river into Maryland, where they killed a few Susquehannas, who, as it happened, were a friendly tribe. The Susquehannas, "newly driven from their habitations, at the head of Chesepiack Bay," by the Iroquois, came down to the head of the Potomac, and sought the protection of the Piscataway Indians who had an old fort near the Maryland frontier. Thereafter outrages by the Indians were committed on both sides of the river; outrages which led in the autumn of 1675 to a joint expedition from Maryland and Virginia, and to the siege of the fort. "And allthough," so runs the account of the proceedings in the so-called Burwell manuscript, "it is saide that the Indians doth the least minde their bellies (as being content with a little) of any people in the world, yet now their bellies began to minde them, and their stomachs too, which began to be more inclinable to peace than war; which was the cause (no more horseflesh being to be had) that they sent out six of their Woerowances (chief men) to commence a treaty." Despite the fact that it was "diametricall to the law of arms," the Indian commissioners were instantly put to death by order of the colonial commanders. Following this revolting messacre, the Indians, having "destroyed all things in the fort, that might be servisable to the English * * * bodly, undiscovered slip through the league * * * in the passing of which they knock'd ten men on the head, who lay carelessly asleep in the way." They had now "stowed up so much of mallize, entermixt with a resollution of revenge, for the affrunt that the English had put upon them, in killing their messingers of peace, that they resolved to commence a most barbarous and most bloody war."

"Forsaking Maryland," the Indians "killing whom they found" along the way, came to the head of the river James, devising "a hundred ways to torter and torment those poore soules with, whose reched fate it was to fall into their unmerciful hands. For some before they would deprive them of their lives they would take a great deal of time to deprive them first of their skins, and if their life had not, through the anguish of their paine, forsaken their tormented bodies, they with their clubs knock out their teeth * * * tear off the nails of their hands and their toes, which put the poor sufferer to a woful condition."

Mathews records that "frequent complaints of bloudsheds were sent to Sr. Wm. Berkeley * * * from the heads of the rivers, which were as often answered with promises of assistance." The people, however, "grew impatient at the many slaughters of their neighbours and rose for their own defence, who chusing" one of their own number "for their leader, sent oftentimes to the Govern'r, humbly beseeching a comission to go against those Indians at their own charge which his hon'r as often promisd but did not send; the misteryes of these delays, were wondred at and which I ne'er heard coud penetrate into." Some there were who laid "these protractions" to his greed, murmuring that "rebells forfeitures would be loyall inheritances."

The leader, chosen by the people, was Nathaniel Bacon, who had emigrated from England in the summer of 1764, and settled in Henrico. Born in 1647, son of a Suffolk squire, kinsman of Lord Francis Bacon, educated at St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, and at Gray's Inn, he had once taken the grand tour under the tutelage of the celebrated botanist, John Ray, and 4 years prior to their coming to Virginia had eloped with Elizabeth Duke, daughter of Sir Edward Duke, a disapproving baronet. On March 3, 1675, he had been appointed, perhaps through the influence of a well-placed cousin, to the Governor's Council of State. In appearance "indifferent tall but slender, blackhaired and of an ominous, pensive, melancholly aspect," even his enemies conceded that he was "fitt for such a purpose." The Indians had killed his overseer, "whom he much loved, and one of his servants whose bloud he vowed to revenge." Something of his character (and a possible reason for his selection) may be found in his own words: "I thought it my duty to discharge my conscience in it, by introducing & looking after ye wellfare of the people here, they being poor, few and in scattered habitations on ye frontiers."

That he had firmly established his popularity is obvious from an intimate letter, written by his wife to his sister in England:

"The poor people came to your brother to desire him to help against the Indians, and hée being very much concerned . . . for the losse of so many men and women and children's lives every day, hee was willing to doe for them all the good he could; so he begged of the Governour for a commission in several letters to him, that hee might go out against them . . . . you never knew any better beloved than hee is. I doe verily believe that rather than hee should come to any hurt by the Governour or anybody else they would most of them willingly loose their lives."

A group of three hundred men, composed of civil authorities, military officers, and inhabitants of the region, "taking Mr. Bacon for their coman'r met, and concerted together, the danger of going without a comiss'n on the one part, and the continuall murders of their neighbors on the other part . . . and came to this resolution viz't. to prepare themselves with necessaries for a march, but interim to send again for a comission, which if could or could not be obtayned by a certaine day, they woud proceed comission or no comission." The certain day went by, "& no com'n come," the frontiersmen "marched into the wilderness in quest of these Indians after who the Govern'r sent his proclamation, denouncing all rebells, who shoud not return within a limited day, whereupon those of estates obey'd; but Mr. Bacon with 57. men proceeded."

They proceeded, their provisions nearly spent, until they came to a fort of supposedly friendly Indians, and asked for food in exchange for payment, but, as Bacon himself told Mathews later, they were "put . . . off with promises untill the third day, . . . having then eaten their last morsells they could not return, but must have starved in the way homeward and now 'twas suspected, these Indians had received private messages from the Gover'r & those to be the causes of these delusive procrastinations; whereupon the English waded shoulder deep thro' that branch [of the James] to the ffort palisado's still intreating and tendering pay, for victuals; but that evening a shot from the place they left on th' other side of that branch kill'd one of Mr. Bacon's men, which made them believe, those in the ffort had sent for other Indians to come behind 'em & cut 'em off." What followed was the Battle of Bloody Run. The English stormed the fortifications, burned the cabins, and, with the loss of three of their own men dead, slew one hundred and fifty Indians. Having dispersed the enemy, Bacon's force returned to their homes, as heroes and as rebels.

During their absence the perfidious Governor had, on May 29, 1676, declared Bacon and his followers to be enemies of the crown and, with a small body of horse, had ridden forth to capture them. To his chagrin he discovered before he had gone forty miles that not all the rebels had accompanied Bacon, for the people rose in protest, and, in an effort to divert their wrath from himself to the Burgesses, while at the same time preserving his corrupt associates, he returned to Jamestown, dissolved the "Long House," and called for an election.

Bacon was unanimously chosen a member of the new assembly, and set out for the capital. While coming down the James, he was "commanded by a ship with guns to come on board, where waited Major Houe the high sheriff * * * ready to seize him, by whom he was carried down to the Govern'r & by him receiv'd with a surprizing civility," and paroled. But the Governor required a public, as well as a private, surrender, and the next morning summoned the Burgesses to the Council room, where Bacon "upon one knee at the bar" delivered "a sheet of paper [drafted by Cousin Nathaniel Bacon, 'a rich, politick man'] confessing his crimes, and begging pardon of god the king and Govern'r," whereupon Berkeley, after a brief pause, answered, "God forgive you, I forgive you," thrice repeating the same words; when Collon. Cole, [one of the councill], said, "and all that were with him, Yea, said the Governor & all that were with him, twenty or more persons being then in irons who were taken coming down in the same and other vessels with Mr. Bacon."

A minute later Sir William continued: "Mr. Bacon! if you will live civilly but till next Quarter court [doubling his words] till next Quarter court, Ile promise to restore you againe to yo'r place, there pointing with his hand to Mr. Bacons seat, he having been at the Councill before these troubles." That same afternoon, Thomas Mathews, himself recently elected a Burgess, saw Mr. Bacon on his "quondam" seat, in session with the Council, "which seemed a marveilous indulgence to one whom he [Berkeley] had so lately proscribed as a rebell." It is apparent that "there was cool reason, not generosity," behind this action, simply because Bacon could do less harm as a member of the Council than as a Burgess, for under the watchful eye of Berkeley's henchmen he would be unable to play upon "the distempered humor predominant in the Comon people," nor could he insinuate into and "possess the people with Lyberty and free estate from Bondage."

Some days later "a bruit ran about the town Bacon is fled, Bacon is fled." Berkeley, the "old treacherous villain," had caused his house to be searched at dawn, and had discovered that Bacon had "escaped into the country, having intimation [probably from his influential cousin] that the Govern'rs generosity in pardoning him and has followers and restoring him to his seat in councill, were no other than previous wheadles to amuse [i. e. to beguile] him & his adherents & to circumvent them by stratagem, forasmuch as the taking Mr. Bacon again into the councill was first to keep him out of the assembly, and in the next place the Govern'r knew the country people were hastning down with dreadful threatnings to double revenge all wrongs shou'd be done to Mr. Bacon or his men, or whoever shou'd have had the least hand in 'em." The "country people" had made three great discoveries: their rights, their champion, and their power. The had discovered, too, that Berkeley had issued private warrants to re-arrest Bacon, and planned "to raise the militia and so to dispose things as to prevent his friends from gathering any more."

Within three or four days thereafter, word reached Jamestown that Bacon, at the head of four hundred men, was some thirty miles up the river, intent on securing a royal commission to prosecute the Indian war. Berkeley, thoroughly and properly alarmed for his personal safety, called up the militia to reinforce his guards, but his authority had so deteriorated that only four ensigns and less than a hundred soldiers reported at the rendezvous, "and not one-half of them sure neather, and all so sluggish in their march that before they could reach towne, by a grate deale," Bacon and his little army had "entred the town, without being withstood, and form'd a body upon a green, not a flight shot from the end of the State house." The encounter of the arrogant Berkeley and Bacon's yeomen is vividly and dramatically related by Mathews:

"In half an hour * * * the drum beat for the house to meet, and in less than an hour more Mr. Bacon came with a file of fusileers on either hand near the Statehouse where the Govern'r. and council went forth to him; we saw from the window the Govern'r. open his breast, and Bacon strutting betwixt his two files of men with his left arm on Kenbow flinging his right arm every way both like men distracted * * * in this hubub a servant of mine got so nigh as to hear the Govern'rs words, and also followed Mr. Bacon, and heard what he said, who came & told me, that when the Govern'r opened his breast he said 'here! shoot me, foregod fair mark, shoot; [']often rehearsing the same, without any other words; whereto Mr. Bacon answered 'No may it please yo'r hono'r we will not hurt a hair of yo'r head, nor of any other mans, we are come for a Co'mission to save our lives from th' Indians, which you have so often promised, and now we will have it before we go.' "

Bacon carried his demands to the House and addressed that body for half an hour "on the preserving our lives from the Indians, inspecting the publick revenues, th' exorbitant taxes, and redressing the grievances and calamities of that deplorable country."

Naturally, with the Governor a virtual prisoner, and the reform Assembly not unsympathetic to his principles, Bacon had his way. He was commissioned a General, and in the month of June 1676, nearly one hundred years before the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, the Virginia legislators repealed the law which limited suffrage to property owners, and passed in its stead a new statute specifically extending the franchise to all freemen.

Dr. Wertenbaker has summarized the series of acts which swept away many of the abuses of which the people had for so long complained:

"Councillors were no longer exempt from taxation; the secretary of the colony, all clerks of courts, sheriffs, surveyors, collectors, and other officers were forbidden to charge more for their services than the sums prescribed by law; the voters in each county were to select representatives to sit with the justices of the peace in assessing the county taxes; vestries were no longer to be self-perpetuating, but were to be chosen every three years by the voters of the parish; no person would be sheriff 'for more than one year successively,' the office devolving on the justices in rotation; no two of the offices of sheriff, clerk of the court, surveyor, and escheator could be held by any one man simultaneously; no member of the Council could sit with the justices of the peace."

Then General Bacon and his men marched out of the Capital, and headed for the frontier, while the Burgesses turned homeward, "little expecting to hear of more intestine broiles." Mathews returned to his "dwelling" in Northumberland, where "reports were afterwards various; we had account that Generall Bacon was march'd with a thousand men into the forest to seek the enemy Indians, and in a few daies after our next news was, that the Govern'r had sum'oned together the militia of Gloucester & Middlesex counties to the number of twelve hundred men, and proposed to them to follow & suppress that rebell Bacon, whereupon arose a murmuring before his face 'Bacon Bacon Bacon,' leaving the Governor and those that came with him to themselves, who being thus abandon'd wafted over Chesepiacke bay 30 miles to Accomack."

When this intelligence reached Bacon, he turned about, "and sent out parties of horse patrolling through every county, carrying away prisoners all whom he distrusted might any more molest his Indian prosecu'on yet giving liberty to such as pledg'd him their oaths to return home & live quiet." Sir William's flight had left Bacon master of all the colony from the Potomac to Lower Norfolk and from the Chesapeake to the frontier. It was now his duty to preserve order, and to assume some measure of civil authority.

But the fugitive Governor, repudiated by the "comon people" retained some rich and powerful friends among the planters of the Tidewater, and made "a 2d. attempt * * * with what men he coud procure in sloops and boats, forty miles up the river to Jamestown, which Bacon hearing of, came againe down from his forest pursuit, and finding a bank not a flight shot long, cast up thwart the neck of the peninsula there in Jamestown, he stormed it, and took the town, in which attack were 12. men slaine & wounded but the Govern'r with most of his followers fled back down the river in their vessells." That was on September 19, 1676.

But although Bacon had captured the town, he was quick to realize that he could not hold it. He knew that one of his principal lieutenants, Col. Giles Brent, had deserted to the Governor's cause, and was advancing on him with a force of a thousand men. He knew also that were Sir William to return with his fleet to bombard the town from the water, while Brent closed in by land, he would be helplessly trapped. Accordingly, when his troops had rested "a few daies they concerted the burning of the town, wherin Mr. Laurence (i. e. Richard Lawrence) and Mr. Drumond (i. e. William Drummond) owning the two best houses save one, sat fire each to his own house, which example the souldiers following laid the whole town with church and State house in ashes, saying, the rogues shouud harbour no more there."

But the episode of freedom was nearly over. Berkeley, secure on the eastern shore, had sent for help to England. Bacon previously had summoned the most influential men in the province to meet with him at Middle Plantation—the site of Williamsburg—to confer with him on the prosecution of the Indian war and the maintenance of law and order. There, writs had been issued for an Assembly and, in a proclamation, Bacon had commanded "all men in the land on pain of death to join him, and retire into the wildernesse upon arrival of the forces expected from England, and oppose them untill they shoud propose or accept to treat of an accom'odation." But those gentry, "who lived comfortably," "had demurred, believing that in the event of such an undertaking "the whole land must have become an Aceldama."

Bacon did not share these doubts. He was of the opinion that 500 Virginians could overcome an army of 2,000 "Red Coates," "wee having the same advantages against them the Indians have against use * * * wee acquainted with the Country, can lay Ambussadoes and take Trees and putt them by * * * and are doubtlesse as good or better shott than they."

And so he marched his army from Jamestown to engage the forces under Brent, but there was no battle, for Brent's men "haveing heard that Bacon had beate the Governour out of the towne they began to be afeared (if they should com within his reach) that he might beat them out of their lives, and so resolved not to come nere him." To effect their resolution, Brent's men deserted, leaving the vacillating colonel "mightily astonished."

Late in September, or early in October, the trained bands of Gloucester assembled at the courthouse by Bacon's command. They consisted of "som 6 or 7 hundred horss and foot, with their arms," and after a long "Harange" by the general they were urged to take the oath of union. In reply, their spokesman, Col. William Cole, "offered the sence of all the * * * men there present: which was summed up in their desires, not to have the oath imposed upon them, but to be indulged the benefitt of Neutralitie: But this he [Bacon] would not grant, telling of them that in this their request they appeared like the worst of sinners, who had a desire to be saved with the righteous, and yet would do nothing whereby they might obtaine salvation; and so offering to go away, one Coll: Gouge (of his party) calls to him and told him, that he had onely spoke to the Horss (meaning the Troopers) and not to the foote." But Bacon "in som passion replide, he had spoke to the Men, and not to the Horss; having left that servis for him to do, because one beast would understand the meaning of another." But the Gloucester men stood steadfast in their refusal.

It was a cruel blow, a fatal blow to Bacon, for he realized, perhaps for the first time, that he did not possess the complete support and confidence of the people.

His hopes diminished, and fever wracking his body, he withdrew to the plantation of Thomas Pate on Portopotank, where, a victim of dysentery contracted during the Indian campaigns, he died on October 26, 1676. With him, for a time, died the Virginia cause.

Comets and flights of birds and swarms of flies had presaged an Indian uprising, but Bacon and his "insinuations" of Lyberty were omens of another uprising of free men which would follow in a century. It is not known just when the idea of independence first occurred to him, but a few weeks before his death he had admitted "a total defection from Majestie, and our native Country." He was confident "that it is the mind of this country [Virginia], and of Mary Land, and Carolina also, to cast off their Governor and the Governors of Carolina haue taken no notice of the People of them, a long time; and the people are resolv'd to own their Governour further; And if wee cannot prevaile by Armes to make our Conditions for Peace, or obtaine the Priledge to elect our own Governour, wee may retire to Roanoke." And shortly after his death, his enemies having regained control of the assembly, sent "an humble address to his most Sacred Majesty," indicating "Nathaniel Bacon, Junior," for "desiring Noveltyes, and having designes to Allienate this County, from his maiestyes Royall dominion."

It is reported that "Bacons body was so made away, as his bones were never found to be exposed on a gibbet as was purpos'd," but there remains for us his epitaph, said to have been written by an attendant who loved him well:

"May admireation strike
Into his foes; while they confess with all
It was their guilt stil'd him a Criminall.
Onely this differance does from truth proceed
They in the guilt, he is the name must bleed.
While none shall dare his obsequies to sing
In desarv'd measures; untill time shall bring Truth Crown'd with freedom, and from danger free
To sound his praises to posterity."

That time has come. We now have proof that Nathaniel Bacon was, and he certainly was, the first great hero of the cause of freedom in America.

New Deal Winks at Reds but Hunts Down Crackpots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of February 25, 1944:

NEW DEAL WINKS AT REDS, BUT HUNTS DOWN CRACKPOTS—COMMUNISTS IMMUNE TO SMEAR CHARGES, FOR THEIR AIMS ARE SAME AS SMEARERS

(By Frank Hughes)

The Communists and internationalists are toiling ceaselessly to make America over to their own plan—to destroy her capitalist system, incorporate her in a superstate, open her gates wide to war refugees, distribute her remaining resources to other nations, and establish an international W. P. A. at the expense of the United States taxpayers.

The New Deal administration has started indictments and prosecutions against a few Naziphiles, anti-Semites, and an assembly of noisy crackpots without a tinge of seditious intent, but the Communists, who are working the other side of the street, are immune.

F. D.'S PROGRAM COMMUNISTIC

This is because the Communist program to remake America is the program of President Roosevelt and the New Deal party, currently in control of the Department of Justice.

The plans of the few Fascists and the many Communists in this conspiracy are equally totalitarian and equally dangerous to the American Republic, but the New Dealers choose to castigate and imprison the Fascists and their associates as defeatists and traitors, allowing the Communists to go free.

Through the smear and purge they seek to link all freedom-loving Americans who want to preserve their country as a republic to the Fascist cause.

Through the internationalists, the New Dealers control not only an influential section of the American press, but also dictate the editorial policy of the newspapers in Canada and Great Britain on American affairs.

These foreign newspapers are run by the international bankers and British politicians who want to Europeanize America and who gave the American internationalists their political Baedeckers.

EDEN'S NEWSPAPER CITED

An example is the Yorkshire Post, English journal owned by Anthony Eden, British foreign minister, which is booming Mr. Roosevelt for a fourth term. The Canadian papers likewise give Mr. Roosevelt, or his stooge, Wendell Willkie, strong support in nearly every discussion of American politics.

These newspapers want Mr. Roosevelt reelected to a fourth term, or Willkie elected to succeed him, because in either case the internationalists couldn't lose.

Communists, internationalists, and New Deal party chiefs are attempting to discredit the nationalist movement in America, because the growing nationalist strength threatens to overthrow them.

The nationalists, who include patriotic Republicans and Jeffersonian Democrats in Congress, are attempting to halt the socialization of America, the loss of her sovereignty through world government alliances, and the depletion and ruin of her resources for Europe's general benefit.

"UNDER COVER" SMEARERS' TOOL

One of the most highly touted smear schemes through which the New Deal bedfellows are attempting to discredit nationalists is by associating them with Nazi propagandists who operated here freely before Pearl Harbor.

The smear gang is ballyhooing a book entitled "Under Cover," the work of a Greek-born Armenian, Avedis Arthur Derounian, who writes under the name of John Roy Carlson. Derounian has several other aliases, among them George Pagnanelli, Thomas L. Decker, John Correa, and Rudolph Keibers. At one time he published a scurrilous anti-Semitic weekly called the "Christian Defender."

Derounian says he got his assignment to look into subversive activities of "Fascists" from Russell W. Davenport, the Wendell Willkie political adviser and editor of Fortune Magazine, the property of Henry Luce.

UNDER BIRKHEAD AEGIS

The $50-a-week Luce employee also investigated under the sponsorship of the Friends of Democracy, an organization headed by the Reverend Leon M. Birkhead, a dissident Methodist preacher with a flair for publicity, who first came to public notice in Kansas City in 1927 by performing companionate marriages.

Derounian, who is in his thirty-fifth year, says he is IV–F in the draft. Apparently, he joined every Fascist society and front organization which would accept his proffer of an initiation fee. He attended the meetings of these groups, passed out their scurrilous literature, drank beer with the bosses, and ingratiated himself.

He then proceeded to interview leaders of the noninterventionist movement who, before Pearl Harbor, were opposed to the entry of the United States into the war. He also buttonholed several noninterventionist Representatives in Washington.

Derounian asked the nationalists and pro-American representatives he claims to have talked to, a stock question—did they know, or had they heard from certain known Fascist agents of his acquaintance? Invariably, he got an affirmative answer, because anyone in public life and anyone opposing intervention actively was bound to have received visits or communications from the Fascists who were attempting to cover their treason with the honest cloak of patriotism.

This association of the loyal with the disloyal was enough for Derounian, and he proceeded to repudiate as Fascists anyone who wasn't willing to draw America into the European war as of the summer of 1941. He was a crude detective of vast ignorance, as is evidenced by his reference to the late Henry L. Doherty, utility magnate, as Harding's Attorney General.

LAUDS REVOLUTION

Derounian proved himself to be a Communist or Communist fellow traveler when he wrote an article in the November 1936 issue of Soviet Russia Today, lauding the Communist revolution in Armenia, and again, in June 1941, when the New Republic printed one of his attacks on the capitalist system.

This explains why the history of his 4-year "undercover" investigation fails once to mention the sabotage worked by the Communists on the American defense and war program between August 1939 and June 1941, while Russia was an ally of Hitler.

The Communists staged strikes and slowdowns which really prevented the production of war materials, and picketed the White House as well. The bundists and other Nazi front groups "exposed" by Derounian were marching, drinking beer, and passing out tracts during this time, according to his story.

ACCUSED PATROLMAN DREW

Derounian is the man who attempted recently to convict Patrolman James L. Drew of the New York police for anti-Semitism. He accused Drew, who is a Roman Catholic, and because he is a Roman Catholic, of associating with Joseph McWilliams and other anti-Semitic agitators.

Derounian, in turn, was accused of bringing Drew together with such anti-Semites in order to frame Policeman Drew, who was exonerated of all the charges by Police Commissioner Lewis J. Valentine. A commission appointed by Mayor La Guardia unanimously upheld Drew's exoneration.

Derounian's book, rejected by several publishers and finally accepted by E. P. Dutton & Co., is the target of several libel suits. The Dutton Company, which used to bear a good reputation, fails to tell what influence led it to print so vile a book.

ANOTHER SMEAR VOLUME

Another smear book, "Sabotage," by Michael Sayers and Albert E. Kahan, was published by Harper & Bros., who withdrew from the venture when Representative DIES pointed out that a large part of the material in it had been lifted from hearings of his Committee on un-American Activities.

The book was reissued by another publisher with the lifted material omitted, but it retained, understandably enough, a smear of Representative DIES for exposing the Communists in Government office.

A Plea for Aid to Critical War Production Areas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to my request for permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD I want to include the testimony I gave before the Appropriations Committee of the House on February 23, 1944. The testimony follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am appearing here today as chairman of the House Naval Affairs Subcommittee on Congested Areas. The subcommittee was appointed by Chairman Vinson on February 23, 1943, and directed to investigate congestion in certain critical war production areas and centers of naval activity of this country. It was our task to determine the causes contributing to the congestion in these areas and the necessary action to remove conditions impeding the war effort. We made an intensive inquiry of the problems of housing, health, recreation, transportation, manpower, police and fire protection, food, and education. Our findings and recommendations, summarized in 9 reports, were based upon visual inspections of the areas and "local level" information gained from approximately 400 intelligent, representative, and well-informed witnesses appearing at our hearings. These hearings covered 8 areas and 39 municipalities on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of this country.

In order to prosecute the war, the Federal Government has had to avail itself of the geography of the various States and the manpower and facilities of municipalities in all parts of the Nation. Because of their strategic location, certain municipalities have been the centers of concentration of war effort activities. The tremendous increase of population, caused by the influx of war workers and members of the armed forces, and the augmented war activity experienced by these war production cities, have greatly strained their limited municipal facilities and compelled such cities to expand quickly their facilities. This has required money and in most cases it was a financial burden greater than they could carry. The Subcommittee on Congested Areas found that the municipalities were carrying an inordinate share of the war burden—that in most cases where the absence of vitally needed facilities has impeded the war effort, this condition has resulted from the limited finances of these municipalities and inadequate Federal assistance.

I must admit that we found that the Federal Government and the local communities both are shouldering an overwhelming load, while the States, in most instances, are giving very little in the form of relief to the municipalities. But let us face the situation with realism. Are we primarily interested in economy or in winning the war? To those who might place undue emphasis on economy let me direct these observations. Appropriation of Lanham Act funds in the realistic amount required by the effective execution of the war effort is an investment in the future of this country. Unwise saving of dollars on school and child-care facilities is sowing a whirlwind of juvenile delinquency. This is but one observation made by my subcommittee of the destructive results of fallacious economy. To those who view the appropriations for Lanham Act funds on a short-term expenditure basis, may I point out that the facilities made possible through Lanham Act funds have increased the productivity of war workers and are directly speeding the end of this costly war. Each day that this war is shortened prevents immeasurable expense of money and lives. To those who share my concern over the lack of sharing of the war burden by the States may I urge a realistic acceptance of the situation. The war effort, which is undeniably Federal in character, requires the facilities made possible by the Lanham Act funds. Do not allow the lack of financial ability of the municipalities or the failure of the States to accept their just share of the costs to prevent the Federal Government from authorizing appropriations for these facilities. If the Federal Government does not, then it simply won't be done.

As chairman of the Congested Areas Subcommittee, I feel that I should give this committee the benefit of the impressions of a group that has witnessed the excellent results of Lanham Act funds in providing facilities so vital to the war effort. We have found that in areas where recent large increases in population have occurred, one of the most important causes of high absenteeism and turn-over in war plants and military installations has been the lack of adequate community facilities and services. There is a desperate need for Lanham Act funds for these war communities which have been expanding and will continue to expand.

On behalf of the House Naval Affairs Subcommittee on Congested Areas, I submit this most serious, sincere and urgent plea for favorable action by the Committee on Appropriations on the present request of the Federal Works Agency for Lanham Act funds.

Yugoslav Americans of Pacific Northwest Urge Recognition of Democratic Forces in Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, recently a mass conference in my home city of Tacoma, Wash., was held under the auspices of the American Committee for Free Yugoslavs. Present were more than 500 persons, representing several thousand members of the committee. At this important meeting, the audience heard read and discussed the proposed eight-point plan, allegedly prepared by King Peter, of Yugoslavia, to unify the Yugoslav war effort. Thereafter, the conference unanimously voted to adopt a resolution, which is self-explanatory, and which is appended herein, below, and which I commend to the Congress for its careful consideration. The resolution urges the right of self-government within Yugoslavia, free from outside power politics. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the eight-point program prepared under the name of King Peter to unify the Yugoslav war effort is designed to do quite the opposite; and

Whereas Yugoslavia may soon become an invasion point for the drive toward Berlin from the Mediterranean; and

Whereas, if adopted, the Peter program would give aid to Nazi resistance by hampering the movement of Tito's troops in areas to be defended, under the Peter plan, by Mihailovitch, whose forces have never fought the Nazis or Fascists, but only against Marshal Tito and the patriotic Yugoslav Partisan Armies; and

Whereas the Peter plan is designed not only to delay victory over the Axis, this costing additional American lives, but also if adopted would menace our heroic Yugoslav allies, whose sacrifices in our cause already beggar description, with the threat that when the war is won they will be deprived of the one reward that their present sacrifices entitle them to, the right of self-government free from outside power politics: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we condemn the Peter eight-point plan as a plot to delay victory, sacrifice time and life in the coming offensive, and shake the confidence of our allies in Yugoslavia, the Balkans, and the underground in Hitler's Europe; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the State Department to withdraw the right of representative of the Yugoslav people from Minister Fotich, of the Royal Yugoslav Government in Exile, and invite Foreign Minister Smadlaka, of the Government of Liberation, to Washington, D. C., to arrange for the appointment of a representative of Marshal Tito at our Nation's Capital; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President, our State Department, to the chairmen of the Senate and House Foreign Relations and Affairs Committees, the Washington State congressional delegation, and to the press.

The White Paper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the Independent Jewish Press Service, Inc.:

March 31, 1944, is a day to shake the confidence of those who believe in the high principles for which this war is being fought. March 31 is a day contradicting the Atlantic Charter. For this is the day which was to have decided whether the white paper goes into effect or is suspended. We had all hoped that it would be suspended. We had hoped that this would be done automatically, for breaching the white paper policies is no less important than breaching forts in Hitler's Europe. It is a part of the same fight for justice, for racial equality, for a better world. The white paper is a document not merely of appeasement, and even that would be unforgivable. It is a document of injustice and racial discrimination. It is a hangman's document. It has been a contributing factor to the death of millions of Jews that have perished in Hitler's Europe. It will be the cause of the death of many more if not abolished.

The developments around the white paper are almost incredible. Denounced by Winston Churchill, before he had become Prime Minister of Britain; condemned by the leaders of public opinion and spokesmen for right in all countries; described by the President of the United States as a document which has never been approved by the United States; it seems to have a charmed life all its own, and continues to exist, and continues to be part of our horrible present and a decisive factor in Jewry's fate. It decides life and death. Its powers in affecting the numerical strength of Jewry are incredible.

Put a black border on your calendar around March 31, 1944.

Better Men for Better Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I enclose an editorial appearing in the Washington Star of March 19, 1944, commenting on a splendid book entitled "Better Men for Better Times."

For ideals such as are expounded in this book, Better Men for Better Times, we are fighting this war. Our enemies scoff at them and give them the lie; and even in our own midst there are cynics who question their sincerity. Yet Americans know that these ideals are real and genuine for Americans know that they could fight for nothing else. The lives of our soldiers, sailors, and all in the forces of our country are too precious, too sacred, to risk for anything short of this. The men and boys who have gone away from our farms and factories, from our banks and our business establishments, from our schools and colleges are ready to risk all and sacrifice everything, as are those who have been left behind, in order to eradicate from the face of the earth all the stupid and unholy things which foster wars and carnage. Here in America we have discovered from happy experience that human beings of all kinds and classes can live together in peace and harmony and find mutual happiness under conditions that befit human dignity; we go forth to battle with the purpose of destroying those things that prevent people in other lands from making the same discovery. This book is a veritable statement of principles which if practiced and lived would make better men for better times.

The editorial follows:

GREAT AFFIRMATION

The commission on American citizenship of the Catholic University of America has issued a report on its purposes and ideals which should have the attention of thoughtful citizens of all denominations. It is entitled "Better Men for Better Times" and is the work of two acknowledged scholars of distinction, the Right Reverend Monsignor George Johnson, of the department of education and Dr. Robert J. Slavin, O. P., of the department of philosophy.

But the volume is not difficult reading. Very simply and plainly written, it aims to interest the average man or woman who has realized the existence of dangers to "our own democratic institutions" and wonders confusedly what to do at an obvious "turning point in the history of the world." The commission, under the mandate of the American hierarchy by which it was instructed in 1939, answers in terms of civics, sociology, and economics as well as in terms of religion and ethics. It sets forth without qualification:

"Our Government and our institutions are based on the acceptance of the fact that there is something sacred about individual men and women; that before the law they are equal and are not to be deprived of that measure of life and freedom and opportunity for happiness and content that is their endowment from their Creator."

Political liberty, however, is not enough. The commission calls it "a hollow sham when it attempts to function in the midst of economic bondage" and declares:

"Since the turn of the century, there has been a growing realization on our part that our zeal for the preservation of individual liberty must be matched by our devotion to the cause of social security. These ideals are not necessarily exclusive; as a matter of fact, they complement one another, and neither can be achieved at the expense of the other. * * * We are convinced that it is possible to bring our economic system into conformity with the principles of sound reason and justice without doing violence to the essentials of democratic government."

Certainly, the problem thus expressed is not new. It has been part of the picture of American community life for more than a hundred and fifty years. The question is: How can the people be at once free and secure? Monsignor Johnson and Dr. Slavin reply with a great spiritual affirmation phrased in these compelling words:

"What America professes to stand for, what America strives for, what America is fighting for, what America dreams, has neither reality nor substance apart from belief in God. We talk of the brotherhood of man, but men are brothers only because there is a common Father in heaven. We dilate on the sacredness of the human personality; but human beings are sacred, not because we say so, but because they are creatures whom God has fashioned according to His image and likeness, redeemed by the precious blood of His Son and destined for eternal union with Him. * * * 'There is only one Name * * * in which men can be saved.'"

Not only in Lent is such a pronouncement worthy of deepest consideration.

Rent Control Should Be Fair to Both Tenants and Owners

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to my request for permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to include the testimony I gave before the Select Committee of the House to Investigate Executive Agencies on March 15, 1944. The testimony follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as chairman of the Congested Areas Subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I have had an unusual opportunity to study at first-hand the operation of rent control in many of the areas throughout the country where housing congestion is most acute. In addition to this I have a rather complete picture of the rental situation in my own district, one of the worst congested in the country.

Now I contend that no law passed by Congress is passed with a studious attempt to be unfair. Sometimes, however, the law works that way or is made to work that way because of interpretations outside the intent of Congress. When I found how unfair the present law was to both tenants and owners I endeavored to do something about it. Everyone knows we must have price controls and rent control in time of war. The people generally feel that way, though being Americans, they are restless under any kind of restraint. However, there is one thing they will not tolerate and that is injustice. Treat us all alike even though we're treated hard and we will all accept it like good soldiers. But I am compelled to state that the way the Rent Control provisions of the Price Control Act are administered, some are treated well and some are discriminated against.

So last year I introduced a bill, H. R. 1877, to amend the Emergency Price Control Act in an effort to improve administration of the rent-control program and correct serious injustices that had become apparent in the course of my investigations.

I am even more convinced today that my proposals for changes in policy were sound and had they been written into the law much of the criticism of this program would have been prevented.

Therefore, I welcome the opportunity to meet with this committee to suggest changes which properly should be incorporated into the act, since the Administrator has failed, in nearly 2 years of rent control administration, to correct these injustices.

In my proposals presented more than a year ago I suggested that certain policies included in the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as passed by the Congress but which do not appear in the act applicable to the remainder of the country, should be incorporated into the national act. These policies apparently have resulted in an unusually equitable administrative record in the District. Neither does the District administrator complain of unbearable administrative burdens nor is there widespread criticism from either landlords or tenants.

Therefore, I suggest that you recommend changes which may be modelled after provisions in the District act in the following respects:

First Require adjustment of rents which due to peculiar circumstances (see Sec. 4 (a)—District Act), are frozen either substantially above or below rents for comparable quarters.

I have investigated situations in my district in which the rent of a house was frozen at less than one-half the rent for a similar house nearby and for other similar houses, yet the area rent director has advised he could do nothing about it since it did not come within certain adjustment provisions already incorporated into the rent regulations. I see no reason why the area rent director should not adjust these hardship cases promptly on a fair and equitable basis.

Second. Provision should be made for adjustments to offset increases in taxes and other operating and maintenance expenses in individual cases (as provided in sec. 4 (b)—District Act).

The national regulations fail to permit adjustments in individual cases and restrict any adjustment of this kind to situations in which there have been broad changes of "general applicability" within the area. This virtually prevents any possibility of such adjustments as costs do not change uniformly or "generally" in all types of housing accommodations.

Third. The established Federal courts should be open to all citizens to appeal from adjustments ordered by the area rent directors.

In the District, landlords and tenants aggrieved by orders of the Administrator have the right of appeal to the municipal court. Throughout the country the present appeal procedure is a lengthy administrative process in which the Administrator, in effect, is asked to reverse his own findings. Local citizens are entitled to court review—locally—of the Administrator's acts. Of necessity, this court must be a Federal court. But any complaint that such right of appeal will unduly congest the Federal courts is not borne out by experience in the District, where in more than 2 years only 60 rent cases have been appealed to a court which is even more accessible than would be the Federal courts.

Fourth. Tenants whose conduct is objectionable, abusive, or destructive to housing accommodations should not be protected in their right to possession.

The Administrator, or some of his subordinates, is subject to criticism for rules and interpretations severely restricting the conditions under which a landlord may regain possession of his property. There has been much complaint that undesirable tenants have unduly interfered with the right of other tenants to peaceful possession, yet the management has been stripped of its power to reasonably restrict the conduct of such persons. The eviction restrictions in the District act are similar but less restrictive than in the national act, yet there seems to be no complaint against them. The Administrator's powers in this respect should be more carefully circumscribed.

Fifth. More encouragement should be given property owners to expand the use of existing housing in congested areas.

In my committee investigations it became apparent that housing facilities in some areas were being restricted to the use of a lesser—rather than greater—number of persons. It appears that the landlord ordinarily may receive the same rent irrespective of the number of occupants. Therefore, he tends to restrict occupancy. O. P. A. has provided some adjustment in these cases, but evidence has indicated that the procedure is so limited and complicated as not to invite widespread landlord cooperation. A more practical approach might lessen housing congestion in some areas without endangering the rent-control program.

It was testified before our subcommittee that in the Los Angeles area one-third more people could be housed in present facilities if, rather than discouraging added occupancy, the rent-control administration would encourage it by more liberal allowances in rental charges, which incidentally would redound to the advantage of the war effort and of the war worker too.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose, like the rest of us, you have received numerous complaints from your constituents about the various features of other parts of the Rent Control Act, haven't you?

Mr. IZAC. And I intended to bring them up. I have a stack about like this [indicating].

Mr. FORD. About how high is that, Mr. Izac?

Mr. LZAC. I can tell you roughly. I had 12,000 complaints in the first 2 months on rent control alone. I mean after the act went into effect. There were 8,000 petitions filed in the first month in my district against the rent control conditions as laid down by the Administrator. Of those 8,000, I could not go through all of them, but I asked permission and I picked out at random 100 sample petitions. Of those, I found that 70 came within the $5 limitation. In other words, if the local director had the authority, he could have wiped out 70 percent of all of that 8,000 by simply raising or lowering to a maximum of $5—from $1 to $5.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Per month?

Mr. IZAC. Per month; included in that whole number, and still they went along for almost a year before they got rid of those 8,000. In fact, I think some of them are not satisfactorily disposed of yet.

Mr. DELANEY. I might suggest to you, if you read the hearings on that rent situation and the testimony given before this committee, I think it will enlighten you greatly and give you an opportunity to answer people in a very constructive way just what this committee has been trying to do along those lines.

Mr. IZAC. I think the people generally understand that since this committee was formed and since it was your first piece of business, that you were the only committee of Congress that has investigated the rent control situation as it affects the people who have migrated and have come in great numbers to congested areas. And they are the ones that are most vitally affected. It is not the great mass of the people in our country; they do not know there is such a thing as rent control; it is only those few areas such as San Diego, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Detroit, and places like that, where you have thousands of people coming in and finding no place to sleep. That, of course, is where our great productive enterprises are located, as well as our ports of embarkation, and it all adds up to the congestion and it is not getting better, it is getting worse.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Did your complaints come as a class from the tenants or landlords?

Mr. IZAC. I would say about one-fifth from tenants and about four-fifths from owners. But, there is this to be said about it; when rent control first began we found that landlords who had good business agents in charge of their properties had advanced the rentals of their clients and were in good position when these freezing dates were set, and they were able to retain the excessive rents they had advanced on their properties.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But to the small individual property owner, as far as he is concerned, he was caught napping.

Mr. IZAC. That is right. In places such as many cities of the west coast, we have very few apartment buildings and it does not affect big owners of apartments very much, because it is not like New York City or Philadelphia or Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. What you mean to say from your observation and experience in your part of the country, it is the little fellow who is getting stepped on and not the big real-estate man?

Mr. IZAC. That is correct; the little man of organized labor, let us say, who is now 60 years of age and has put his savings aside and bought a duplex and who lives in one-half with his wife and the other half he rents. Those are down to about $18 a month, whereas the similar rentals right across the street are permitted $45 and $55. I cannot justify that to my constituents and I do not believe anybody else can.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The widow maybe, who has rented part of her home.

Mr. IZAC. That is correct.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is what happened in my district.

Mr. IZAC. That is right; they are the ones who are most adversely affected. They are the ones I am appealing to you members of this committee to do something for, because we have never been able to get the Banking and Currency Committee to go into this bill of mine, for instance, or any other bill introduced.

Mr. FORD. Does your bill contain the suggestions you have made to the committee?

Mr. IZAC. Yes.

Mr. FORD. H. R. 1877.

Mr. IZAC. That is correct; and I would like to file a copy with the committee.

Mr. FORD. We have a copy.

Mr. IZAC. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. We will call the next witness.

Surplus Goods Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Surplus Goods Problem," from the Underwear and Hosiery Review for February 1944. In this article Mr. Carleton, a New Hampshire wholesaler who recalls the hectic conditions following World War No. 1 regarding Government surplus merchandise, submits the plan presented as a means of preventing similar grief when peace is won after the present war.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SURPLUS GOODS PROBLEM—L. J. CARLETON, NEW HAMPSHIRE SPECIALTY WHOLESALER, HAS A PLAN FOR POST-WAR DISPOSAL OF EXCESS GOVERNMENT MERCHANDISE

That surplus Government merchandise should be distributed, after the war, through the Nation's wholesalers is the belief of L. J. Carleton, head of L. J. Carleton Co., Inc., New Hampshire distributors of hosiery and underwear.

Mr. Carleton has worked out a detailed program which reads as follows:

"The sale of all surplus merchandise of a textile nature should be governed by representative businessmen competent to pass on the desirability of such goods for civilian use, and control the sale in an orderly fashion in order not to disrupt domestic market. The sale of desirable goods for domestic use should be governed by men now experienced in textiles and a board or commission made up of enterprising men should be appointed. I suggest that such board consist of three or five representatives from various wholesale concerns in allotted territories. It is important that no two members be selected from any one wholesale concern.

"All surplus goods not acceptable from the standpoint of styles and colors for civilian use, or so-called "Victory" merchandise that the domestic public may not be interested in, when they can doubtless get a supply of up-to-date goods, should be disposed of through lend-lease. Lend-lease goods could be disposed of through regular governmental channels, as the sale of such merchandise should not be allowed in any way to disturb our normal civilian market.

"I suggest that on various lines other than textiles, such as groceries, hardware, and other items of surplus goods, that the disposal of same should be controlled by boards or commissions of businessmen with real experience in these varied lines, and in similar manner to above procedure outlined for sale of textiles.

"I recommend that boards or commissions to cover sales of domestic surplus goods should be appointed in various regional territories; for example—New England should be zoned as one regional territory and various boards or commissions for this territory should be made up of New England businessmen who are familiar with local market conditions appertaining to each of the various lines. This would obviate the complete control by any one central board located in Washington with a program set up for business to be handled by field men sent out from that point (at great expense) and definitely dictated to by "brain trusters" with no practical experience in merchandising.

"After territories are mapped into regions, and boards or commissions are selected to serve in those individual regions, the representatives from each zone should be called to Washington to discuss in detail, with proper Government officials, all angles and matters relative to the sale of surplus Government goods. Such a discussion and study of a program by a selected and Nation-wide body of businessmen together with Government officials should help materially to bring this problem to a practical and, I hope, prosperous solution.

"The War Production Board should allot surplus merchandise simultaneously to each regional territory its share of such surplus goods based on population in each region. Each region should be allotted 30 or 60 days time to furnish detailed sales orders to take up their allotment. Any unsold allotment, or portion thereof, must be automatically offered to some other region or regions by the W. P. B. at the expiration of the 30- or 60-day limit. Furthermore, should an enormous amount in certain lines of surplus goods become available at any one given time, the Government should use business judgment where such quantities are excessive and release a reasonable portion only of such lines, in order to avoid speculation, or the possibility of disrupting the domestic market temporarily on like or similar merchandise.

"All sales in any one zone should be governed by the board or commission in control of sales in their allotted zone. In other words, any board or commission must limit their sales, also shipments within the confines of their allotted territory or zone. Any inquiries to a board or commission received by them from parties outside their zoned territory should be referred to the board or commission governing the zone from which such inquiry may be received. It should be definitely understood that no orders should be detailed by any board for shipment or reshipment to a point outside their regular zoned territory.

"GET BUSY NOW

"The major thought from any standpoint is to get busy now and formulate some definite plan with reference to the disposal of surplus Government goods in order that we may not have a repetition of the conditions of the last World War whereby a much too large percentage of war surplus goods got into the hands of speculators. It is good business to start now and formulate a program that may benefit, in real measure, the wholesalers who are already locally set up to handle the distribution of merchandise from coast to coast and in an orderly manner. Let's have a program designed to give the small businessman the opportunity to secure his rightful share of Government surplus goods.

"From a textile standpoint, a wholesaler must be classified as an establishment presently engaged in the business of selling hosiery, underwear, or goods of a textile nature to retailers generally, with at least a 50 percent volume of sales from out-of-stock merchandise (not considering drop shipments). Furthermore, it should be definitely understood that every wholesaler in each zone should have advance notice from his board, stating the date, also item or items of surplus goods that are to be released for sale—this procedure in order that merchandise may be offered in a fair and impartial manner. In further reference to distribution: Should orders result greatly in excess of the amount available in any zone, quantities should be allotted by the board on a fair and equitable basis.

"Some method by businessmen should be designed without delay—let's make a strenuous effort to obviate as much as possible, the possibility of politics entering into a program for the distribution of surplus goods. In order to protect the taxpayers' money to the fullest degree, I again suggest that the big job of disposing of millions of dollars worth of surplus goods should be handled by businessmen who are experienced in handling this project in a businesslike and practical way, rather than let the program fall into the hands of political 'business busters' who may handle the matter in an impractical manner."

Governor Sharpe Proclaims Teacher Appreciation Week in South Dakota

REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, Gov. M. Q. Sharpe, the great and good Governor of the productive and progressive State of South Dakota, has designated the week of April 10 to 16 as teacher appreciation week in the State of South Dakota. I rise to call this to the attention of the Congress and the country, to commend Governor Sharpe on his action, and to recommend that other States should likewise recognize the service which the teacher in the classroom is rendering to this Republic during these trying times.

I think that when the records of the war are written, among the unsung heroes who will be discovered are the teachers in the classrooms, operating at financial sacrifice to themselves, standing by the colors and doing the work necessary to continue the educational program of America. Every Member of this House owes a debt of gratitude to the classroom teachers who helped instill in him the inspiration and information which provides the background from which present day decisions in Government are being made. These teachers, frequently underpaid and many times not fully appreciated, devoted many patient, persuasive, and painstaking hours to the development in each of us of an appreciation of the functions of freedom and the utility of learning.

South Dakota has set a splendid example in setting aside a week in which to give recognition to the services of its classroom teachers. They serve us well in peace and in war. With their incomes usually lagging behind those of other professional people and their purchasing powers reduced by rising prices and larger taxes, the teachers of this Republic are inculcating in the minds of the children of America the sparks of patriotism and the reservoirs of knowledge which are manifesting themselves so brilliantly in slightly older Americans who are fighting with successful valor in almost every section of the world today.

The teachers who have helped so significantly to produce the quality of manhood which is today America's, deserve the plaudits of the country and should not be forgotten when we give recognition to those who produce the machines of war, the foods for freedom, and the other great civilian contributions which support the sacrifices and the heroism of service men and women.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas education is one of the most important factors contributing to successful government by the people; and

Whereas the teachers and educators in all schools and in all grades, from primary grades through the colleges, are the quiet, effective, self-sacrificing, and loyal workers who make possible for the general public the manifold benefits of methodical education: Now therefore,

I, M. Q. Sharpe, Governor of South Dakota, do hereby proclaim the period from April 10 to April 16, 1944, as Teacher Appreciation Week in South Dakota and I do urge all our citizens during that time to consider and practice appropriate ways and means of expressing our appreciation to our teachers in all schools for their public-spirited work, and to give them our encouragement by visiting their schools and classes and cooperating with them always for the production of the best grade of citizenship for our country. I would recommend to all student bodies and organizations, including the Young Citizens League, that they put on some kind of appropriate school program or exercises during Teacher Appreciation Week.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of South Dakota, this 21st day of March 1944.

M. Q. SHARPE,
Governor of South Dakota.

[GREAT SEAL]
Attest:

MRS. L. M. LARSEN,
Secretary of State.

South Not as Friendly as Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article which appeared in a recent issue of the Boston Post, entitled "South Not as Friendly as Boston":

SOUTH NOT AS FRIENDLY AS BOSTON—SOUTHERN SAILOR TELLS DAD HUB FOLK MATCHLESS

A sailor aboard a warship which has docked in Boston several times wrote home to his father, the editor of a newspaper in Albany, Ga., that the people of the South don't know what real hospitality is, declaring that Boston's citizens "are matchless in their friendliness and hospitality."

SENDS HIS THANKS

This was disclosed when Mayor Tobin received a letter from John H. Crouch, editor of the Albany (Ga.) Journal, expressing his thanks to the people of Boston for the hospitality shown his son and other servicemen from homes in the South. His letter follows:

"Permit me to express through you to the city of Boston, sincere and everlasting appreciation for the kindnesses heaped upon my sailor lad. He has docked in Boston several times, and his letters home tell of the warm reception always accorded sailors."

On one occasion he wrote: "Dad, you have been wont to write how hospitable, friendly southern people are as compared to the people of other sections. Well, I want to tell you that we southerners don't know what real hospitality is. The people of Boston are matchless in their friendliness and hospitality and, believe me, they hold a warm spot in the heart of every Navy man."

NOTHING GREATER

Boston may lay claim to many outstanding accomplishments, but to my way of thinking there is no attainment more to be desired than that of holding the love and good will of people everywhere. It is an achievement that your chamber of commerce or other civic bodies may strive for through printed booklets but never attain.

It has been my great pleasure to reproduce in my newspaper portions of letters from my son, praising Bostonians for their friendliness to servicemen, and if ever there were impressions in this section of the "deep South" that Boston was an "arrogant, cold city," I trust that these false representations have been righted.

Again thanking you and the people of Boston for their patriotic hospitality, and assuring you of the deep appreciation of parents as well as servicemen, I am,

Yours truly,

JOHN H. CROUCH.

Crackerland in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a fair and illuminating article by Mr. Ralph Smith, on the T. V. A., a controversy recently before the Senate. The article was published in the Atlanta Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRACKERLAND IN WASHINGTON—SUPPORTING M'KELLAR'S VIEW OF T. V. A.

(By Ralph Smith)

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28.—A great deal has been written these last few weeks about the controversy in Congress over the annual appropriations for the maintenance and operation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, yet little that's been published has shed light upon the basic issue involved. One would mistakenly suppose, from what he's read, that the row in the Senate was rooted in a "diabolical" determination to destroy the effectiveness of the great public power project that harnesses the horsepower stored in a dozen or more man-made reservoirs in the valley of the Tennessee River.

What, then, is the basic issue, on which the Senate divided conclusively?

Obviously, out of 18 southern Senators present and voting would not support a "diabolical design" to cripple, aye, destroy the Nation's greatest power development located in their midst * * * Such Senators, for example, as GEORGE and RUSSELL of Georgia, MAYBANK and SMITH of South Carolina, McKELLAR of Tennessee, EASTLAND of Mississippi, CONNALLY of Texas, BAILEY of North Carolina and BYRD of Virginia among the number.

What was the other side of the question anyhow?

In a broad sense, the T. V. A. controversy in the Senate grew out of the purpose of the Appropriations Committee, under Acting Chairman KENNETH MCKELLAR, to reassert the rights vested in the Congress by article I of the Constitution, section 9, clause 7—"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement of accounts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

In a more definite sense, the row raged over the insistence of T. V. A., speaking through Chairman David E. Lilienthal, upon retaining and expending without the sanction of the Congress $10,000,000 annually of its earnings.

Other agencies of the Government enjoy no such privilege. None asks it. The Postoffice Department, for example, converts into the Treasury every cent it collects from its farflung activities, and in turn it spends not a dime that isn't covered by an appropriation by the Congress.

Budgetary control of Federal funds has never interfered seriously with the operation of Federal agencies. They are always protected by deficiency appropriations voted by the Congress upon satisfactory showings by the agencies that overspend.

The Tennessee Valley Authority controls reservoirs and dam sites located in Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina. Probably fifteen of these sites have been developed through congressional appropriations exceeding a billion dollars, exclusive of the original Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals, named in memory of President Wilson, who was first to visualize the potentialities of the Tennessee Valley for the development of hydroelectric power.

Senator MCKELLAR, central figure in the current controversy, was a Member of the House during the First World War, and sponsored the initial development with the endorsement of President Wilson. He is now revealed by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having proposed and battled through the Senate amendments that provided funds for at least nine of the dams constructed since the advent of T. V. A., under the leadership of President Roosevelt.

I say "sponsored," because the appropriations were actually initiated by him in the Senate, the House having failed to provide the funds, and as respects at least three of the developments MCKELLAR was vigorously opposed by members of the T. V. A. Board, which lobbied actively against the dams he sought and which now are integrated in the system.

The Authority is now out of the red, as the saying is. It earned a handsome profit last year, but these earnings were not converted into the Treasury. On this year's operations the income will amount to $68,000,000, and every penny of this is being returned to the Authority under the independent offices appropriation bill. In addition, it is being given $10,000,000 in addition, but demands still another ten million as a revolving fund.

Thus, instead of accepting or being satisfied with $79,000,000, which covers its budget estimate, the Authority insists upon $89,000,000, for the expenditure of which it will have no accounting to make of $10,000,000.

And that is the nub of the controversy in Congress.

T. V. A. does not, and has not, confined its activities solely to the production of hydroelectric power. It has experimented with phosphate and has expended $700,000 in Williamson and Manry Counties, in Tennessee, for phosphate lands, the sale of which represented a profit of $500,000 to the owners of the land.

The Authority also has planned the construction and operation of a phosphate plant at Mobile, but the War Production Board has withheld priorities and this enterprise has not materialized, albeit its construction is believed to be on the program contemplated with the use of the revolving fund.

What may be the outcome of the revolving fund controversy is problematical. The House has the final say, or, at least, the last say in the row, since it approved the revolving fund and the Senate struck it out. The bill goes to conference, and it will be in these meetings of representatives of the two branches that the issue will be settled finally.

As chairman of the Senate committee, MCKELLAR will head the conference committee from that branch. Obviously, he will make a determined fight to have his amendment retained in the bill, but there is a question as to the reaction of the House conferees, notwithstanding the growing insistence in both branches of Congress upon the reassertion of the right of the legislature to control all expenditures of public moneys.

Our Foreign Policy

REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, during the past several weeks, I have given considerable thought to the subject matter I am about to discuss but hesitated long for fear that its discussion might be misunderstood and possibly interfere with our war effort. Events of the recent past, however, and a visit to my district have convinced me that it is imperative to make a statement on this subject now.

Prior to my coming to Congress and ever since I have had the privilege to serve in this honored body, I have been a strong supporter of the President's foreign policy. During the past several days we have heard repeated charges made by administration critics, and even some of its supporters, to the effect that we have no foreign policy. It is my opinion that our Commander in Chief, in public statements made before the publication of the Atlantic Charter and since then, has set forth broad policies, which in effect constitute the foreign policy of our country. If we have erred in our foreign policy, it is not because of our lack of a program but, rather, because of our hesitancy and failure to apply it to practical situations—to put it into action.

Long before the adoption of the Atlantic Charter, the President had, on a number of occasions, set forth in clear terms our policy and belief in the autonomy and self-determination of the peoples of nations—big and small; that no nation should be permitted to aggrandize itself at the expense of its neighbor; that might does not make right and that seizures by force do not contribute to the peace of the world. Our leaders have stressed repeatedly before we were drawn into this war and since that we seek no aggrandizement of our possessions, no new territory in the victory we shall ultimately attain.

Today we are engaged in a war in scattered theaters of the world. Our allies are nations from all corners of the globe. Our greatest source of difficulty at this moment, aside from our conflict with the Axis, comes from the eastern European theater. There, Russia, one of our allies, announced her intention to snuff out of existence at least three small countries, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, badly maim and cripple Poland and to dominate the internal affairs of Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. It seems paradoxical that our ally should seek to destroy nations which are also our allies. Russia's political aggressiveness in foreign affairs, in contrast to our apparent passiveness, has been a cause for alarm both at home and abroad.

Some months ago, the nations affected by the designs of our eastern ally have sought the aid of Great Britain and the United States who agreed to act as mediators. Russia, however, informed us that this was her internal problem and, therefore, no concern of ours. Subsequently about the time of the Tehran Conference, Anthony Eden, the British Foreign Minister, announced that Great Britain would recognize no unilateral changes in the boundaries of any nation. Our Government took no stand—offered only silence. Winston Churchill upon his return from Teheran stated that while Great Britain had guaranteed freedom and independence to her allies in Europe she did not guarantee their boundaries. What sophistry! To this our country's spokesman again offered only silence.

Prime Minister Winston Churchill's statement and our failure to protest shocked not only the people of Europe but also all thinking Americans. Our silence was interpreted as mute acquiescence. The question of the boundaries in this matter is secondary. The disturbing factor about the whole situation is that we apparently have recognized and permitted power politics to control. Thus it appears to the outside world that we have abandoned and cast aside our democratic ideals and principles in the settlement of international disputes. Without a hearing and without due process we have permitted one country to dispossess others of their territory. Is this to be a precedent and pattern for future settlements? If it is, then our hope for a lasting peace after victory is shattered before the war is won. If the old power politics and intrigue are to reign in the days following this war we shall most certainly be involved in a third bloody conflict before a generation passes.

To hasten the day of victory, Russia, as well as the other United Nations, needs the wholehearted cooperation and collaboration of all the underground forces in Nazi-occupied Europe. If freedom, autonomy, and self-determination are guaranteed the people that are now suffering under Hitler's heel, they will fight to death. However, if all they have to look forward to is subjugation and another yoke, it is unreasonable to expect them to extend themselves to any degree. And we can look forward to a long, drawn-out war.

In my humble opinion a statement on the part of our Government that we will not recognize any unilateral boundary changes would give hope and incentive to the underground forces in the occupied countries to bring their wholehearted cooperation into the war effort and accelerate the day of victory. The morale of our own people, as well as our allies, will be raised immeasurably upon our assumption of leadership and responsibility not only in the battle to bring the war to an early victorious conclusion but also in the formulation and establishment of the principles and foundation of the lasting peace that is to follow. It seems as though we have momentarily lost leadership in the diplomatic field because of our silence and inactivity. It is now high time to take a firm and resolute stand and assume the duty, obligation, and responsibility that is ours as the greatest and strongest Nation in the world.

At this stage of the war we are all tired of it. We are irritable, anxious to have it over with. Let us remember that similar conditions toward the close of the last war in a large measure caused us to lose the peace and eventually brought us into the present conflict. We have repeatedly given pledges to our men and women in the services that we will win this war and make certain of a lasting peace. We must make good our vow. We must not let them down. We will have failed in our trust if a generation hence the sons and daughters of these men and women are obliged to go to war again.

It, therefore, appears that it is time that our leaders effectively put into practice the principles upon which and for which we are fighting so that there may no longer be any question in the minds of our allies or our enemies just where we stand. By doing so we will reassure our own people and the people of the entire world of the sincerity of our purpose. We will thereby give them new heart to fight and speed up the day of victory. Further than that we will begin laying the foundation for the peace that is to follow. Our silence during these momentous days and weeks has been accepted as acquiescence. Our silence has dimmed the hopes for freedom of peoples of many lands. With the Nazi propaganda telling these peoples "we told you so" we are undoubtedly the most unpopular Nation in Europe today. It is, therefore, necessary that our country take a firm stand and make its position clear in no uncertain terms. Lasting peace cannot be maintained in a world dominated by any one nation. Collective and individual security requires united action under the leadership of a nation that has no territorial ambitions and enjoys the confidence of the world's peoples. We can assume that leadership when we fulfill our duty and responsibility as the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world.

The need now is not the formulation of a foreign policy. We have that. What we need is an effective and fearless execution and putting into action of that foreign policy which we have repeatedly stated and restated and which our people have continuously and enthusiastically approved.

Gov. Leverett Saltonstall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article written by Floyd Bell which appeared in the March issue of the Bostonian. This is a very readable, human-interest story of the very human, yet forceful Governor of Massachusetts, Hon. Leverett Saltonstall. The article follows:

GOV. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

(By Floyd Bell)

It could be a scene from the next Republican National Convention. Mark this, we say it could be. There comes a time when the balloting is tense, the delegates are tired and worn with the continual bickering, the trading here and there, the smoke-filled rooms.

For many ballots now Massachusetts has called out resonantly "Massachusetts casts 35 votes for Gov. Leverett Saltonstall." Suddenly on this, the twenty-first ballot, there comes an unexpected break. A Southern State whose delegates have been pledged to another candidate have been released from their pledge and like a bolt out of the blue comes their chairman's call, "Florida casts 14 votes for Saltonstall." There's a cheer, it becomes a roar, and the landslide has begun. State after State follows.

That's the picture that could be painted at the next national convention. Bay State folks, the folks back home who know Leverett Saltonstall, still earnestly hope that such a picture may actually be thrown upon the screen.

Long, lanky, lean, and laughing, Leverett Saltonstall is not "another Lincoln" because truth to tell he has more background, more executive ability, more genuine appeal to the masses than Honest Abe ever possessed. Leverett Saltonstall's appeal is to no one section, no class, no party actually, but to Americans who believe in America first, last, all the time, but an America which can never again be permitted to hold aloof from the problems of its neighbors, whether here or across the seas.

He's a strange man and yet a very average one, this Governor of Massachusetts. He is possessed of an innate ability and a native intelligence far beyond the scope of most, yet he is so modest, so self-effacing that it's actually a bit of self-inflicted torture when he consents to pose for a moment in the spotlight of public attention. He has a great deal of boyish appeal about him, this man who stands several inches above 6 feet and whose face bears always the creases of a smile which never quite fades, except on those rare occasions when the Governor knows that he has before him a fakir, or one who does not stick to the truth. Then the smile can be erased, there can be a sternness settle about those closely drawn lips, the twinkle can disappear from the eyes, and it's a brave man who would then venture to attempt to impose upon the intelligence or impugn the motives of His Excellency.

Leverett Saltonstall lives in a house out on Chestnut Hill. In normal times, he is there surrounded by his very lovable family. Evenings, residents of Chestnut Hill and members of nearby Longwood Cricket Club often see the staid Governor of the Commonwealth in collarless disarray, playing baseball with his own or the neighbors' boys and girls. Right now, most of the family have gone to war. But there's still a home there, a home that has the atmosphere not of just another house but of a real New England home.

Out in Dover, a pretty litle suburban district which nestles in the Blue Hills or their foothills, the Governor has his best moments. There is his farm and there he loves to cut weeds, chop wood, run the big mower, help harvest the crops, feed the blooded stock. No gentleman farmer is he, but a very practical—a very thorough—farmer who knows to a penny the profit or loss on each item, yet he has none of the New England characteristics of his friend Calvin Coolidge in hoarding.

Governor Saltonstall is not one of those men who ever could be another Lincoln, nor another anybody else, for this Massachusetts statesman—and he is that—is so individual, so original, that he has built, all unconscious of it, for himself a personality stronger than any of those who have gone before. Here is the type of man one thinks of when reading of the early days of our American history. In Governor Saltonstall one sees the ancestor of colonial days—the man who bore the savagery and the trials of those days and emerged superior to all these—for this man Saltonstall has an iron jaw which discloses at first glance the character, the integrity, and the power of the man. His very appearance signals the strength which is his. Leverett Saltonstall is one of those rare men who dominates any gathering without actually ever intending to do so. Modest to the point of shyness at times, afraid that he will be occupying the spotlight intended for someone else, there are times when this likable, lovable arbiter of Massachusetts policies of the present day is actually * * *.

Leverett Saltonstall is "regular." He walks into a place like the sportsmen's show, for example, and everyone turns to look, not because they know it's the Governor of Massachusetts—for this man is attended by no panoply of servitors, no gathering of the clans to herald his coming—but because the crowd instinctively realizes that a man has appeared.

He reads avidly, likes detective stories, mystery stories of any type, and doesn't lay a book down until he has finished it from "kiver to kiver." Retains well what he reads. Likes the serious stuff, too. Reads essays and biographies but confesses that he likes nothing better than to sit before the radio, when he has the time, and hear Sherlock Holmes or the Shadow do their stuff.

He likes baseball, football, hockey, in fact, all types of sports. He never would be caught posing with a 10-gallon hat and a 10-inch trout, not this Governor, unless he actually had caught the trout. He doesn't believe in subterfuge or dissembling anything anywhere.

He believes in the future of air transportation and wants to see Massachusetts have the greatest airport in the world. He believes, too, in rail and sea transportation, and one of his fondest dreams, one that he expects to come true, is to see a post-war development in which his home town of Boston—for Chestnut Hill really is a part of metropolitan Boston—will come forward as first in transportation, with the greatest outgoing and incoming port facilities in the world.

Never a hide-bound partisan, if he believed that the State could be served best by deviation from such a course, he has not hesitated to name prominent men of the party which opposed him at the polls to high offices, and not in a single instance have they failed to justify his faith and his confidence.

A soldier of the last World War, and a soldier, too, of this one, he, as Governor of the Commonwealth, has had before him greater problems than confront many a military man on the field. Massachusetts was so far in advance of other States in preparedness for this present World War that it seemed almost like another nation for a time. It was Saltonstall who developed, originated, and put into effect the wonderful civilian defense project which the Bay State now enjoys and of which it boasts.

In his office at the State House he is easily approachable, always "at home" to any man or woman who deserves even a moment of his attention. No iron walls nor stone fences are built around his offices, and he is as likely to stalk out into the reception room, with a crowd awaiting, to greet everyone by name as he is to eat dinner tomorrow night. Incidentally that reminds us he likes good food and is not one of those who pretend not to like dinners and good luncheons. He likes nothing better than to sit down at lunch with a friend. But he seldom gets time.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following letter, entitled "Communication," addressed to the editor, Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., by Mr. Everett R. Lawrence, 4 Lewis Street, Andover, Mass.:

ANDOVER, MASS., March 23, 1944.

EDITOR, EVENING TRIBUNE,

Lawrence, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Last Saturday, March 17, you published an article by Roger Babson which I feel deserves criticism that I shall be pleased to have you publish in its entirety as an open letter. As it reads of itself, it has served a harmful rather than a helpful purpose, because the writer generalized too freely and because he has left too much unsaid.

In spite of Mr. Babson's residence in the South for limited periods over 20 years and his belief that he knows the colored people's good and bad points, he does not know as much as he believes. He has not yet learned that the colored man has sense enough not to let him know that he does not know him. He's too diplomatic for that.

I, too, lived in the South for 17 years, and as a colored man. I am convinced that some of these things he has written must be clarified to make intelligent reading.

He speaks of the "utter disregard of their knowledge of finances and economics." Both these scholarly fields have been carefully and continuously closed to him, practically as well as theoretically. The colored man has not had either political, social, or economic justice in the last 300 years, Yet Mr. Babson laments the lack of interest in the war effort at this crucial time, their reluctance to save money, and their "saucy moods."

The fact is that the Negro is not particularly anxious to fight for restoration of the status quo as he has known it. What with discrimination, prejudice, and segregation even in the armed forces, it is of little comfort to him to say things will be worse for him if the Axis win. If he is told tomorrow that he will be granted the privileges of a full-fledged American if he fights for it, this attitude would be entirely different.

Many of the South's 9,000,000 colored have more money now than they have ever had before and they are getting the first chance of their lives to buy what they have always wanted, and more often desperately needed. This taste of partial economic independence has produced a change in them—hence the complaint about "saucy moods."

"Get all the work you can," he says. He did not mention—though he knows—that in many places, men like Tilman, Talmadge, Arnall, Rankin, Dixon, Bilbo, and Ethridge see to it that they positively do not get work. Of 26,904 defense plants in Michigan, 22,042 barred Negroes; of 17,435 in Texas, 9,117 barred Negroes; 56 war plants in St. Louis averaged 3 Negroes each; of 85,000 unskilled jobs, 35,000 were barred to Negroes—and so we might go on.

It is true that many colored people are not good citizens; this would be true if they were of any other color. But the colored man has long been led into corruption because of corruption. He does not in many cases respect law and order because law and order have in many instances shown no respect for him. As an example, while we were trying German saboteurs in our Federal Courts with so much fanfare about fairness, Negroes were being lynched and beaten in Sikeston, Mo. He has taken no interest in the affairs of the Government, because in thousands of places he faces the threat of bodily injury if he tries. It is a matter of but small concern to thousands upon thousands of these people who wins the war. It is a matter of peonage under one and slavery under the other.

As a statistical expert, the writer knows the small number of Negroes trained under the N. Y. A. for defense jobs; the comparatively small amount they received under W. P. A., or any other alphabetical agency; he is acquainted with the discrimination in our Federal departments; the low earning power of the masses in the South; their problems in obtaining work, and the type and restrictions of their labor; their lack of adequate schooling and medical care; their superabundance of poverty with its subsequent despondency, disease, delinquency, and crime. He knows all this and more, yet he says he cannot agree that they are mistreated. Is he kidding?

"This crucial hour," did he say? What will he call it if the members of the so-called colored races—many of whom are more white than colored—rebel against this racial dominance—the people of India, Burma, Malaya, Africa, China, and other nonwhites, including Russia, who boasts that she knows no color problem, and tolerates no racial prejudice? Does he honestly believe this can and will go on forever simply because he refuses to recognize its existence? Can he expect cooperation from a dejected, bitter, mistreated human who has been cheated, and beaten, and lynched? And while the rest of the world looks on, does he hope for hemisphere solidarity, or any other, as long as this type of democracy exists?

Neither do I accept his generalization that most white people are saving their money. Prior to March 15 the cry was simply "I don't know what I'm going to do"; then they cashed in their War bonds and another crisis was met.

Granting that the article was a gesture at friendliness and helpfulness, the author, by his omissions left such a distorted picture of the average Negro in the mind of the reader it would have been better if he had not written anything.

With one thing only do I agree; the colored people should have their money, but everyone else should, too.

Sincerely yours,

EVERETT R. LAWRENCE.

Pertinent Questions on Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 28, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the seventh district Zionist organization, Monday evening, March 27, 1944:

BRITAIN'S ATTITUDE ON PALESTINE ILL BECOMES HER MAGNIFICENT WAR EFFORT AND ACHIEVEMENT

American sentiment coalesces in favor of the opening of the doors of Palestine. Meanwhile opposing forces gather ominously in strength, in seemingly unrelated activities, but, throughout, in bold relief, is clearly revealed the grave pattern of the contemplated dissolution of Palestine as a homeland for the Jewish people.

The proponents for the national homeland in Palestine have advanced logical, unanswerable, indisputable arguments which the anti-Zionist forces cannot challenge. The evidence, in law and in equity, is so clearly in proponderance for the national homeland that the resisting forces must resort to all manner of subterfuge, puppet-pulling maneuvers, and manufactured propaganda to counter the just claim.

Legally, the Balfour Declaration was issued with the full strength of the British Government behind it. The Palestine mandate, incorporating the Balfour Declaration, was ratified internationally by 52 nations. The Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations placed as the primary purpose of the Palestine mandate the establishment of a national homeland for the Jewish people. Indeed, it was the raison d'etre of the mandate. The United States, not being a party to the League of Nations, knew it to be of material significance to enter into a separate treaty with Great Britain in 1924, reiterating therein the Palestine mandate, and agreeing that nobody would be precluded from entering Palestine on the ground of race or religion and that, furthermore, no changes in the terms of the agreement could be made without the consent of both signatories. In 1922, the Congress of the United States had by resolution voiced its approval of the establishment in Palestine of a national homeland for the Jewish people.

One further fact. France, who after the World War had sought eagerly to widen her sphere of influence in the Near and Middle East, refrained from claiming Palestine on the condition only that the mandate be concerned with the establishment of the aforesaid national homeland.

So much for the legal aspect. While the legality of a deed does not, oftimes, justify its existence, here we have justice combined with the spirit of mercy and the letter of the law. Certainly, if no other reason existed today but that of the horror of uprooted, homeless, defenseless European Jewry, that alone should be sufficient impetus to crash down the doors of Palestine. But if that is not enough, let us tell them of how in reliance on the word of England, the Jews of the world since 1917 by the amassing of dimes, pennies and quarters redeemed the land of this small country, rehabilitating thousands of refugees, created over 200 new industries, built the Hebrew University, the finest of its kind in all of the East, developed the Medical Center through Hadassah, contributing its science and skills to the war effort of the Allied nations. From the marshes sprung colonies, towns, cities, modern and progressive. Agriculture and industry flourished. Little children that the rest of the world forgot were given new life and new dignity through the work of Youth Aliyah in Palestine. And if England would but pay heed to what Lord Wedgewood said, it would not talk so glibly (in the face of its own past imperialistic activity) of the Jew replacing the Arab. Lord Wedgewood said:

"The Jews of all the world have done their part nobly in Palestine. Five hundred thousand of the best intelligence and morality have converted a wilderness into a garden. For the first time in history colonists from a higher civilization have neither robbed nor exploited nor exterminated the wilder native race. The Aztecs and Incas of Mexico and Peru, the Redskins on the Great Lakes of North America, the aborigines of Australia and Tasmania, the Hottentots and Kaffirs of South Africa—all have been enslaved or exploited and gradually exterminated. Wherever settlers have come, they have taken the land by force or fraud under the plea of necessity and expediency. Only the Jews of Palestine have paid for barren lands at a blackmail price and labored to make such lands productive."

The MacDonald white paper of 1939 continues in force and effect. After the 20,000-odd certificates of entrance are exhausted, all doors will be officially barred to the stricken Jewish people of Europe, even Palestine which is historically, legally, and equitably theirs, which is theirs by right of labor and loyalty, which is theirs by reason of humanity.

It is well to examine into the alleged causes for the maintenance of the policy of the white paper. What makes this betrayal of Palestine so firm that neither official Washington nor Great Britain dare reveal it for what it is and confine it to the dust heap, together with other great blunders of that period, such as the Munich pact? Let's examine them one by one carefully and without prejudice.

1. We cannot permit, we are told, untrammeled Jewish immigration into Palestine because of the limited absorptive capacity of Palestine. Nonsense. All experts agree, including Walter Clay Lowdermilk of the United States Soil Conservation Service, that Palestine can absorb 4,000,000 additional people, including, mind you, the 1,500,000 Jews and Arabs already there. Absorptive capacity depends not upon the measurement of square miles, but the intensive cultivation of the land, the development of water and electric power, the industries that can be established. The successful colonization, thus far, by the Jews of Palestine have proven that no fears need be had in that direction. Not only has Palestine within the past 25 years seen the settlement of almost half a million Jews, but the doubling of the Arab population in the same period, this despite the fact that a quarter of a century ago the same old "absorptive capacity" bugbear was pulled out of a hat and flung at the people. Palestine has skilled engineers, technicians, colonists determined and intrepid in face of all opposition of politics, soil, and space. Sir Charles Warren as early as 1875 stated: "Give Palestine a good government and increase the commercial life of the people and they may increase tenfold and yet there is room * * * it may be said that the more people it contains, the more it may accept. Its productiveness will increase in proportion to labor bestowed on the soil until a population of 15,000,000 may be accommodated there."

2. Palestine is the stumbling block to Arab unity. Nonsense, again. Palestine is 10,429 square miles, about the size of Vermont. The Arabian world is 7,000,000 square miles. A belief in the mirage that was and is pan-Arabian union had long been assiduously fostered and nurtured and offered as a palatable dish to the Arabs by the British Colonial Office, which had all the while been aware of the impossibility of achievement. It was but another manifestation of British colonial policy of obscuring the issue under the pretense of sympathy in order to continue in control.

The British Colonial Office knew as well as did all other mandatory powers in the east that the rival jealousies, the mores and schisms inherent in the tribal lives of Arabia would halt any endeavor to consummate a real Arabic alliance. It is obvious that no encouragement for such a union would have been given by Great Britain had she for a moment believed that it would come to pass. Lawrence of Arabia's words are not unknown to the erudite British Colonial Office. He said, "The Arab-speaking peoples are as diverse as the English speaking and equally distinct. From Morocco to Mesopotamia is as far spiritually as from San Francisco to Aberdeen. Further, there is a world between the Bedouin of Azrak and the peasant of Amman, though the journey is only 50 miles. Only a criminal would wish to make them all alike. When people talk of Arab confederations or empires, they talk fantastically. The nearest approach to an Arab empire at present is Ibn Saud's. It is a figment built on sand. Nothing static will rise in the desert, which has seen hundreds of such tyrannies as his, all cemented with blood. It will pass."

Does the British Colonial Office actually believe that Ibn Saud will consent to give up part of his sovereignty to unite with chieftains, emirs, and pashas of lesser power? Will the nomads unite with the soil tillers? It is absurd to speak of Palestine as the sore thumb on the hand of unity. Such a statement strains our credulity to the breaking point.

3. Then we are told we must win the friendship of the Arabs and cause no military disturbance in the Near East lest we impede the progress of the war. Appease and appease and the result is blackmail. In 1939, following the pattern of Munich, Great Britain promulgated the white paper. The British Foreign Office, thus, was high in glee. They had bought the friendship of the Arabs. But what did actually happen? The hostility of the Arabian leaders to the allied cause was no secret, when Hitler's victory seemed imminent. Iraq had to be beaten into submission the Egyptian prime minister was caught betraying British military secrets to the Axis; the grand mufti of Jerusalem fled to Berlin to continue his nefarious activities of pro-Axis propaganda. All the while, the Jewish Palestine produced, worked, fought and bled in the Allied cause. The Jews did not have to be paid for a dubious, to say the least, loyalty. They were firm, unbending, in their determination for an Allied victory. Among many, one bitter indictment against Britain's policy cannot be left aside.

On the British island of Mauritius, 1,400 Jewish refugees have been interned by deed of the British colonial administration in Palestine. Even in these dark days of death and ravage, this callous, brutal evidence of the British colonial office's indifference to the suffering of the helpless and martyred, cuts like a lash.

Out of Festung Europa, those now interned had fled, seeking life and dignity. Their long, bitter journey led them to Palestine where they thought they would be safe and where they could find welcome in the national homeland. On the steamship Patria, 1,900 helpless Jews off the coast of Palestine pleaded for admission. Admission was denied. The steamship Patria exploded and out of the 1,900, 150 survived. Some of the survivors were deported to the island. Others are survivors of the ill-fated steamship Atlantic who, likewise, were denied admission into Palestine. Others are those who were herded out of Palestine because in their desperate plight, when each moment meant the difference between life and death, had entered Palestine without stopping to secure a certificate of entrance. Like Moses at Nebo, they could see but did not enter the Promised Land.

It must be kept in mind that even under the base policy of the Chamberlain-MacDonald white paper which limited the entry of Jews into Palestine there remain some 20,000 entrance certificates still unused. Even within the framework of the strangling colonial policy of Britain, those victims of the steamship Patria, the steamship Atlantic, could have been saved; and thousands more, seeking refuge from the Nazi butchers, could have begun their shattered lives anew in Palestine.

Now they languish in malaria-infested, lice-ridden Mauritius where cholera and dysentery abide, within the shadow of its leprosarium. What is their guilt that they are so stricken?

In the name of decency, of common humanity, why are they left on this devil's island? Why are British and American officialdom silent? Neither the British colonial office nor our State Department can fall back on the excuse of military expedience. The island of Mauritius is in the Indian Ocean, far removed from all lines of military communication. Ships can readily be availed of to take these victims of Britain's colonial inhumanity to Palestine.

Our State Department has a glorious opportunity to serve the best humanitarian instincts of our country. The British colonial office must reverse its previous stand. It must prove that it is strong enough and sufficiently mature to admit and right the great wrong it has done.

The interned in their hopelessness and helplessness have just proclaimed a day of fasting and have stopped work as their only means of protest. They cannot go unanswered. Palestine must be opened to them. The State Department can act on the authority of our treaty with Great Britain in 1924, wherein it was specifically agreed that no one shall be barred from Palestine on the ground of race or religion. This is our test of sincerity.

"Honest and sincere criticism among the Allies," said Brendan Bracken, British Minister of Information, "even during the heat of war are not out of place. Fair criticism is the life of democracy." Thus, it is no contradiction, nor is it in any sense insincere, to say that I yield to no man in my admiration for the British men and women and their magnificent efforts in this tremendous crisis. The common man in England has performed heroically the superhuman tasks occasioned by the greatest scourge in civilized history. I repeat my avowal of admiration for England's saintly sacrifices. Certainly, it is not my purpose to drive a wedge between two great Allies. We cannot, however, overlook a wrong, even more so when we are fighting side by side to crush the forces of evil.

With the introduction of the Wright-Compton resolution into the House of Representatives and the Taft-Wagner resolution in the Senate which reiterates the congressional approval of the homeland of 1922 and which demands the abrogation of the MacDonald white paper, widespread hope was born. But behind the closed doors of committees Secretary of War Stimson and General Marshall gave testimony opposing the passage of the resolution. Military expediency must rule, they said. But I say the situation in Palestine is purely political.

In due deference to the military I fail to see how passage of the resolution can affect the progress of the war. Our lines of combat and supply have nothing to do with Palestine. We are in absolute control of the southern and western shores of the Mediterranean. Once before the excuse of "military expediency" was used as a stopgap in the unjust abrogation of the Cremieux decree in Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco following Allied victory. Those of us who protested to our State Department for this unwarranted, illegal flaunting of the very purposes for which we fight this war were told, "Now, behave; military expediency, you know. We must not disturb the Arabs." But with the formation of the National Committee for French Liberation the decree of abrogation was set aside and the Cremieux decree of 1870 was reestablished. Did we witness then any Arab revolt? Did the restoration of the Cremieux decree result in Arab uprising, in foment and disorder? Certainly not. Witness again the recent statement of President Roosevelt concerning the white paper wherein he stated that the American Government had never given its approval to the white paper, and that "when future decisions are reached, full justice will be done to those who seek a Jewish national home." Is not such a statement tantamount to a passage of at least one-half of the proposed resolutions? Did Arab-land flame into revolt? Was there any necessity to divert any of our forces from other plans? Certainly not. The calm prevails. But we are told to hush-hush lest the lullabied Arabs rise in wrath from their sleep. That in one breath and in the other from the White House comes the statement, "The white paper has never been accepted." What is this—a merry-go-round?

We were not at war in 1939 and the State Department, though armed with the authority of the Anglo-American Treaty of 1924, did not protest. Today we are at war and the State Department still is silent. Was its silence justified then or justified now? Was it wrong then or wrong now?

I suggest that in the interest of all parties, it might be well—indeed, I deem it essential, that a select group of interested Congressmen gather in the committee room of the House Foreign Affairs and be permitted to question General Marshall. There is much fog to dispel. What is military expediency? What is its relation to Palestine? Who, if anybody, in the State Department has spoken to the general? These are some of the pertinent questions that need answering, and need answering badly, if justice is to be done and a wrong righted.

Even when it comes to the military authorities, Congress must not be spineless nor put blinders on its eyes, plugs in its ears, and gags in its mouths. Nobody questions the need for military expediency, or national security, and all the clichés that come to the minds of generals when defending a position or other, but it must be crystal clear that such military expediency is essential and that such national security is actually involved. General Marshall not so long ago appeared in camera, in executive session and explained in detail the military situation to the Members of Congress. Why should he not come before a segment of the House, before those Members who are interested in the question of Palestine, and give his reasons for his conclusions.

In all this, it is not my purpose to question unduly the authority of the military, but, nonetheless, we have a right to be informed so that our mental processes might not be bogged down with mere phrases like "military necessity" or "national security." They must be meaningful. They should not be mere words.

President Roosevelt, however, came smack to the point.

The President's statement concerning the plight of the victims of Hitler's outrages which emphasizes the acute need for immediate action of rescue and the threat of punishment to all who aid in committing the outrages was a ray of light in the darkness surrounding these unhappy people. He has called upon the "free peoples of Europe and Asia temporarily to open frontiers to all victims of oppression." His appointment of John W. Pehle, previously acting executive director, to full directorship of the War Refuge Board reveals his determination to stand by his statement.

In the strongest language he has used to date, President Roosevelt characterized the brutal massacre of Jews as "one of the blackest crimes of all history." Casting back a few days ago to President Roosevelt's earlier statement that the MacDonald white paper has never been accepted by the United States and coupling such statement with his humane pronouncement of Friday it appears evident that Mr. Roosevelt had Palestine as one of the "frontiers" in mind. Indeed, what "free peoples of Europe and Asia" can better insure welcome to and absorption of refugees than Palestine?

Close to a million Jewish lives are imperiled in Hungary and double that number in all the Balkans. The scene in Hungary is already one of despair. Nazi propaganda boasts that over a million Jews will disappear from the economic and political life of the country. Already thousands of Jews have been arrested by the Gestapo. They are being thrust into concentration camps, cesspools like Ersekuyver, Ipolysag, and Fuelek. Others are being deported to Poland for extermination in gas chambers or forced to labor in the Upper Silesian coal mines. All highways are choked with fleeing Jewish men, women, and children. They are mown down by machine guns. There are instances where refugees are being used as spearheads for advancing troops.

The tragedy is all the weightier when we consider that the Jewish Agency in Palestine reports that thousands and thousands of Jews could have been saved if the doors of Palestine had been open. President Roosevelt's appeal must surely act to crack the brutal indifference of the British colonial administration in Palestine to human suffering.

But what are the reasons, the real ones, not the obscuring makeshift statements, that lie behind the opposition to the opening of the doors of Palestine? It does not take an astute mind to see the hand of the British Colonial Office throughout. The Near East land is too strategic to lose; the experiment in Palestine was too successful beyond wildest dreams. As a mandatory power, Great Britain can retain control. A national homeland will weaken that control. The position of the Near East at the crossroads between three great continents and the existence of vast oil fields and certain other materials vital to modern industry make control of Palestine a most desirable object for foreign domination and rivalry.

It is a known fact that the development in Palestine has resulted in the highest standard of living in the Near East, for Jew and Arab alike. Further development might so raise the standard of living that the miserable pittance which is the Arab's pay might of necessity be raised. While that would suit the Arab fellaheen or peasant, this cannot be to the liking of the effendi, the emirs and pashas, the absentee landlords who for so long have thrived on the unrewarded toil of their lowly subjects.

We come now to the subject of oil in the Near East which has furnished of late much talk in the newspapers and on the radio. How well is the American oil man set up in this Middle Eastern oil field? He is set up in the vast Saudi-Arabian concession owned by Standard Oil of California and the Texas Co., in the Kuwait concession, half of which is owned by Gulf Oil, and in the Iraq Petroleum Co. Through the California-Arabian Oil Co., the Standard Oil Co., and Texas Oil Co. have received concessions from King Ibn Saud of one-quarter million square miles. Ibn Saud has made no secret of his distaste for a national homeland. Such a homeland threatens his control of subjects who envy the Palestinian Arabs their way of life; it threatens his reputation as a progressive empire. Might not American oil interests be interested in using Palestine for baksheesh or bribe to curry favor of King and Conqueror Ibn Saud.

Ibn Saud on the radio last Saturday night a week ago said the President's statement to Drs. Wise and Silver wherein he stated that the United States had never accepted the white paper was a stab in the back. Which only proves that no matter what we do for the man he is insatiable. We have given him lend-lease. We have given him 20,000,000 ounces of silver for coinage purposes. We have given him guns and rifles. Lord knows to what purpose the guns and rifles would be put. Will they be used to attack the Jews as was the case in the pogroms of 1921, 1929, 1936, and 1939? May I respectfully urge that the Jews of Palestine, that is, the Representative Jewish Agency, be given rifles and guns as well. What is Ibn Saud going to do with these weapons? He is not threatened in any way by any foreign power.

I would like to ask why Palestine as a national homeland for the Jewish people is being liquidated by the British and with our connivance? Why have we given lend-lease aid to Ibn Saud? Lend-lease was primarily intended for those who had aided in the conduct of the war. While the Allies were in the death throes and Rommel stood at the gates of Alexandria, while the jugular vein of British communication lines (Suez) was in serious jeopardy, Ibn Saud couldn't spare a camel or a donkey for the Allied cause. After giving him all that baksheesh (bribe), he now calls Roosevelt's statement a stab in the back. That is indeed biting the hand that feeds him. "Appease a rascal as you will; he was and is a rascal still."

I think it is high time I asked some very pertinent questions:

1. What part did Ralph K. Davies, vice president and director of the Standard Oil Co., receiving an annual salary of $47,000 a year, and now Assistant Petroleum Administrator for War at an additional salary of $10,000 per year, play in the granting of such concessions and in the agreement of our Government's participation in the oil of Saudi-Arabia to the extent of payment of $25,000,000 to the royal household?

2. What part did Brig. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley play in selling Palestine for oil? How does his pronounced opposition to the national homeland tie in with the fact that General Hurley may have been, and may yet be, general counsel of the Sinclair Oil Co.? How well has he served his mission in the Near East?

3. What part did Max Thornberg as Petroleum Adviser to the Secretary of State play in the negotiations for the granting of the oil concessions to the California-Arabian Standard Oil Co? What relation exists, if any, between the fact that Mr. Max Thornberg is Vice President of the Standard Oil Co. of California and up to about a year ago was Petroleum Adviser to the Secretary of State?

I'd like to ask as well:

1. How great is the influence of Col. Harold B. Hoskins of the Near Eastern Division of the State Department who was born in Beirut and is politically a Syrian nationalist? Why did he take the pains to circulate confidentially among Congressmen his views after his return from the Near East on a special mission of inquiry? How impartial is he and how close to justice has he been in his opposition to the national homeland for the Jews in Palestine?

I'd also like to know:

Who pays Freya Stark for her pro-Arab propaganda in the United States? Is she or is she not on the payroll of the British Ministry of Information? We have a right to know from what source any propaganda flows?

And will somebody tell me who is this George Murray who writes for the trans-Atlantic edition of the London Daily Mail? Why in his outbursts does he dwell only and exclusively on the Arab claims, leaving out of his columns any picture that might possibly augment the cause of Zionism? Who has robbed him of his objectivity?

We will and must get behind the scenes of these public-shy governors of human destiny. Who are these that they shall outrage the canons of honor and condemn a defenseless people to death and degradation?

Brazil: Our Good Neighbor and Good Friend

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, the welcome presence in the United States of the distinguished statesman, Senhor Valentim Boucas, economic adviser to President Getulio Vargas and head of the Inter-American Development Commission's Brazilian board, recalls once again Brazil's vital role in the fight for freedom.

Brazil's notable accomplishments in peace and war need no recounting here. For years you and I and other liberty-loving peoples have followed with considerable interest the progress and achievements of our great sister republic. The largest country in South America in area and in population, this fabulously endowed nation of abundant raw materials has truly lived up to her obligations as a champion of inter-American unity and cooperation.

Our friendly associations with able Ambassador Carlos Martins, who has long represented his country in the National Capital, and our fruitful discussions with Foreign Minister Oswaldo Aranha, one of the New World's most brilliant and farseeing statesmen, have contributed much to the well-being of the two largest hemisphere republics.

The Congress and the citizens of the United States also have had the distinct pleasure of meeting and knowing many of Brazil's leaders in the war effort. During the past few months, for example, several of them have come to this country to witness our vastly expanded production; to inspect military and naval installations, and to obtain at first-hand, the inspiring story of a democracy at war.

Outstanding Brazilians who recently journeyed north to see a united America Back the Attack have included Maj. Gen. Eurico Gaspar Dutra, Brazil's Minister of War; Dr. Joaquim Pedro Salgado, Brazilian Air Minister; Dr. Alfredo Pessoa, head of the Brazilian Department of Information; Dr. Luthero Vargas, the President's son and charming Anesia Pinheiro Machado, Brazil's noted aviatrix. And now we have Senhor Boucas.

These visits to the United States—and they are only typical of scores of others by distinguished scholars, educators, journalists, scientists, technicians, medical experts, and graduate students—have enabled us to learn more about the American republics.

But even if we had not had the pleasure of meeting a single guest from Brazil, which would be most lamentable, we would have been fully cognizant of our neighbor's role in the war.

Her actions on behalf of freedom; her measures to further continental solidarity; her war record against our common enemies have been heralded by fighters for liberty everywhere.

That total effort has well merited the honor, respect, and admiration of all who wage the battle against aggression; of all who challenge Nazi ruthlessness and Nazi treachery on land, on sea, and in the air.

Long before Brazil declared war on Germany, after the wanton destruction of her merchant ships and the loss of lives, she had taken an active part in defense of the hemisphere.

In conference after conference; in Lima, Panama, Havana; in discussions at the Pan American Union; in informal meetings in joint boards and commissions, she eagerly conferred with delegates of the other American republics—and with our leaders in the White House and State Department and Congress—to map out coordinated plans for mutual assistance and for mutual cooperation.

I need not remind the Members of this House of Representatives of Brazil's actions at the history-making meeting of foreign ministers of the American republics at Rio de Janeiro a little more than 2 years ago. Then, as now, President Vargas and the Brazilian government and people proved in deeds their wholehearted support of the cause of inter-American collaboration.

Since January 1942 Brazil has constantly implemented the far-reaching resolutions of that conference.

She placed strategic bases at the disposal of the United Nations. She pledged full resources in manpower and materials. She rounded up Axis spies, saboteurs, and foreign agents.

Her armed forces have collaborated with those of the United States and the other American republics in smashing Nazi U-boats, patrolling long coast lines, and safeguarding vital invasion routes to Europe and Africa. Today her airmen are preparing for action overseas. Many of her aviation cadets are in training at United States Army Air Forces fields and schools, learning and studying with United States youths to become pilots, bombardiers, navigators, gunners, aeronautical engineers, and for other important tasks.

Her home front workers are speeding guns, ships, planes, motors, tanks, and other weapons of victory. No less important are their economic contributions. Brazil is sending us an ever-increasing supply of rubber, chrome, industrial diamonds, quartz crystals, manganese, vegetable oils, and other critical materials.

I am happy to add that the most prized, and the most sought for, and the rarest mineral—the war-vital material with the highest priority rating—also comes from our good neighbor, Brazil.

That strategic pitch-black material is called "tantalite."

Some experts praise it as the "new black gold of the United Nations' war effort," for tantalum, the metal derived from tantalite, gives power and range to United Nations war weapons.

The exact uses of this natural resource with the A-1-a priority rating are, of course, highly guarded military secrets. But I can assure you that the Allied war effort needs tantalite, and needs it badly. It is of the utmost importance that sufficient quantities of this critical material arrive in our war plants, and, indeed, in war plants throughout the United Nations.

Brazil is meeting those goals. Brazil is going all-out for tantalite.

In a wide area of 3,600 square miles in the States of Paraiba and Rio Grande do Norte, more than 8,000 workers—aided by United States technical assistance and mining equipment—are toiling beneath the hot Brazilian sun to win this battle of production.

True to the spirit of pioneers, the workers are waging a dogged up-hill battle against nature and the elements, and are overcoming the greatest possible handicaps to mine this rare, precious metal of victory.

More than 400 mines now are in operation in Brazil, despite the fact that an estimated 3,000 tons of rock must be mined to get 1 ton of tantalite, and it takes one man 130 days to crush, wash, and prepare a single ton of ore for shipment.

These multifold difficulties long ago would have discouraged a less sturdy people. But not Brazilians. They have pledged their total resources—men and mines and brains and brawn—for liberty. And Brazil's 1944 production of tantalite, I'm proud to announce, is expected to be double that of last year.

By an agreement with the Brazilian Government, the United States Purchasing Commission of the former Board of Economic Warfare, now a part of the United States Foreign Economic Administration, buys all of Brazil's tantalite output and aids in the development of the mines.

The battle of production is evident in all stages, from the exhaustive search for the rare mineral until its final shipment to the United States.

Once or twice a week, I'm told, the Brazilian miners gather together their tantalite ore, pack it on burroback, and set off for the nearest town, where dealers weigh the mineral and judge its quality. These dealers, in turn, ship the ore by truck to the town of Campina Grande, where it is graded, washed, sundried, and bagged.

The last step in the tantalite cycle in Brazil takes place at the great Parnamirim air field in Natal, where the vital material is loaded aboard United States planes and rushed to war plants in this country.

The little-known story of tantalite is only one of many which Senhor Boucas can tell you about Brazil's role in the war effort.

There are more. Many more. Brazil's development of the rubber areas in the Amazon River Valley; her vast industrial development, including the establishment of the United States-aided National Steel Mill at Volta Redonda and other important manufacturing facilities; the cooperative United States-Brazilian airplane and motor factories; the cooperative health and sanitation program; and other United States-Brazilian joint projects will outlast the war. They will be lasting evidences of our mutual friendship and cooperation.

The 2-months visit of Senhor Boucas to the United States has been a happy event for me and for others who have witnessed the growing development of amicable relations between these two great republics. When I meet the distinguished statesman and economist, I shall say, "Senhor Boucas, I am proud indeed to shake the hand of one who symbolizes the true spirit of Brazil today. For Brazil is our good neighbor and good friend."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I presented to the House a portion of a letter recently received by Mr. W. L. White, Sr., 181 Madison Avenue, Clifton, N. J., in my district, from his son, Sgt. W. L. White, Jr., who described himself as a freckle-faced tail gunner on a Martin Marauder bomber B-26 somewhere in England. The letter described a bombing raid over the Continent and vividly portrayed the character of our men who fly on these rather tough assignments.

Today I present, in full, copy of a letter written by Sergeant White to the father of a young Kansas farm boy whom Sergeant White saw killed in action in a mission over France.

The letter follows:

DEAR MR. BROWN: You have just received that ominous message, "The War Department regrets to inform you * * *." We, his buddies, will feel better if we can pass on to you a sincere heartfelt tribute, it comes from down deep. This is not a requiem, this is a salute.

We knew Jake as only men who live and fight and die together know each other. On the records he was just another 22-year-old boy. In the Air Force he was just another top gunner, and a good one; but on a farm in Kansas, he was your son and in our barracks he was a respected comrade, friend, and fellow-in-arms.

He talked a lot about you, Mr. Brown. He always called you "Daddy." The first time he referred to you as "Daddy" someone snickered. Jake never said a word, but just quietly drew that burly frame of his to its full height and looked—just looked. No one ever grinned again. In fact we sort of developed a silent pride in the fact and the way he said "Daddy." We loved to hear him say it.

One time someone called him a "plow jockey." We rather expected he might resent it, but he didn't. He just spoke slow and easy-like, not to anyone in particular: "Yep; I guess I am a 'plow jockey.' Maybe I am better fitted to be a farmer than anything else. You see, I love the smell of dirt, fresh dirt, damp—smelling of God's own perfume." There's just got to be farmers, and we could see in his eyes the rolling prairies of golden-haired wheat; we could see the sun shining down on those fields of his, warming and giving life to sod and seed. Yes; we could even smell "God's own perfume." We envied Jake Brown.

We've had some pretty rough missions. A common catch phrase, after a tough one is: "Boy, they made a Christian out of me that time." Someone said, "How about you, Jake?" He just grinned (you know that grin, like a door slowly opening wide to a world full of sunshine); then slowly he drawled, "Yes, God was there and that helped, but shucks, I always was a Christian. My daddy taught me that."

A frequent topic of conversation in the barracks is "Why are we fighting?" You know the boys are rather touchy on this subject, they just have to talk about it but they never say what they really think. They cover up and say: "Me? I was drafted and it took 6 strong men to drag me away." But Jake was different; he simply told us what he thought, as we knew he would. "Why, I enlisted," he said. "You see it's like this, I've got a brother, a little bitty kid with a lot of curly hair and freckles. One time I saw that kid get burned with a hot iron. It was a nasty burn and it left a long slick scar. He didn't cry, not that kid, but there was something in his face, part pain, part scaredness and part, well, with his big eyes he was asking me why I let that hot iron burn him. I never forgot that. I don't want that kid to ever look at me like that again. I know I am only one, a plow-jockey at that, but I guess I better do what I can do to stop a couple of guys, who don't mind seeing kids get burned." This was a pretty long speech for Jake, we expected him to sit down, but he didn't. He just kept walking up and down rumpling up his curly hair with his big hand and kept on, almost as if he were talking to himself. "Every soldier talks about his mother, best mother in the world, but somehow my mom is different; dad, he is big like me, but mom, she's little, she's got the whitest hair you ever did see. She's got the nicest hands, tiny little hands, seems almost too small for farm work. They are kind of red and gnarled but they are the gentlest hands. Honest fellows, she's awfully sweet. I just couldn't think of my mom keeping house for a bunch of iron-heeled Jerries. Not my mom (and a big tear trickled down his cheek, he blew his nose and blustered around a bit, we waited, and he went on). I guess I'm always shooting off my mouth about daddy. You guys would like my daddy; he ain't so young any more but he will never be old, you see, he thinks young. My daddy's stout—I don't mean fat, he's stout inside—he's big, he has a big heart. The way I figure it out, the bigger the heart, the bigger the heart break. I wouldn't break my daddy's heart, not for the whole of God's world—not my daddy's heart."

He said all this very simply, Mr. Brown. We loved him for that. You see he easily and simply said what we would like to have said but couldn't find the words.

I was on the same mission with Jake; I guess you would like to know about it. When I first noticed that Jake's ship was in trouble they were beginning to lag behind. One engine seemed to be smoking, then the other one conked and the ship went into a fast flat spin. The Jerry fighters dove in for the kill. They didn't have it too easy, for the "Spits" were intercepting; but the Jerry fighters kept coming in. I am a tail-gunner and I kept watching Jake's ship as she spun down, down. Suddenly I saw her pull out and level off for a few seconds and out popped the parachutes, all at once. I saw a Jerry fighter explode and another slide off smoking badly; it was odd, because at that moment the "Spits" were not near. Then I saw the top turret slowly revolving, spitting tracers from its twin guns.

Jake was still in that ship. He never thought of jumping when his comrades in chutes needed protection and he had two guns in his hands that would shoot. When his ship hit the ground, it sort of spread out, shivered, seemed to hold her breath for a minute then blew up. It seemed that in that last final gasp she said: "Jake Brown, you and I have fought a good fight, we have finished our course, we have kept the faith."

Mr. Brown, we are not weeping, we are proudly saluting Jake Brown, your son, our comrade. We would like to salute you, too, Mr. Brown. It was the teaching guidance and inspiration of a daddy who "thinks young" that made Jake great.

Bomb group No. 323: Attention!

Mr. Brown and every daddy who receives "The War Department regrets to inform you * * *", we salute you.

Public Health Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received from the Medical Society of the State of New York and my reply to the letter:

LEGISLATIVE BUREAU AND EXECUTIVE OFFICER, MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, N. Y., March 27, 1944.

The Honorable MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are informed that there is pending before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill to codify the laws of the United States Public Health Service—H. R. 3379.

The osteopaths are urging that there be incorporated in the bill provision for the appointment of osteopaths as commissioned medical officers of the United States Public Health Service. In New York State we have, through process of elimination, finally raised the standards of the osteopaths to almost the equal of the educational standards required of physicians. There is only one school of osteopathy that is now recognized by New York State, and that is the Philadelphia school. There are a number of other schools that are turning out men with very inferior educational qualifications and we certainly believe that it would not be in the interest of the public of the United States to have such men commissioned as medical officers of the United States Public Health Service.

We know that you shared this point of view some time ago and we hope that you are still of the same mind. The portion of the bill which we believe is particularly undesirable is found on page 18, lines 15 to 17, inclusive, which read: "No regulation relating to qualifications for appointment of medical officers or employees shall give preference to any school of medicine." Of course, this could be interpreted as authorizing the appointment of chiropractors as commissioned officers of the United States Public Health Service.

If you think of anything else we can do to help prevent the inclusion of this or such provision, I should be very grateful to you for your suggestion.

With kindest regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

JOS. S. LAWRENCE, M. D.,
Executive Officer.

MARCH 29, 1944.

MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, N. Y.

(Attention Joseph S. Lawrence, M. D., executive officer.)

DEAR SIRS: I wish to acknowledge your letter of March 27 concerning H. R. 3379, a bill now pending before my committee. The stated purpose of this legislation is to consolidate and revise the laws relating to the Public Health Service.

As you know, I have always taken an active interest in legislation of this character both at the State Capital in Albany and here in Washington. As a result of my long association with the local school board and my work in the field of housing, child care, and public health, I have given close attention and intense study to the bill, H. R. 3379.

As a member of the Senate of the State of New York from 1924 to 1930, I acted as chairman of the Public Health Committee. During those years I had the assignment of preparing the legislation, presiding at the public hearings and presenting the bills from the Public Health Committee to the Senate.

It was my privilege to have sponsored and to have seen enacted into law most of the constructive and progressive legislation on the subject of Public Health. This legislation is now part of the existing law of the State of New York.

Today, after 20 years of legislative experience and knowledge of public health problems, I am determined that there shall be no further tampering with these laws which were framed so carefully to guard the health and general welfare of our citizens.

As one member of the committee, I assure you and the people of New York that I shall continue my fight to maintain and advance the requirements for appointment as a medical officer. In my opinion, changing the present law, especially in the manner suggested, by H. R. 3379, would be grossly unfair to every boy and girl wearing the military uniform of our country.

As my efforts in public life have been devoted to obtaining better homes, improved working conditions, and higher standards of living for my constituents, I realize that in order to perpetuate these gains, the State and the Nation must insist upon and furnish the best equipped and most thoroughly trained men and women in all branches of medicine, especially in the Public Health Service. Any lowering of professional requirements, any compromise of basic training would, I feel sure, spell ruin to the work and accomplishments of the past quarter century in the vital sphere of public welfare and health.

Because of these reasons, I shall do everything possible to keep our present laws intact and free from harmful amendments.

Very truly yours,

MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
Member of Congress.

Farm Labor Deferments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter from very reputable and sound farmers in Cambria County, Pa. Knowing these people as I do, I can vouch for their soundness in problems pertaining to agriculture for which they are well qualified through years of experience and learning to discuss. The subject matter is of very vital importance to our Nation.

EBENSBURG, PA., March 22, 1944.

MR. HARVE TIBBOTT,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We farmers of Cambria County, Pa., wish to call your attention to the fact that Selective Service System headed by Gen. Louis B. Hershey has recently issued a directive to local draft boards which, we believe, is unfair to the people of the eastern United States. We refer to order No. 164 of February 14, 1944. By this order the minimum requirements for a farm laborer's deferment has been raised from 8 war units to 16 war units per man. The objection to this change is twofold:

First, the war units are still computed without consideration for the relative amount of work required to produce a war unit by different methods. For example; it is possible for a man to feed, milk, and care for 16 head of dairy cattle thereby producing his 16 war units of production and being eligible for deferment on those grounds. However, feed must be produced for those cattle and war units are also computed for feed production. The man who is raising the feed crops would have to produce on the average the following acreages of hay and grain to earn his 16 war units to be deferred (divided evenly between the four types of credit allowed for feed crops under the war units schedule):

Corn, 4 units, 20 acres.
Hay, 4 units, 40 acres.
Oats, 4 units, 60 acres.
Wheat, 4 units, 80 acres.
Total, 16 units, 200 acres.

All this is required for the deferment of one man, but actually it represents more work than any three men could do with the type of machinery available in this section of the country.

Likewise, the war units allowed for vegetables is not sufficient for the manpower needed in their production. The best agricultural authorities say that one man cannot care for more than 3 acres of vegetables. According to present selective-service regulations, 1 acre of vegetables is rated at one unit. A vegetable grower would therefore have to care for 16 acres of vegetables to earn deferment. This is an impossibility in this section where vegetables are grown for fresh consumption. The loss of these vegetable growers in this heavily populated section of the country would be a serious blow to the food supply here.

A second objection to the recent directive is that under former eight-unit minimum it was possible for draft boards to grant deferments where a registrant was producing at capacity and doing a good job. Now, however, a registrant must produce at least "16 war units by his own efforts." This, in spite of the fact that according to statistics supplied by the Federal Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the average number of war units produced in 1943 throughout the New England, Atlantic, and South Central States was less than 10 per man.

The unbalanced condition between war units allowed for livestock and those allowed for field crops will have the result of taking many necessary men from the farms of Pennsylvania and neighboring States where the same general conditions apply.

Our specific recommendation would be that the conversion table for converting crop acres to war units be revised sufficiently to make it possible for the producer to earn deferment when they are producing necessary feeds in quantity. Until this revision is made there should be no requirement that 16 war units be produced in every case, because that is impossible for feed growers, as we have shown.

If this revision in the war-unit schedule is not made, the effect will be to defer those men engaged in the care of livestock but not those who are growing the feed crops. The immediate result of such a policy would be that many of our farms would shut down completely or reduce to the capacity of those employables remaining on them, because it is not possible to keep livestock without growing a substantial part of its feed on the farm.

The local draft boards began to reclassify those registrants who were deferred in agriculture, and if these first reclassifications are a true indication of the severity of the new regulations, then approximately one-half of previously deferred farm labor will be drafted in some areas.

As we see the problem, it is a question of whether the Government wants food or doesn't want food. If food is not a serious consideration, then the present selective-service regulations will surely reduce production very rapidly. If food is really essential, then young farmers who have been doing a good job producing it should be kept on the farms by making the required number of war units conform to what a man is able to do.

We hope that you are able to bring these views to the attention of selective service and to the attention of such other officials as may be unaware of the effect of the new selective service regulations.

War Housing Projects of the Federal Public Housing Authority in New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

NATIONAL HOUSING AGENCY,
FEDERAL PUBLIC HOUSING AUTHORITY,
Washington, March 30, 1944.

Hon. PHILIP J. PHILBIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PHILBIN: I should like to direct your attention to serious errors and distortions of fact in the charges raised by the Massachusetts Federation of Taxpayers' Associations concerning the war housing projects of the Federal Public Housing Authority in Massachusetts and throughout New England. As you are no doubt aware, these charges were reproduced at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1944.

After a careful check, we find that inaccuracies are as prevalent in the allegations the Federation says it has "verified" as in those which the Federation says it has not verified but has secured from "reliable sources."

The following are the true and incontrovertible facts of the situation:

CHICOPEE, MASS.

The Federation describes the site chosen for the Curtis Terrace project as a clay bank which had already produced foundation failures in a city school built in the same area, and declares the site was chosen over the protest of Chicopee officials.

The facts are that the damage to the school resulted from faulty rtructure design; as is well known in the construction trade, clay is a perfectly suitable foundation material if footings are correctly designed. Both the mayor of Chicopee and the Chicopee Housing Authority recommended strongly the present site; consideration of an alternate site, easier to build on but farther from the center of the town, was abandoned, in deference to local wishes.

The Federation asks: "Who was the owner of this site previous to F. P. H. A. occupation? How long did he own the premises? How much did the United States Government pay him for the site? Every taxpayer in Massachusetts is interested in the answers to these questions."

The answers are that the city of Chicopee owned over a third of the area and that most of the remainder was owned by the Curtis Brick Co. and had been in its hands for over a generation. The price of $10,000, or $500 an acre, was extremely reasonable for land in the center of a city.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

The Federation contends that the manner of awarding the contract for construction of the Riverview Apartments is such as to warrant investigation by a congressional committee.

The matters referred to by the Federation obviously involve a permanent war-housing project—Lucy Mallary Village—and not the Riverview Apartments. After construction bids for this project had been received, with the Walsh Construction Co. as low bidder, it was decided to revise the plans in response to local requests in order to include basements. An effort was made to negotiate this change with the Walsh Construction Co., but its quoted price of $140,000 for the change was considered excessive. The low bid on revised plans, including basements and additional roadwork, amounted to only $68,285 more than the original Walsh bid and showed a saving of $68,715 over the price quoted for the change by the Walsh company.

HOLYOKE, MASS.

The Federation charges that the F. P. H. A. refused to pay the same Walsh company for certain on-site improvements at the Liberty Park project.

This project was originally scheduled for 110 family units. Because of a change in the in-migrant labor need in the locality, the project was cut back to 44 units in course of construction. By that time the contractor had completed about 90 percent of the entire on-site improvements and had been paid in full for all this work. At no time was there any intimation that the contractor would not be paid for the work done prior to the cut-back.

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.

The Federation asserts: "In Southbridge the F. P. H. A. spurned an offer of an unused factory for a women's dormitory rent free for the duration and insisted upon paying the owner $15,000 for the building."

The American Optical Co. offered to lease this property at $1 per year with the stipulation that the lessor would have reversionary right in the improved property. Since the improvements required would run between $80,000 and $90,000, it was definitely to the advantage of the Government to reject the offer of lease and to purchase the property.

The federation asserts: "Recently the F. P. H. A. autocratically ordered the Southbridge Authority to reduce rentals for rooms in the dormitory. The authority refused to do so. The members charge that the F. P. H. A. was attempting to subsidize defense workers who occupy the dormitory to the detriment of other workers."

This statement is the exact reverse of the truth. The F. P. H. A. has never clashed with the local authority. It was not the F. P. H. A. but the American Optical Co. which requested that rents in the dormitories be lowered for its trainees. The F. P. H. A. declined to do so in order to avoid competition with private accommodations and because it felt that if the trainees were to be subsidized, this should be done by the employer, not the Government.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.

The federation charges that the F. P. H. A. chose the highest hill in Pittsfield as the site for its Victory Hill project; that Pittsfield officials bitterly opposed the site; that the houses are flimsy cigar boxes representing a waste of the taxpayers' money; that the F. P. H. A. held up payments in lieu of taxes to the municipality because of the city's refusal to maintain the project streets clear of snow; and that the F. P. H. A. thereupon purchased its own snow plows.

The elevation of the Victory Hill site is 1,225 feet; the elevation of the central part of Pittsfield is from 1,000 to 1,100 feet; there are six other hills in Pittsfield higher than the one on which this project was constructed. Commitments for purchase of the site had been made before the project was transferred to the jurisdiction of the F. P. H. A. The F. P. H. A. at that time consulted the Pittsfield defense housing committee, which recommended consideration of another site if no commitments had been made on the Victory Hill site, but stated there was no local opposition to the site previously selected.

The committee also recommended that if the project was to be temporary, demountable units of the type installed be used. These demountable houses were built by a reputable New England firm, experienced in prefabrication; they provide comfortable quarters and should have considerable salvage value after the war.

The F. P. H. A. did not hold up payments in lieu of taxes to the city of Pittsfield because of the city's refusal to accept the streets of the project. Full payments in lieu of taxes were made on the basis of the valuation by the local assessor. Neither did the F. P. H. A. purchase its own snow plows; instead it engaged the same snow plowing contractor employed by the city.

BATH, MAINE

The federation declares that the site of a 400-unit war-housing project should never have been selected.

This project was originally assigned to the Public Buildings Administration which selected the site after a thorough survey of all available sites and test borings. After taking over the project, the F. P. H. A. reinvestigated the site situation and concurred in P. B. A.'s choice. It was virtually impossible to secure a large site in Bath without encountering ledge or other difficult subsoil conditions. The selection of this site was influenced by the availability of water and the construction by the Federal Works Agency of a large trunk sewer which transverses the site.

SOUTH PORTLAND, MAINE

The federation charges that the Red Bank Village project exceeded estimated costs by $1,500,000, that more than $200,000 was spent on extras, that heavy equipment hauled to the site was not used, that surplus materials and tools were purchased and that 14 skill saws were stolen on the project at a cost of $250 each to the Government.

Red Bank Village, built at the urgent request of the Maritime Commission to provide housing for workers at Portland shipyards, was constructed on a cost-plus-fixed-fee contract because of the inability to obtain satisfactory bids and the urgent time factor involved. Construction was started in the summer of 1942 and proceeded satisfactorily until serious delays occurred in deliveries of materials and equipment and difficulties were experienced in securing sufficient construction labor. These difficulties—combined with the need for pressing forward with the construction under severe winter conditions and for payment of a large amount of overtime at time-and-a-half pay—raised the final cost of less than $1,000,000 above the original estimate.

This job was in no way typical of F. P. H. A. performance. Cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts have been used in less than 10 percent of F. P. H. A. projects and only when conditions precluded obtaining competitive bids. In all of the cost-plus housing contracts, the average over-run, including Red Bank Village, was only 5 percent—and many jobs ran under the estimates. I believe the Red Bank project will show a fair amount of eventual salvage to the Government.

Cost of change orders on the project was $63,000, rather than $200,000 as charged by the federation. All heavy equipment hauled on the site was used and was paid for at rates in accordance with O. P. A. rulings. Materials and equipment were purchased on a normal basis, with the customary margin of safety for breakage, damage, etc. The surplus remaining out of this margin, upon completion of the project, was used by the F. P. H. A. on other projects or sold. A total of 29 skill saws were purchased for use on the project at $119 each (not $250) and were kept under lock and key when not in use. One (not 14) was stolen. The 28 remaining were sold with other surplus material, 13 for $119 each and 15 for $75 each.

The federation asserts that the Long Creek Terrace project at South Portland is only 20 percent occupied and the Mountain View Apartments only 10 percent occupied. Actually Long Creek is approximately 80 percent occupied, the vacancies being in one-bedroom units. Mountain View Apartments are more than 50 percent occupied, with the expectation that the vacant units will be filled as soon as necessary heating changes are completed.

GROTON, CONN.

The federation charges that the Fort Hill project, built to house workers in the Electric Boat Co.'s submarine plant, exceeded estimated cost by about $1,000,000, that the project will never be fully occupied because of poor site development, and that the demountable dwellings "were designed by an Alabama architect who apparently had no conception of New England climate in winter."

The Fort Hill project consists of 1,100 demountable family dwellings on a site of 300 acres, adjoining the property where the high school and town hall of the town of Groton are located. The final contract cost of site improvements was $1,687,307 against an original estimate of $1,291,030. At present, 976 of the 1,100 units are occupied, with the expectation that the remaining units will be filled in the near future because of increasing employment at the Electric Boat Co. The demountable dwellings in the project are sturdy and well insulated, and have provided comfortable living throughout the winter. These houses were designed and built by three firms of prefabricators: the Bush Lumber Corporation of New York City, the City Lumber Co. of Bridgeport, and the Prebilt Co. of Revere, Mass.

WEYMOUTH, MASS.

The Federation charges that the F. P. H. A. is incurring costs of $50,000 to correct water conditions from underground springs on the project site, which could have been discovered if soil tests had been made.

The actual cost of these corrective measures was $12,500. Test pits had been dug prior to start of construction and indicated little water. However, underground springs were encountered in course of construction.

CONCLUSION

While further recitation could be made of the inaccuracies and distortions contained throughout the Federation's statement, I believe the examples I have cited at this length are sufficiently indicative of the general quality of the Federation's charges.

Moreover, I would like to add that I have complete confidence in the integrity and ability of John Dobbs, regional representative of the National Housing Agency, who was responsible for programming war housing in New England; and Sumner K. Wiley, regional director of the Federal Public Housing Authority, who has carried out the F. P. H. A. program. I am sure, moreover, that both Mr. Dobbs and Mr. Wiley acted in full consultation with the proper community authorities and groups concerned with the war effort.

I do not contend that the F. P. H. A. has been free from mistakes in New England or any other region. However, with recognition of the difficult wartime problems, operating conditions and requirements that have been faced, I believe the F. P. H. A.'s record can stand on its merits before the scrutiny of any fair-minded observers.

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT EMMERICH,
Commissioner.

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, the late Federal Judge Edward E. Cushman, who died at Tacoma, Wash., at the age of 78, on January 25, 1944, had endeared himself to the laity and legal profession by reason of his integrity, his scholarship, his kindness, and his ideal family life. Memorial exercises in Judge Cushman's honor were held under the auspices of the Tacoma Bar Association on February 5, 1944. At that time three surviving Federal judges, to wit, the Honorables John C. Bowen, Lloyd L. Black, and Charles H. Leavy, paid eloquent tribute to the character and career of the lately departed luminary of the bench and bar, Edward E. Cushman. It was recalled with affection that the late Judge Edward E. Cushman was a brother of the former Congressman, the distinguished statesman and wit, Frank Cushman. Frank Cushman was one of the very few Members of Congress in a century and a half of American history, who was astoundingly gifted with a profound and infectious natural wit and whose stories are still retold with relish within these ancient walls of the national capital.

Mr. Speaker, I have already inserted in remarks previously made on the floor the eloquent address made by my warm friend, Federal Judge John C. Bowen, at the memorial exercises for Judge Cushman.

I am sure that my colleagues of the House will be pleased to read also the very appropriate remarks made by the Federal Judges Lloyd L. Black and Charles H. Leavy. Particularly, will they be intrigued by Judge Leavy's apt observations, because of their affection for this former colleague of ours who voluntarily quit the House of Representatives for the Federal bench. Here is the speech of Judge—former Congressman—Charles H. Leavy:

Hon. CHARLES H. LEAVY. This court has convened in special session this morning for the purpose of paying a deserved tribute to the memory of a much beloved and a great and distinguished jurist, who presided over it for many years—more than a quarter of a century—and it was in this court room where the major part of his labors were performed. It was here, in this city and in this court room, where he administered justice with an even hand and with rare distinction.

It has been my good fortune, and I consider it a great privilege, not to come as his successor, because that was beyond my capacity and ability, but to follow on the bench over which he presided, and by reason of his excellent work here, I feel that I have been made a little more capable in the discharge of the great responsibility by the fine standard and example that he has set.

Ordinarily, in a session of this kind, the senior district judge would be in charge of a program of this nature, but he has requested, by reason of the fact that this is the court room where Judge Cushman so long and ably labored and over which I now preside, that I open and close these ceremonies.

This exercise is under the jurisdiction of the local bar—a beautiful tribute I think they pay to a former distinguished member of the bar.

The bar of Tacoma has long borne the reputation as being an outstanding bar in the State of Washington, both in learning and in high standard of professional ethics. I cannot help but feel the fine foundation laid for that splendid reputation which they now bear is, in a large measure, due to the great work that the man whose memory we honor today, did among them.

The judges of the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington appreciate the action of the supreme court of this State in sending a majority of its members to this service, and I am sure the members of the family of Judge Cushman likewise appreciate that fact.

We are glad, too, to have with us in honor and respect to the memory of this distinguished and departed colleague and jurist, the judges of the superior court of this State.

It is not my intention to dwell at great length in attempting to pay personal tribute to the deceased. I know his work rather than having known the man, but I think that in a world torn by war and everyone deeply engaged in their own affairs, it is a splendid tribute not only to the memory of the deceased, but to the bar and bench, that we pause for a little while to pay a bit of respect to a great man.

The judges of the district court for the district of Oregon have expressed their regret in being unable to attend and sent a telegram to that effect.

I am going to offer and make a part of the record of this court a resolution, which reads as follows:

"Whereas when a distinguished, esteemed, and eminent jurist, long a loyal and faithful public servant of the Nation, has passed to his reward, it is appropriate that those who are the beneficiaries of his noble efforts should pause and pay a tribute of homage and respect to his memory: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That in the death of Edward E. Cushman, an upright citizen and eminent jurist, whose 30 years of unselfish public service as an outstanding member of this court, commanded and received the universal respect and confidence of the bench and bar of this judicial district, as well as that of the entire United States, we have suffered an irreparable and grievous loss; be it further

"Resolved, That this resolution be made a permanent record of this court, and a duly authenticated copy be transmitted to his grief-stricken widow and family.

"Done in open court this 5th day of February, 1944.

"JOHN C. BOWEN.
"LLOYD L. BLACK.
"CHARLES H. LEAVY."

I do want, in conclusion, to make this statement, because it exemplifies a full, complete, fine, and beautiful life well lived, I think so well, and it is probably somewhat of a reexpression of a thought all of us have heard so much:

When the summons came to Judge Cushman he went certainly like one who wraps the draperies of his couch about him and lay down to pleasant dreams.

Hereinbelow I am inserting the touching and feeling speech made by my warm friend, Federal Judge Lloyd L. Black.

Hon. LLOYD L. BLACK. Friends of Judge Cushman, all of us agree with the tribute that has been paid to Judge Cushman's memory by the words of Judge Leavy and Judge Bowen, and I am certain that the resolution bespeaks our confidence in him and our honor of him.

Almost 4 years ago the Bar of Pierce County paid a tribute to Judge Cushman in his lifetime. Here on my right, on the wall of this courtroom is that tribute—the picture of Judge Cushman in the room in which he loved to serve so well. It was my privilege at that time, because I then was somewhat in the place of Judge Leavy now, to preside over the ceremony of the Bar Association. Judge Bowen then as senior judge, accorded me that opportunity, as today he has asked Judge Leavy to appropriately conduct this meeting.

The members of the Bar of Pierce County and of others who came from farther places, spoke their words of tribute and confidence to Judge Cushman in his lifetime. I am delighted that that was so. It is a wondrous thing indeed, when one deservedly receives flowers while they live, and the members of the bar of Pierce County can keep in mind forever that on that day they brought flowers to Judge Cushman while he knew about it, and he did deserve those flowers then—the words that were said in affection and esteem, as his memory deserves what has been said, and will be said, this morning.

Judge Cushman's theme of life was devotion to his ideals and to his code, and to his private and his public obligations.

Judge Cushman unfalteringly made every sacrifice that he considered necessary to do the things that he was expected to do. He felt that his prime object, once he was selected as the United States district judge—that his prime object was to do that work and allow nothing at any time to interfere.

Judge Cushman's private life, his citizenry, his services as a judge, all bespeak the desire he had to do his best. Patience, ability, conscience, integrity, high honor, are the things that accompany him in our memory. He needs no words from me. Judge Cushman's upright private life, his fine and splendid service as a judge, are his enduring eulogies.

Because of the great interests in these memorial exercises I am inserting excerpts from the summary of the exercises approved by the three Federal judges, Bowen, Black, and Leavy:

TRIBUTES TO THE MEMORY OF JUDGE EDWARD E. CUSHMAN

IN MEMORIAM

United States District Judge Edward E. Cushman, retired, died at Tacoma, Wash., his home city, on January 25, 1944, at the age of 78. He was born in Iowa of pioneer stock and, with his brother, Francis W. Cushman, and his widowed mother, settled at Tacoma in 1893.

After several years of successful private and public law practice, Judge Cushman in 1909 became district judge in the Territory of Alaska. In 1912 he was appointed United States district judge for the Western District of Washington, and held that office with great honor and distinction for the remainder of his life.

Memorial exercises in Judge Cushman's honor were held under auspices of the Tacoma Bar Association on February 5, 1944, in the court room where he presided so long. There was gathered a large assemblage of his friends, including judges of the Federal and State courts, Federal and State officials, members of the bar, and other citizens, a number of whom paid high tribute to Judge Cushman's distinguished private and public career.

Judge John S. Robinson, of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington, in behalf of the members of that court and as spokesman for five of its members who came from Olympia to attend the memorial services, stated that he was bespeaking the high respect of the State Supreme Court for Judge Cushman, and eulogized Judge Cushman's "tremendous sense of responsibility," his feeling of obligation "to represent the majesty of the courts of the United States" and "his great eagerness to do his work worthily and well, and with great dignity * * *." Those qualities, said Judge Robinson, were among the outstanding characteristics which "produce that great veneration and respect" we all feel for the life and work of Judge Cushman.

Judge Ernest M. Card, of the Washington State Superior Court for Pierce County at Tacoma, in a resolution signed by himself and his three fellow judges, said: "Judge Cushman was a pioneer lawyer in Tacoma. His life has been identified with the development of the great Northwest. He brought to his judicial service a wide experience as a lawyer and as an assistant United States attorney. He was of a studious mind and untiringly devoted all his energies to his judicial duties. The outstanding character of his judicial work was early recognized and he was frequently assigned to other Federal districts for the trial of important cases. * * * On and off the bench he was always calm and considerate of others, and, above all, he was absolutely fair in his decisions."

Mr. Scott Z. Henderson, of the Tacoma Bar, formerly president of the State Bar Association, said of Judge Cushman: "He gave intellectual efforts to the service of his profession. He was an exemplar of manhood, devoted to his family, to his country, and his fellow man. He would appreciate no greater encomium. His life and his work will be revered in the realm of fond memory."

Judge George Donworth, of Seattle, formerly United Sta s district judge for the western district of Washington, who resigned from that bench about the time of Judge Cushman's appointment to it, said of him that: "As a judge he achieved, and throughout his life held, the confidence and respect of his fellow citizens. He did not believe that the law is merely what the judges may from time to time say it is. He believed that there is a law that is greater than the judges and he was zealous to avoid its misapplication merely because the end in view appeared at the moment to be desirable. * * * He was steadfast. The roots of his convictions went deep; they were founded on principles. In his judicial philosophy he satisfied the requirements which Chief Justice Marshall expressed in these words: 'A judge must be perfectly and completely independent with nothing to influence and control him but God and his conscience.' * * * His mind was vigorous and direct, going straight to the mark without aiming at ornament or effect, a common characteristic which distinguished all his deliverances from the bench."

Mr. Charles T. Peterson, of the Tacoma bar, who has been a close friend of Judge Cushman's family for many years, in concluding the memorial exercises, said: "In the tenderer emotions of life, Ed Cushman was as gentle and sympathetic as a child. In the sterner affairs of life, he was rock and steel—a giant crag towering out from the mountainside. His devotion to his family was immeasurable. I rarely visited with him for any length of time that his thoughts did not turn to home, family, and fireside. * * * The gentle breezes which shall be wafted through the branches of the lofty firs which stand like silent sentinels over his tomb, shall never sing requiem over one who filled better than he the full measure of devoted husband and father, loyal friend, and faithful public servant."

The Late Honorable J. Y. Sanders, Sr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 30, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, last week it became my sad duty to announce to this House the death of former Gov. J. Y. Sanders, Sr., of Louisiana, a former Member of this House.

At that time I attempted to pay tribute to the memory of one of Lousiana's most colorful and attractive political figures. Of course, in my limited manner, those remarks and tribute were most inadequate to bring before you the complete appreciation in which Governor Sanders was held by his own people in his native State.

Editorials from the three New Orleans newspapers, which are in my district, have just reached my desk and under leave to extend my own remarks, I direct your attention to them in connection with the passing of former Governor Sanders.

The editorials give you a clear concept of the esteem in which J. Y. Sanders, Sr., was held by his fellow man in the State of his birth.

I suggest you read these tributes to better appreciate a splendid citizen:

[From the New Orleans Item of March 25, 1944]

J. Y. SANDERS

The elder Jared Sanders had been so long retired from active affairs and latterly so completely removed by sickness that many younger Louisianians don't recognize in his death the departure of one of the State's most important public men during the passing generation. He was a politician by instinct, a good lawyer, an exceptionally good speaker, very resourceful, and highly courageous in pursuit of his objects. Yet he failed to achieve his ruling ambition—which was to sit in the United States Senate.

He really attained that object by legislative appointment, but he surrendered the seat in response to a call to apply his talents just then to a Panama exposition for New Orleans. He thought to realize his ambition afterward. In that he was thwarted by the vicissitudes of politics, being narrowly defeated for election to the Senate by the late Edwin Broussard. The whirligig never restored him to a position to recoup; in particular, he was crippled from then on by Huey Long's intrusion. This he fought as long and as hard as his health permitted.

Sanders entered politics young and distinguished himself in the successful fight to abolish the old Louisiana lottery. He advanced steadily through the legislature and the lieutenant governorship to become Governor in 1908. He was then affiliated with the Orleans Regular Organization. The influence of his office and his outstanding talents for organization and leadership, along with his force and vitality, soon made him the head of a country machine of his own. And for quite a time he remained the strongest political personality in the State.

He was among the first to realize the threat which the younger Long presented to other politicians. A sort of professional jealousy made the two enemies, and their feud lasted as long as Sanders' physical powers did. His methods were often hard and sometimes ruthless but he was restrained by certain moral inhibitions of which Long was entirely innocent. There were things he would not do, at which Long never hesitated. This freedom from all such restraints was one of the prime factors accounting for more of Long's progress, in our judgment, than any fabled shrewdness or intellectual qualities that have been attributed to him. Long's loudest gospel was against Sandersism. It was not Sanders' fault that the State was afflicted by something vastly worse—in Longism.

To summarize the good, bad, and indifferent chapters in Sanders' long and hectic career would require a newspaper page. We can refer to only a few. He established the first State highway system—strictly on the pay-as-you-go basis. Long used later to sneer at those roads because they were made of gravel. But later Governors had extended and improved them, and the gravel roads had to be laid as foundations for permanent paving. Sanders contended for the pay-as-you-go plan ever afterward. If it had been followed, we would have as much paving as we now have, but not be encumbered by our crippling bonded debt. Virginia and other States had shown the way.

Back in 1912, The Item, inspired by George Maxwell, an unappreciated genius, was opening its 20-year fight against the ancient and deep-rooted fallacy of levees only for flood control, in favor of the spillway control which is now exemplified at Bonnet Carre, with

New Orleans safe in consequence. Every other newspaper in hundreds of miles fought the new notion as silly heresy, along with the levee boards and other politicos who kept fat on levees only. The few who joined us at first were bracketed by the old false prophets as eccentrics, crackpots, or cranks. Sanders was one of the first public men of large size to line up with us.

It was a queer coincidence that John M. Parker, with whom Sanders was almost always at loggerheads, joined us at the same time. Truth has prevailed, nature has taken its course, and New Orleans is safer from the river than it ever was before.

Governor Sanders, by the way, also organized the State conservation and set it well on its course.

There were other such incidents in Sanders' career. We wish we could recount also some of his personal characteristics. They were a rich mine for humorous recollection. Jared worked hard, fought hard, but had a sad finish in years of bedridden helplessness. He leaves a large balance of good in his account with his people.

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune of March 24, 1944]

J. Y. SANDERS, SR.

Ex-Governor J. Y. Sanders, who died Thursday night in Baton Rouge at the age of 75, was a notable figure in Louisiana's political life for something like a half century. Elected to the legislature from St. Mary Parish in 1892, he was chosen speaker of the house in 1900, Lieutenant Governor in 1904, and Governor in 1908. Thereafter he served two terms in Congress as Representative from the Sixth District—later to be represented by his son, J. Y. Sanders, Jr.

That impressive array of public offices held over a 30-year period attests Mr. Sanders' uncommon political abilities. He had the gift of winning and holding friends, but the very qualities which made him a forceful leader raised up enemies, too. He figured in some of the most spectacular political controversies of his time and in or out of office was a factor to be reckoned with in State campaigns until age and declining health forced him to the sidelines.

One office to which he aspired—that of United States Senator—repeatedly eluded him, though the legislature named him, on Senator McEnery's death in 1910, for the latter's unexpired term. He declined the place, electing to serve out his term as Governor—only to be defeated in two later tries for nomination in senatorial primaries.

Governor Sanders was a pioneer in Louisiana's good roads movement. He served in two constitutional conventions. An able lawyer and an eloquent speaker, he was influential in Louisiana's public affairs over a long period, marked, as we have noted, by bitter political struggles in which he usually took an active part. The feeling aroused by these conflicts tends to color present-day appraisals of his public service. But many loyal friends acclaim him one of Louisiana's most distinguished public servants, and all Louisianians will remember him as one of the outstanding political leaders of his time.

[From the New Orleans States of March 24, 1944]

J. Y. SANDERS, SR.

In the death of J. Y. Sanders, Sr., Louisiana loses one of its most forceful as well as useful political leaders. This man had been in public life for more than 50 years. He was first elected to the Louisiana Legislature in 1892. Since that time he had been speaker of the house, Lieutenant Governor, Governor, and Congressman.

He was a fighter for those things he believed to be right from the time he entered public life. He began his career battling to expel the lottery from Louisiana and was incessantly the center of political controversy. More often than not, he was right, standing for decency and honesty in government. While a member of the constitutional convention, he worked for and originated the present suffrage features of the Louisiana Constitution.

Mr. Sanders was an ardent advocate of good roads and formulated a gravel highway system when good roads were a luxury. He was one of the first public servants in the United States to realize the necessity for improved highways. His gravel system was later improved by John M. Parker, who pioneered in paved highways. Both of these men believed in the pay-as-you-go system of financing. Governor Sanders bitterly opposed throwing Louisiana into debt by bond issues, which method was adopted in later years.

Governor Sanders turned down a seat in United States Senate to aid Louisiana's unsuccessful fight to bring the 1915 Panama Exposition to New Orleans. He did this at the urging of New Orleans citizens of all classses He had been elected to the Senate by the legislature. It would have been the culmination of his greatest ambition, but in order to help his State and New Orleans in particular, he remained as Governor and led the fight to secure the exposition.

In turning down the Senate seat, Governor Sanders said:

"It long has been an ambition of mine to occupy a seat in that great deliberative body (the Senate) but no man's ambition and no personal predilections should govern in a matter of this kind.

"The exposition means more to the people of Louisiana than anything else, and, if I can better serve the cause by remaining Governor, I stand ready and willing to forego the election to the United States Senate and devote my energy to this movement as Governor."

So vigorous a fight did Mr. Sanders make that New Orleans was conceded an edge in the battle, but San Francisco pledged $12,500,000 and New Orleans could not match it and lost the exposition. He later ran for the Senate but was defeated by the late Senator Edwin S. Broussard by a very narrow margin.

Governor Sanders was always an opponent of the Huey P. Long machine and lived to see the day that its successor was crushed by the election of Sam Jones as Governor and later by the victory of Jimmie Davis.

Governor Sanders never relinquished his interest in public affairs. He was the author and the proponent of many measures that have made for the betterment of Louisiana. He started life as a poor boy and worked to support a mother who had been left with eight children. By his own efforts, he graduated in law and became one of the outstanding members of the Louisiana bar. He was one of the best orators in the South, as well as one of the clearest thinkers and hardest fighters. He had a national reputation, both as a lawyer and as a Congressman. No man in Louisiana was more greatly loved or more violently opposed than Governor Sanders. His friends swore by him and his opponents swore at him. He was a pleasing companion, a great story teller and entertainer.

Altogether, the life of Governor Sanders was a useful one for his State and his country. When the final record is made, his name will stand high in the list of the great citizens of this State.

To his splendid son, J. Y. Sanders, Jr., to his widow, his relatives, and those close to him, this newspaper expresses its condolences, and it knows that in this it is joined by the people of this State and this country.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, Winchell will be scent to the Dies committee.

If Wendell supports the Republican ticket this fall, then the moon is full of green cheese.

A train of soldiers going east and a train of sailors going west stopped in Emporia. One said to the other, "Where is Hitler?"

Tully Bukey, of Roxbury, one of the last of the first party workers living, mourned and moaned at the fourth district convention because "there are no more Penroses." Tully cannot see the forest for the trees.

At the Emporia meeting, Chief Haucke returned to Irvin Platt a necktie the latter failed to pick up in a hotel room a year ago—which all goes to prove that there is honor even among politicians.

It is patent to anyone who follows Winchell closely that he always has at hand the Roosevelt family incidents of the past week, and airs them on Sunday evening as though they were copyrighted.

As I sat with the second district delegates at Ottawa, my memory went back to the convention that named Justin Dewitt Bowersock to Congress in 1898. Cy Leland and Curly Harrison sat in the gallery planning the ground operations.

Speaking of Ottawa, 3 years before 1898, I recall J. L. Bristow riding in an open hack with Maj. and Mrs. William McKinley to attend chautauqua. A month ago the Senator was alert and happy on his Virginia plantation.

"I will not tell you exactly how all the problems of mankind in war and peace are going to be solved. * * * I thank you for all the kindness with which you have treated me in spite of my many shortcomings."—Churchill, not Roosevelt.

The Day We Celebrate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, February 7), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Day We Celebrate," delivered by me at the Clover Club banquet in Boston, on March 11, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

To many of us, who have seen other days, there is a tinge of regret in connection with present-day celebrations of The Day We Celebrate. One who has witnessed, as I have, these celebrations during the years when the participants were the first and second generations of Irish-Americans, notes the absence of the deep emotions that were inherent in those earlier anniversaries. The celebrations to which I refer were characterized by outbursts of real Irish enthusiasm and were the annual occasion for publicly recalling not only one's pride in the race and its accomplishments, but the personal link of attachment to and personal memories of the old land that passing time has considerably weakened.

I can readily recall the days of my youth when practically ever city or town in New England had its religious services, its parade, and its musical and oratorical exercises on St. Patrick's Day. I witnessed, year after year, halls crowded to the doors, with men and women of the first generation of Irish immigrants and their children, deeply moved as they listened in rapture to the music of their fatherland and as they heard retold the struggle of the race through the long, dreary winters while watching and praying for the springtime that never came. I have seen vast audiences moved to tears as they recalled the sufferings, hardships, trials, and tribulations of the race.

Among the leaders of the race during these years, aside from the clergy, were a coterie of prominent lay leaders among whom were Patrick Donahue, T. B. Fitzpatrick, John Boyle O'Reilly, Thomas Gargan, Patrick A. Collins, and hundreds of other talented Irish-Americans who occupied civic positions of trust and responsibility in the seventies and eighties.

St. Patrick's Day awakened in the Irish not only their racial pride, but also aroused a real sense of loneliness. There is no grief so poignant, that crushes the human heart like lonesomeness. It is one of the most grim and harrowing pains to bear—the long, lonely vigils of mothers, wives, and loved ones for those who are absent fighting for the country. It is being borne in silence and with patriotic resignation in every home in America today where there is an absent son in the armed forces. The song I will now recite portrays touchingly the lonesomeness of the Irish mother parted from her emigrant son:

DANNY BOY

Oh, Danny Boy, the pipes, the pipes are calling—
From glen to glen, and down the mountain side,
The summer's gone, and all the roses falling—
It's you, it's you must go, and I must bide.

But come ye back when summer's in the meadow,
Or when the valley's hushed and white with snow,
It's I'll be here in sunshine or in shadow,
Oh, Danny Boy, Oh, Danny Boy, I love you so.

But when ye come, and all the flow'rs are dying,
If I am dead, as dead I well may be,
Ye'll come and find the place where I am lying,
And kneel and say an Ave there for me;

And I shall hear, though soft you tread above me,
And all my grave will warmer, sweeter be,
For you will bend and tell me that you love me,
And I shall sleep until you come to me.

I will not attempt tonight to unfold the long historic story that has made March 17 so dear to the Irish people. It has been said that the history of Ireland is a drama of seven acts, every act a century and every scene a tragedy. We would like to forget it—the story of woe, want, poverty, and enslavement. If the world would understand the progress of the race, the qualities that have made the men and women of Irish blood what they are and what their contribution to human welfare has been, the past could not be obliterated. It is the qualities that have been molded and fashioned through the tears, sweat and blood, famine and privation that have largely contributed to the sturdy character of the race. That the race endured and survived is one of the miracles of the ages; and the fact that in spite of its almost extermination, her exiled children have reached commanding positions throughout the world today, is indicative of the courage and indomitable perservance of the race and its capacity to suffer and sacrifice for spiritual and democratic ideals.

Therefore, on this, the day we celebrate, we pay tribute to the men and women who have won for us the qualities of heart and mind and soul, that have made our existence and our position of influence in the world possible—the saints, the scholars, the impoverished men and women, who, while enduring forced illiteracy, were denied the opportunity to worship God, to possess a home and to breathe the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

We all hope and seek for world peace, but let those who indulge in theories of world peace through instruments of force, find in the history of Ireland the absolute futility of such a policy. The Irish people, deprived of arms by her oppressors, has fought her fight for centuries with brains and her challenge to the world was made almost alone by voice and pen. The patriots that led the Irish people in their aspirations have demonstrated to the world that the sons of a race dedicated to freedom can be brilliant on the platform as they can be brave upon the field. There is not one of her noble sons who fought her battle with voice and pen during her long struggle who did not stand in constant danger of physical violence. No need to mention by name—the roll is too long—those who faced throughout their lives storms of hate, and at one time or another nearly every one of them were marked for murder. Some of them spent years in the gloomy confines of dungeons. Others were sentenced to be hanged; others lived daily within the shadow of the assassin's dagger.

Tonight in particular, I want to recall and pay tribute to the Irish exiles who came to America in such large numbers during the famine days of the middle of the last century. Between 1848 and 1850, 250,000 Irish families were evicted, and between these years 750,000 were killed with famine, and 1,250,000 Irish souls were sent, exiles, from their native land.

How shall I describe those exiles that America lifted from the valley of their Gethsemane to illuminated heights so that all the world could see and understand the genius of the Irish race?

How shall I describe those exiles?

"He was born in a land which no longer was his,
He toiled for a landlord whose face he never saw,
In the midst of plenty, his children ate the bread of poverty."

Hearing of a land across the sea where they and their children might find an opportunity to live in freedom, thither they came bearing within their breasts "the deep, unutterable woe which none save exiles feel."

Irish-Americans have many reasons to love America. We should love her not merely because she has been a beacon light of hope and opportunity to mankind everywhere, but especially because she gave welcome and innumerable opportunities to our emigrant ancestors when there was nothing for them to live for in the land of their birth except starvation and death. What did they bring with them to America? John Boyle O'Reilly has given the answer:

"No treason we bring from Erin—nor bring we shame nor guilt.
The sword we hold may be broken, but we have not dropped the hilt.
But the hearts we bring for freedom are washed in the surge of tears,
And we claim our right by a people's fight outliving a thousand years.

"Oh, willing hands to toil;
Strong natures tuned to the harvest song and bound to the kindly soil;
Bold pioneers for the wilderness, defenders in the field—
The sons of a race of soldiers who never learned to yield."

With no name that gave them place or prestige, into the lowliest and humblest walks of life they entered. Their heartstrings throbbing with the grief of a sensitive race, they toiled unceasingly, established homes, built churches, and made tremendous sacrifices to give their children the education, civic and religious, denied themselves.

Well they knew that no race could be an influence in contributing to the progress and welfare of the human family unless they produced, trained and educated courageous men and women to fight for the preservation of those rights and privileges that America generously gave them and which were denied mankind in nearly every other part of the world.

In one generation, these exiled emigrants sent into the professions, into the schoolrooms, into the commercial, public, and religious life of America their sons and daughters who from that day to this have made and are continuing to make a strong, powerful and patriotic contribution to American life.

Be it never forgotten, the bones of the children of these exiles are on every battlefield of the Republic; their names are written into its history with their sweat and their blood; their loyalty and their honor are incontestable.

What shall I say of the Irish exiled women? The contribution by the women of the Irish race is one of the most glorious pages in Irish history. I have seen in my own day thousands of Irish-American youths whose higher education has been made possible only by the toil of their Irish mothers and sisters over the machines of the cotton mills of New England. The bent backs and gnarled fingers that I have witnessed as a youth at the mill gates of New England are silent testimonials of the undying devotion of the Irish women to their homes and loved ones. Yes; it was largely the contribution made by the Irish exiled mothers throughout every section of America that opened the way, made the opportunity, and gave the inspiration by which their sons and daughters have since risen from poverty and misery to a position so commanding that it would seem almost inconceivable. Fitting it is that on this, the day we celebrate, we pay a loving tribute to those ancestors of ours who were the pioneers in opening up the trials that have led to our present position in American life.

There are two priceless heritages that our ancestors brought to America in their empty hands which we must cherish and preserve at any cost. We shall be unworthy of the inheritance of our forebears unless we expand and improve what has been bequeathed to us. The first is the gift of religion. This was their first consolation; their strength and their discipline. In every avenue of their life, their labors, their hopes, their duties, and their enjoyments, their religion encouraged and consoled them. When all else was lost, the Irish clung to and preserved their reverence for and their worship of the Supreme Being. Their gifts to us and to the New World were spiritual rather than material. The Irish people were a deeply religious people, not only the Irish Catholic, but the Irish Presbyterian and the Irish Episcopalian. The spiritual aspirations and the religious fervor of the race which sprung from its poverty and sufferings must never be lost.

Next to their love of and explicit trust in the Supreme Being was their unyielding devotion to freedom, their unshaken confidence in democratic institutions, and their hatred of the class caste and often tyrannical aristocratic governments of the Old World. They developed a hatred for tyranny that permeated every fiber of their being.

There never has been a blow struck in the cause of liberty or in behalf of human rights throughout the world that was not strengthened by Irish valor and sacrifice. A people who have furnished so many defenders of faith, justice, and liberty can never support intolerance or persecution.

To anyone who knows the history of Ireland, it is not difficult to understand the caution with which the people of Irish blood approach the consideration of any world-wide proposals that would maintain the status quo or the territorial domination of subject peoples by the use of force. The suffering and injustice caused by the policing of Ireland by an alien government for a thousand years is too recent to lead the men and women of the race to view with enthusiasm any plan for a combination of nations that would impose upon small nations, like Poland, Lithuania, Finland, and other small nations, the preservation and protection of the rights of an imperialistic nation.

The inalienable rights that our American founders proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence have no more devoted or loyal supporters than the men and women of the Irish race. Their deep sense of national justice has led them to cherish the institutions of this Republic not one iota less than their religious sanctuaries, and to fear communism as the most dangerous movement in our day to destroy free democratic institutions and traditions.

Let us preserve in this land of plenty these two precious heritages, these two most consoling and beneficent influences in the progress of mankind—religion and freedom.

Post-War Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, within the past 2 weeks the Canadian Government has announced its plan for meeting the complex problems of post-war international aviation. During the third week of March an international conference of British, Russian, Canadian, and United States aviation experts was scheduled to be held in Washington. The meeting did not take place. Meanwhile, the future of post-war aviation in the United States, the world's leading air power, has been entrusted to men whose knowledge of aviation is academic.

Our Government only a few weeks ago named Joseph Clark Grew, formerly our Ambassador to Japan, to hold the United States delegation to conferences which may take place in the near future. Our State Department has a series of reports prepared for it by members of its staff. But the vital importance of air transport in the world today, and the equally large role which it must inevitably play in the post-war era, is being substantially ignored by the failure of our Nation to give aviation the recognition it deserves.

Our aviation industry has turned out the biggest and best planes in use today. By the time the war is over, we shall have the machinery for producing planes and the personnel to man them on a scale undreamed of 10 years ago. But we shall not command the prestige to which our productive capacity entitled us if we do not use the outstanding aviation leadership which we have also produced to head our aviation department. Our Navy would not permit itself to be represented at an international conference by men without intensive naval experience. Neither should aviation be represented in such a way. Our Government is surely destined eventually to set up a separate cabinet position for aviation. The time to do that is now.

Preservation of Historic Sites

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, the ravages of war in Europe have destroyed, perhaps forever, some of the most treasured historical edifices of all time. It is to be hoped, however, that after hostilities have ceased some of these shrines, such as the Benedictine Monastery, on the hills outside pulverized Cassino, will be restored. It will not have been the first time that this monastery was destroyed and restored, and perhaps it will not be the last. This is a tribute to those people who have refused to allow a permanent death to even things of brick and mortar.

Following World War No. 1 many historical buildings and churches of France, Belgium, and Germany which had been razed by the implements of war were restored to their former glory and beauty by the machines of peace.

Such has been the epilog to all wars.

We in this country have been more fortunate. With rare exceptions, our historical buildings, monuments, and shrines have been spared the rapier and the torch of warring elements.

The White House, it is true, was once burned by the British, but it was not long before the present imposing structure rose out of those ashes.

The ravishes of time, however, have not dealt as kindly as the onslaught of war. Of course, this country is not as steeped in the tradition of Europe insofar as its buildings and structures are concerned. A country so young by comparison could not possibly be as covered by age-old structures. There have been, however, many historical buildings and sites, dear to the heart and soul of America and Americans, which have been blotted from the picture of today which should be restored.

In this time of war and destruction, when we are talking about post-war plans and building, we should take full cognizance of the importance of restoring and maintaining historical shrines in this country.

There is going to be a great public-works program, sponsored and financed by our Government, following the ceasing of hostilities. There is no doubt about that. The Government, of necessity, must contribute its share to prevent a recurrence of the depression which followed the lush days of the last war. The Government, however, must make plans which will also prevent veterans selling apples on street corners and otherwise unemployed citizens listlessly cutting down weeds in ditches in return for a Government hand-out of subsistence.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in this post-war planning, the Government should be able to come forward with a plan of permanent construction and continued life. It is just as easy to make a substantial, lasting plan as it is to make a momentary wisp-of-the-wind plan for the moment with no lasting benefits.

I am in favor, first, of a Nation-wide roads and highway program supported proportionately by Federal, State, and municipal funds. Such a program would be not only permanent but beneficial to the entire country. Those participating in such a building program would have the satisfaction of seeing the permanent effect of their handiwork and the full realization of the knowledge that they had contributed to the advancement of the Government which had allowed them the opportunity of contributing.

There would be no feeling of the emptiness which followed after the last apple from the basket was sold or the last blade of grass was cut.

If Government funds must be spent, let them be spent in a direction which will redound not only to the good of the individual but to the good of the Government itself.

Second only to the far-flung good roads and great highways to be constructed by the States and cities with the help of the Federal Government in the post-war period, Mr. Speaker, I suggest a great building program which would include not only the construction of public buildings, Federal, State, and municipal, but also the restoration, as far as possible, of shrines and buildings of great historical value.

The Rockefellers set a pattern for us to follow when they restored Williamsburg, which I am sure many Members of this House have visited. Except for the private enterprise and initiative of the Rockefellers, this cradle of American liberty would have been lost forever to America. As a result of the efforts of the Rockefellers, we can walk among the buildings where the eloquence of Patrick Henry rang out and where was first planted the seeds of American freedom.

If private initiative and industry can accomplish these things through purely patriotic motives, why cannot the peoples of all sections of the country be moved to similar accomplishment under Government sponsorship in the post-war plans?

There is no doubt in my mind that the peoples of some of the smallest communities in this Nation would like to do their share in such a program. There is hardly a community in the broad expanse of America today which does not hold some building or some shrine close to its heart.

Preserving buildings and shrines of a historical nature is not entirely new to the Government, but it has been done in only too few instances. For the better part the initiative has been taken by the interested individual or groups of individuals, but, unfortunately, the necessary funds have not always been available and many worthy enterprises have fallen by the wayside. Individuals, not the Government, have saved and preserved Mount Vernon.

Government funds could not be expended in a more worthy manner following this war than in restoring and preserving those shrines, buildings, and sites so dear to the heart of America and the American people.

I am proud of the people of New Orleans and Louisiana for the manner in which they have attempted, in their own way, to preserve some of our more historic shrines. Individuals have preserved the home of the famous Confederate General Beauregard. The city of New Orleans has purchased and restored the Napoleon House, built as a retreat for the Little Corporal in what was supposed to have been his deliverance from St. Helena.

There are many other historical sites in New Orleans, which, similar to many other American cities, have been preserved because of the pride and devotion of the people in the community.

As a post-war plan, however, the restoration and preservation of such places throughout the Nation is almost limitless, and at the same time beneficial to the Nation as a whole. As a specific example of what could be accomplished under such a plan, I direct your attention to the reconstruction of the glorious French Opera House in New Orleans.

This building, probably one of the most famous in all America, was destroyed by fire. Grand opera in America was given birth in this building yet the present generation only knows of the edifice from history. A vacant lot sprawls in the French quarter where once stood the gallant French Opera House.

There has been agitation for many years to rebuild the French Opera House but nothing tangible was done until one of New Orleans' leading civic-minded citizens, Walter Loubat, called a group of citizens together and made definite plans for the future. Walter Loubat, Mr. Speaker, deserves the gratitude and thanks, not only of the citizens of New Orleans but of the music-loving people of all America for what he has done in the interest of restoring the French Opera House in New Orleans.

Organizing the New Orleans Opera House Association for the sole purpose of one day seeing the old French Opera House rise again from the ground, Walter Loubat and his splendid group around him, are indeed headed in the right direction. Theirs is a nonprofit organization. They conduct a civic opera in the great City Park Stadium of New Orleans not for profit to themselves but for the profit of the entire community and with the objective being the raising of funds to reconstruct the French Opera House.

But they need help. Others throughout the Nation working for similar purposes will also need help. After this war the Government should, in its post-war program, help not only these folks of New Orleans, but the people of any community anywhere in America who are in a like position and who are equally desirous of restoring American shrines for future generations.

The people of each community are anxious to assist in such a plan. They will have a personal interest and a personal pride in the knowledge that they are assisting their Government in building permanently for the future generations to come.

Mr. Speaker, I have not attempted to discuss this plan which I offer in detail. I have merely thrown out a few thoughts in the hope that they will cause others to think. If spend our money we must, then let us spend it in something tangible and constructive. Let us not have a repetition of the apple-selling, grass-cutting era which benefited neither Government nor citizen.

In New Orleans, Mr. Speaker, we feel very keenly about such a program. I am sure such a feeling generates throughout America where local people are filled with local pride.

We in New Orleans want to help. We want to assist in building a post-war America.

The rebuilding of the French Opera House would be a step in the right direction. Of course, the French Opera House is dear to our hearts. There are other such structures throughout America, Mr. Speaker, just as dear to the hearts of those people who dwell in the respective communities, but we of New Orleans know the French Opera House best.

We feel, however, that the French Opera House of New Orleans belongs not only to New Orleans, but to America as well.

I have asked Edward Alexander Parsons, president of the Louisiana Historical Society and executive vice president of the New Orleans Opera House Association, to write a memorandum of the old French Opera House of New Orleans, in order to bring to the attention of the Members of this body the great historical value of this building. Mr. Parsons is undoubtedly one of Louisiana's most informed citizens.

Mr. Parsons has contributed a most excellent paper on the subject, which I submit to you for your perusal:

The historic music of New Orleans has always been the opera.

New Orleans, founded in 1717, and Louisiana—Province, Territory, and State—have the unique position among all the cities and States of the New World in having experienced complete French and Spanish regimes, and Anglo-Saxon (Florida Parishes) and American dominations. It was an act of audacious genius for the French to found, in the crescent of the Mississippi, at the gateway of the world's greatest valley, a city that was destined to be the southern outpost of these United States. From the beginning, the settlers clung to the river's lip with great tenacity, overcame the almost insurmountable difficulties of the times and place—of floods, fever, wars, and penalties of war—ever building the stones of the beginning of the metropolis of the South.

France ruled de jure to 1763, de facto to 1769; Spain until 1803; then Napoleon had 20 days of sovereignty; and finally the wisdom of Jefferson, through the Louisiana Purchase, made of these United States a world power.

Amid these historic backgrounds, New Orleans was born, and grew through the years. Her original genius was Latin. In spite of her vast economic development and modern industrial progress, she still keeps alive the flame of Latin culture and civilization in our country, and in this performs an important service for the Nation.

As you walk in the devious streets of Boston, true Athens of America, you think of old London; so, as you walk the straight streets of the Vieux Carre (the original old French-Spanish city) in New Orleans, you see vistas of old Paris.

In this old original city of New Orleans (the Vieux Carre, literally the "old square," so-called, I assume, like Roma Quadrata because it was not a square, but a rectangle), there grew, after the hard beginnings of discovery, settlement, and frontier existence, a colonial intellectual life, rich in all the color and the romance of the Latin spirit. We know little of this in America because, unfortunately, it spoke in a different tongue, and with our Anglo-American self-sufficiency, we missed its finer import.

Poetry, oratory, and the intellectual arts were cultivated. Lovers of beauty, they affected the drama; writers of poetry, they sang not only in their hearts and minds, but vocally to their friends and neighbors in concerto, and what more natural, then, that the music drama, the lyric drama, in which the musician goes one step further than the dramatist who has his characters speak in verse, whilst the musician has his express their life in song, all this readily appealed to a gay and brilliant people, carnival-minded, with music in their hearts, and a perennial zest of life.

And so opera naturally came early to the joyous Latin city near the mouth of the great river. Thus opera came originally to New Orleans, not as an exotic form of art for the tired businessman, but as a natural, reasonable, and poetic musical expression of the ideal life of the people.

How true this is, we may easily learn in remembering the history of man wayfaring throughout the ages. The Greek created beauty. Out of the dithyramb sung around the altar of Dionysius, out of the chorus of ancient classical Greek tragedy, the germ of opera was born. Indeed, it was a little group of scholars and musicians at Florence, during the Renaissance, who, trying to rediscover this lost art of musical song, which, it is true, they failed to do, but out of their labors grew the magical beauties of the lyric opera—the wonders of Bizet, Verdi, and Wagner. So, curiously we may comment, in this same age of the Renaissance, Columbus, who sought to discover a new way to the Indies, failed, but discovered America instead.

And so out of Italy into France and the rest of Europe, the spirit of opera journeyed, and the great musical dramas of modern times have entertained and added to the cultural growth of not only Latins, but to that of all men of good will everywhere.

One might ask, why this thesis in favor of opera? Of music? Why not?

Remember, the greatest singer of our race, the poet of England and America, who had not a drop of Latin blood, reminds us:

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, strategems, and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus:
Let no such man be trusted. Mark the music."

—The Merchant of Venice.

And so joyously opera was received in New Orleans.

We believe that late in the eighteenth century solos, concerts, and scenes or sketches from opera were given in the solons or parlors of private homes, and in improvised halls, and even tents, in public. We know that as early as 1791 a troupe of players from Paris gave comedies in New Orleans; in 1791 appears the first theater, Le Theatre St. Pierre; on January 30, 1808, opened the new Theatre St. Phillippe; and on November 30, 1809, the handsome Theatre d'Orleans, which latter house is so intimately connected with the traditions of the opera in New Orleans.

The first operatic company in the United States was supported in New Orleans. Regular opera was given here at least from 1809. However, it is from 1837 to 1919 that the stream of operatic history flows; from 1837, when Mlle. Julia Calve sang, to the fateful December 1919, when the famous French Opera House burned.

On the pages of the Book of Opera in New Orleans during nearly a century may be found the inspiring story of the efforts of intellectual and musical-minded citizens organizing and bringing from Paris and other musical centers of Europe, groups of distinguished artists, including all the great singers of the times. Every grand opera of the period was rendered during this time, and many unusual and little-known works were presented. Not only grand opera, but the opera comique and opera bouffe were fully represented.

To name the great artists who have appeared in New Orleans during the period would be to copy the roster of the greatest singers of these years. Any commercial book on opera will give the dates of New Orleans presentations.

Many American premieres stand to the credit of New Orleans: Les Huguenots (Myerbeer), 1839; Lucia di Lammermoor (Donezetti) 1841; L'Elisir d'Amore (Donezetti), 1842; La Favorita (Donezetti), 1843; Lucrezia Borgia (Donezetti), 1844; Le Prophete (Myerbeer), 1850; Mireille (Gounod), 1885; Queen of Sheba (Gounod) 1889; Le Roi d'Ys (Lalo), 1890; Herodiade (Massenet), 1892; Samson and Delilah (Saint-Saens), 1893; etc.

The French opera house which burned in 1919 was among the very few first opera houses of the world. Its interior was a masterpiece of theatrical architecture, with very few rivals in symmetrical beauty. Its acoustics were second to no theater. The architect was James Gallier. It was built by Gallier & Esterbrook in the incredible time of 233 days, working day and night, at a cost of $118,500. It was finished November 28, 1859, and opened with William Tell on December 1, 1859.

This New Orleans Opera House was the civic, social, and artistic center of her people. Here, not only opera and drama were performed, but Presidents of the United States and distinguished men and women from America and the world have been received and have appeared. The opera house is a vital part of cultural New Orleans. Its rebuilding is not only a civic, but a national necessity.

If New Orleans is to continue her role of receiving within her gates our friends and neighbors of Central and South America, then it is imperative that this great monument of her culture, her temple of song, so dear to the hearts and minds of the Latin peoples, should be restored through a national post-war project.

The time has come when we Americans of these United States, in taking our great place among the nations of the world, must consider and support the finer things of civilization and culture, as well as our unrivalled economic and industrial supremacy.

"All passes; Art alone
Enduring stays to us:
The bust outlasts the throne,
The coin, Tiberius."

Cost-Plus Contracts

REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, one of the glaring faults in our economic system today is the continuation of the cost-plus system of contracts let by the Government. This system is not only extremely wasteful but it has also caused a great deal of the trouble connected with the so-called manpower shortage in various parts of the country. It has been responsible for hoarding labor which could have been used more directly in the war effort elsewhere. It has created inefficiency by releasing management from responsibility as to production or pay-roll costs. It has added to the possibility of inflation, and it has also, in too many instances, created a doubtful value of money in the minds of those actually doing the work.

The responsibility for the cost-plus type of contract rests squarely with the Government of the United States, not with the employers or the employees as such. Cost-plus means that the percentage of profit is figured on over-all costs of production. Under this system industry is under no pressure to hold costs down or to employ only such labor as it can use efficiently. The larger the pay roll the larger the "costs" and also the larger the gross profit.

We should have been educated to the results of the cost-plus system because of our knowledge of its use during the First World War. However, that was not the case, and while something of this sort may have been necessary in the first part of the present World War certainly the need for its continuation should be almost completely done away with by now.

With our production up, with stock piles being created in formerly scarce materials, and with plants being shut down, there surely must be a way to end this wasteful system and restore our economic system to a more secure foundation. Whatever needs may have existed for the cost-plus system should certainly have been overcome by now.

I am happy to note, on the basis of information given to me by the W. P. B., and the War and Navy Departments, that they realize the dangers inherent in such a system and are doing their utmost to convert cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts to fixed-price contracts wherever possible. The sooner the cost-plus system is done away with, the better it will be for the country as a whole.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has been my impression that we were not at the present time using any of the strictly, so-called cost-plus contracts, but instead all of the contracts of that nature during this war have been cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract. In other words, the fee was not at all dependent upon the total cost of the contract, but the fee was fixed regardless of what the cost might be.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker. if the gentleman will allow me to continue and will read some of the material that I am going to put in the RECORD, I think the situation he calls to our attention will be fully answered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I may say to the gentleman from Montana that I will read it with great interest.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, is it the gentleman's opinion also there is considerable waste of manpower as a result of the cost-plus arrangement?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. That is my opinion, and I thank the gentleman for emphasizing one of the dangers in this wasteful system.

JANUARY 13, 1944.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been receiving correspondence from my State relative to the cost-plus situation on the Pacific coast. I am very much interested in this matter because of the costs of these projects and the evident waste connected with them. I should like to know if it is now the policy of the Army to continue letting contracts on a cost-plus basis or if a change in the situation has brought about the elimination of this wasteful type of spending.

Because of the fact that cost-plus contracts are purely governmental contracts and also because the tremendous cost has to be borne eventually by the taxpayers, I am very much interested in having a definite statement as to how many of this type of contract are still in operation and what the policy of your Department will be in such matters in the future. Personally, I think the cost-plus system is responsible for a depressing effect on our economy, especially in relation to areas located close by.

I would appreciate in detail all the information available on this particularly important subject.

Thanking you and with best personal wishes, I am,

Sincerely,

MIKE MANSFIELD.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE UNDER SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1944.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: Reference is made to your letter of January 13, 1944, requesting information as to the use by the War Department of contracts on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis and as to present War Department policy on the subject.

The War Department policy, ever since it was first authorized in 1940 to make cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, has been to limit the use of this type of contract to those cases where such use was absolutely necessary. This policy, which is still in force, was adopted in recognition of the fact that this type of contract does not provide direct financial incentive to the contractor to control costs and that it requires considerable manpower for auditing and administration.

Our wartime methods of contracting necessarily must be adapted primarily to obtaining needed munitions, equipment, and services in the quantity, of the quality, and at the times required. The fixed-price contract generally is the best instrument for doing this efficiently and accordingly the War Department has sought to use fixed price contracts werever feasible and has developed modified forms of such contracts to adapt them to the abnormal conditions of war procurement. Examples of such modifications are (1) the arrangements for fixing tentative original prices and adjusting this price after part performance, adopted soon after the war started; and (2) the use of periodic price adjustment articles, adopted in January 1943 to provide a method of relieving contractors from making commitments too far ahead while preserving incentive for reductions in cost during each period.

The fixed-price contract is not suited to all the conditions and problems of war production. Under certain circumstances the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract is the most feasible alternative, as for example, in the case of developmental or experimental contracts, contracts where plans and specifications are not complete or final when the contract is executed and contracts where the item to be manufactured is completely new. In other cases, the contractor may lack previous production and cost experience on which to base his fixed price. Frequently, too, insufficient capital overexpanded volume of business, fears of termination losses or other reasons may make the contractor unwilling to assume the risk of loss under a fixed-price contract. Of necessity, certain types of combat equipment are subject to reduction, changes in specifications, and to rapid variations in the quantity or rate of production, as strategic needs shift. In many such instances the contractor cannot make a fixed-price contract at all or can do so only at a price which includes allowances for contingencies so large as to remove many of the advantages of a fixed-price contract. In these cases where fixed-price contracts on a sound basis cannot readily be made, the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract or some other method of protecting the contractor against loss is essential to war procurement.

Despite their inherent defects, cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts are not necessarily inefficient instruments of procurement. The War Department at all times has endeavored to maintain standards of efficient performance under these contracts. To this end it has adopted administrative measures for supervising expenditures and operations. A high degree of efficiency has been obtained under many of these contracts, especially in the case of Government-owned contractor-operated plants of the Ordnance Department. Studies of these operations have indicated that administrative controls in these plants have obtained results which compare favorably with records under fixed-price contracts for comparable items and lead to the conclusion that sound administrative methods under cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, where these contracts must be used, can control and increase efficiency despite the lack of direct financial incentives.

Cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts are used primarily by the Corps of Engineers, Ordnance Department, and the Army Air Forces. The Corps of Engineers limits its use to construction and architect-engineer contracts; and these are rapidly being reduced. As of August 31, 1943, the engineers had outstanding about 120 fixed-fee contracts under which work was uncompleted; and three-quarters of these were expected to be completed or terminated before December 31, 1943. In the aircraft field the great expansion of business, the relatively limited capital of many companies, and the conditions of production have necessitated considerable use of this type of contract by the Army Air Forces. As of September 30, 1943, Air Forces contractors were working on 188 fixed-fee contracts and 66 letter contracts in anticipation of fixed-fee contracts, primarily for aircraft, engines, and parts and modification work, transport, and other special services. The Ordnance Department had outstanding 185 cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts on August 31, 1943, in the following categories: Research and development, 33; special services of various kinds, 15; equipping of plants, 17; supplies and munitions, 49; and operation of Government-owned new ordnance ammunition and small arms facilities, 71. Thirty-five of these outstanding contracts were expected to be completed, terminated, or converted to a fixed-price basis before January 1, 1944. Many of these Air Forces and Ordnance contracts are for equipment and services which are subject to frequent changes in character and quantity to reflect combat experience and strategic decisions.

Serious obstacles have been encountered in the attempt to convert outstanding cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts to a fixed-price basis. Among these obstacles are the following factors which continue to affect the attitude of contractors holding cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, even after there has been a substantial production experience:

1. The rate of production of certain items fluctuates so rapidly and so widely according to strategic and military factors and specification changes that the resulting variations in the costs of production make it almost impossible to fix a reasonable price without heavy contingency allowances or constant adjustment of the price.

2. Many of the fixed-fee contractors, especially with the Air Forces, have so little previous experience with production of their present products or depend so heavily on subcontractors in this condition that they are unable at any time to estimate their future costs with reasonable accuracy.

3. Many of the contractors under fixed-fee contracts have only moderate amounts of capital but are doing an enormous volume of business totally disproportionate to their capital and are entirely unwilling to assume the risks inherent in the fixed-price contract for fear that even small errors might ruin the company entirely.

4. With the tremendous expansion of business, management, and engineering personnel in some companies has been spread so thin that they are either unable or unwilling to divert their time and energies to the computation and negotiation of prices instead of to production.

5. The instability of labor conditions in certain areas involving heavy turn-over, shortages in personnel, large training costs, and low efficiency makes estimates of labor costs extremely uncertain.

6. Certain of the fixed-fee contractors, especially with Ordnance, have undertaken to manage plants producing articles totally different from their commercial business, primarily as a public service and without desire for substantial or any profit; often they are not willing to embark on a business venture in such fields, desiring neither the attendant profits nor the risks.

These and other factors lead many cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contractors to refuse to consider a fixed-price basis at all or to insist on allowances against contingencies so substantial as to make conversion of doubtful expediency. Obviously, the advantages of conversion will largely be lost if the fixed price under the converted contract is so high as to remove substantial price pressure for efficiency. Nevertheless, despite the various obstacles which have been encountered, the War Department proposes to press diligently for conversion of cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts to fixed prices wherever the circumstances which led to their use in the first place have so changed that such contracts are no longer necessary.

I trust that the foregoing statement answers your inquiry and gives you the information which you need to answer your correspondents on the Pacific coast. This matter is one of primary interest to the War Department, and I shall be grateful to you for bringing to my attention any information or views bearing upon the problem which you may consider helpful. I shall, of course, be glad to furnish you any further available information which you may require.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT P. PATTERSON,
Under Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 21, 1944.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: I am in receipt of your letter of January 13, 1944, with reference to cost-plus contracts on the Pacific coast. As you are aware the Navy Department is not permitted by law to enter into cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost form of contract. The only cost-plus form of contract is the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee form. The Navy Department is in full accord with the position indicated in your letter that cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts be used as sparingly as possible. It is our belief that the objective of cutting down the amount of such contracts is being accomplished by constant administrative pressure within the Department.

I believe that the Navy has already made substantial progress in limiting the use of cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts. Current Navy supply contracts show that the percentage of the fixed-price type is increasing in current procurement. Between March 15 and September 15, 1943, the dollar volume of uncompleted cost-plus-a-fixed-fee supply contracts was decreased by about $1,250,000,000. To the best of my knowledge, the Navy Department is today entering into contracts on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis only in those cases where it is impossible to negotiate a contract on a fixed-price or modified fixed-price basis.

I am further informed that as of the end of January cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts constitute about 16 percent of the total outstanding dollar volume of contracts made by the Bureau of Ships. It must, of course, be recognized that opportunities for making large profits and for failing to limit costs are present in fixed-price contracts as well as in cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts. In general, it does appear to be true that the contractor does not have the same spur of incentive under a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract to achieve the most efficient and economical performance of his contract as is the case under a fixed-price contract. The Secretary of the Navy has urged all Navy contracting officers to replace cost-plus contracts with fixed-price contracts and, wherever possible, to change the existing cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts to modified fixed-price contracts.

Nevertheless, there are instances in which circumstances practically dictate the use of cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts; e. g., when precise specifications cannot be issued at the time of contract negotiation, when the full scope of the work cannot be known until an advanced stage in production, when new manufacturers start on the production of an item familiar to others but unfamiliar to them, when the lapse of time between contract negotiation and completion of production is so long that satisfactory estimates cannot be made of labor and material costs, etc. To endeavor to use fixed-price contracts in many of such instances would be to attempt the impossible and to make necessary the use of an exaggeratedly high fixed-price in others.

The implication in Mr. Monson's letter, enclosed with your letter, that cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts result in the payment of higher rates of wages is not justified, as the wage rates in any locality, whatever the type of contract involved, are determined by central agencies of the Government and generally result from War Labor Board rulings.

There is a good deal to be said, I think, for the proposition that the undesirable results arising under certain cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts are due to a failure of management to perform the contract adequately and not to the form of the contract itself. However, we are constantly seeking to have our supervisory personnel impress upon the contractor the necessity for keeping costs under the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts to a minimum.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK KNOX.

WAR PRODUCTION BOARD,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1944.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MANSFIELD: This is in reply to your letter of January 13 requesting a report on the extent of cost-plus contracts in the war program and a summary of the policy of the War Production Board in regard to the continuation of their use.

In general it is the policy of the procurement agencies to award cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts where time does not permit adequate preparation of plans or specifications, when the production of new types of munitions is involved, or when the contractor lacks cost data or production experience and is unable to assume the risks of firm-price contracts. It is recognized, however, that cost-plus contracts are not desirable since they do not provide direct financial incentives to the contractor to reduce costs and since they require considerable manpower to audit and administer. Both the Production Executive Committee and the Procurement Policy Board of the War Production Board have continually requested that the use of cost-plus contracts be limited to the greatest possible extent.

There are attached two sets of three tabulations each, showing the extent and trend of cost-plus contracting in the war procurement program through June 1943. The first set is limited to contracts of $10,000,000 and over; the second tabulates all contracts of $50,000 and over. A comparison of the two sets of tabulations reveals that both indicate the same general trend in cost-plus contracting—a peak in the period January–June 1942 and a subsequent decline. For the four agencies included in the tabulations, in the whole war program through June 1943, 1.1 percent of the number and 30 percent of the dollar value of contracts of $50,000 and over were cost-plus. There has been a reduction from a maximum of 39 percent in January–June 1942 to 20 percent in January–June 1943. The extent to which cost-plus contracting is confined to larger contracts is illustrated by the fact that, while the average value of all contracts of $50,000 and over is under $1,500,000, the average value of cost-plus contracts is about $38,000,000.

The tables show that since June 1942 the use of cost-plus contracts by Army and Navy has declined considerably. This coincides with Army directives dated September 30 and December 16, 1942, specifying that cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts were to be entered into only as a last resort when it was impossible or impracticable to write a firm-price contract. Maritime Commission cost-plus contracting has remained fairly constant. In this connection it should be noted that for ship construction the Commission uses an incentive contract which adjusts the fee inversely to the cost. Although the Commission does not consider these to be cost-plus contracts, they have been so included in these tables because, except for the incentive clause, they are identical to the fixed-fee type of award. Treasury Department (lend-lease only) does not use the cost-plus type of contracting. For the above four agencies, 45 percent of the dollar value of contracts $10,000,000 and over awarded through June 1943 has been for fixed-fee contracts. Cost-plus contracts accounted dollar-wise for 53 percent of the large awards in January–June 1942, dropped to 43 percent in the next 6-month period, and to 33 percent in the half-year ending June 1943. In all periods the proportions applicable to the number of contracts have run considerably less than those applicable to the value, indicating that even among this select group, cost-plus contracts are more prevalent in the larger areas.

In conjunction with their policy of awarding cost-plus contracts only where it is not feasible to do otherwise, the Army and Navy have also replaced existing cost-plus contracts with fixed-price awards as soon as production was on a recurring basis and costs could be determined. Also, where fixed-price contracts could not be substituted, reductions in the fixed fee have been secured. Thus, the 1941 contracts with Boeing for Flying Fortresses called for a fee of 6 percent of the estimated cost; January and August 1942 supplements specified a fee of 5 percent; and the December 1942 supplement, a fee of 4 percent. Similar types of reductions were made in contracts with American Locomotive for tanks, and with Grumman Aircraft and Consolidated-Vultee Aircraft for planes.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD M. NELSON.

Twenty-three-Cent Eggs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include a letter regarding the terribly low price that farmers are receiving for eggs and the price of feed to keep the hens producing. This letter was written by a farmer's wife, who is one of the thousands of farm women who are trying to feed the Army and the home front. This is only one of many such letters that I have received in the last few days. With eggs selling at 55 cents in Washington, D. C., something is wrong somewhere. While we are asking the farmers to produce more eggs and poultry, we should protect them with a floor price in order that they may meet the cost of production.

The letter follows:

FRANKFORT, KANS., March 26, 1944.

Representative W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE LAMBERTSON: Yesterday I took eggs to town and received 23 cents per dozen. I'm just a farmer's wife. I have a farmer (our dirt soldier) and 2 children to feed. I have a small flock of hens (160) producing over-average eggs. Half of these are pullets which began laying in January. I have been feeding these bran at $2.25 per hundredweight, meat scraps at $4.25 per hundredweight, and grain at $1 a bushel, and oystershells. How can we continue to feed these hens and receive only 23 cents per dozen for eggs?

The Government is calling for us to produce more. Does the Government expect us to produce chickens and eggs for the Army without cost of production? We can't coin money (and tax people) when we fail to have enough cash to buy baby chicks or feed. Our hens will "scratch" for a living but not produce. Arrangements have been made to control all farm products but do they call this control—23 cents per dozen for eggs?

Excuse made at poultry houses is that not enough help is available to care for the eggs. Therefore, they cannot pay more. Yet they do not refuse to take the eggs. Do they dump them in the rivers when they spoil? (due to the lack of care), or do they use that for an excuse for the middleman to profit? When we farmers haven't enough help to care for our stocks and crops we put in 14- to 18-hour days. We women take the milk bucket in hand or take our children to the fields to get the job done.

Now I don't ask for a 48-hour week, or overtime wages. Nor for a Jamaica maid or an airplane and pilots so I can see the world, or an expensive evening gown so I can go to some high-class night club and spend money that could go into War bonds. All I want is the cost of production so we farmers can feed the soldiers.

We have to rely upon our Congressmen to back us up and fight for our rights. We can't go and ask our hens to hold up production for a week or two for someone to do something about the situation. So, Representative LAMBERTSON, as a member of the Agriculture Committee, here's hoping you'll live up to your fighting spirit and bring justice to the American farmer.

Sincerely,

Mrs. J. R. LILLEY.

Funds for Civilian War Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRITZ G. LANHAM
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with leave to extend my remarks, I am submitting a letter I have received from Mrs. Florence Kerr, assistant to the Administrator of the Federal Works Agency:

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
Washington, March 30, 1944.

Hon. FRITZ G. LANHAM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANHAM: I request that you insert the following explanatory statement in the RECORD.

During the debate on the first deficiency bill of 1944 in the House of Representatives, March 9, 1944, Representative JUDD inserted in the RECORD a copy of a letter signed by Kathryn H. Starbuck, chairman of civilian war services, and Alice P. Reeves, chairman, child care committee, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. This letter was also used by Mrs. Harriet Ahlers Houdlette, chairman, legislative committee on War Area Child-Care Act of 1943, in her testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee on March 22. It stated that although the requisition for funds was submitted to the F. W. A. regional office in October, the full amount of the 1943 allotment was not paid until January 1944.

Our records show that a requisition requesting $3,252.52 for the period October 1, to December 31, 1943, was received in the F. W. A. regional office on October 18. The information submitted by the applicant established a need during that quarter for only $1,857.53. Approval for this amount was given by the F. W. A. regional office on November 9, and the check was issued by the Treasury disbursing office on November 11. It later appeared that the applicant had omitted, in error, expenses for the month of October and a requisition for an additional amount was received in the F. W. A. regional office on December 14; on December 29 the Treasury disbursing office issued a check for $862.88, which completed the amount required by the applicant for operations during 1943. Payments for operations during 1944 were made in the amount of $798.96 on February 3 and $4,551.31 on February 21.

It will be seen from the above information, all of which can be verified from an inspection of the F. W. A. and Treasury disbursement records, that Federal funds due were paid promptly when the justifying information was submitted by the local applicant, which in this case was the public-school system.

It is interesting to note that the writer of this letter is connected with the Civilian War Services of Saratoga Springs, N. Y. Last year an appropriation for State aid to wartime child-care facilities was made by the New York State Legislature and the administration of the funds turned over to the State war council. Saratoga Springs is eligible for such assistance. The committee on child care, development, and protection of the State war council approved the amount of $734.25 for the quarter beginning October 1, 1943, and $882.52 for the quarter beginning January 1, 1944. To date none of these State funds has been received by Saratoga Springs although months have gone by. It may be that there is some good reason for delay by the State authorities. But the charge of delay against this agency is not borne out by the record nor does it furnish a reason for the transfer of the control of these funds to the States which was proposed by the writer of the letter referred to by Mr. JUDD.

Sincerely yours,

FLORENCE KERR,
Assistant to the Administrator.

We All Know Lindsay Warren Is a Responsible Public Official

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following article from the April 1 issue of Labor indicates what is taking place during this war. Certain agencies are continually calling the attention of the public to the profits of farmers when their total average income is only $3,000 to say nothing about the net income. The official study of Dr. Wylie Goodsell showed that a rather large percentage of the farmers of America made from 19 cents to 47 cents per hour in 1942.

Certain other groups and individuals that have accepted a 21.6 percent cost-of-living bonus on an overtime basis themselves on the first $2,900 of their $2,900 to $15,000 Federal salaries at the same time have insisted on freezing the below-average-income groups with 40 to 50 cents per hour wage. They even protested the 15-percent advance in wages provided by the Little Steel formula, for this below-average-income group.

The article follows:

PROFITEERS ARE GETTING AWAY WITH MURDER, WARREN SAYS—AIDED BY "CROOKS AND THIEVES" IN GOVERNMENT, COMPTROLLER CHARGES—BLASTS COST-PLUS CONTRACTS AS "DAMNABLE"

"A Government official, wearing the uniform of his country was arrested in New York recently with $15,000 in marked bills in his pocket."

That startling instance was recited by Lindsay C. Warren, Comptroller General, in testimony before the House Naval Affairs Committee this week as proof of his contention that Congress must keep a sharp eye on administration if war profiteers are not to bleed the taxpayers white.

"Some of these officials," he charged, "have been found to be just plain crooks and thieves. We have been assured that the bad and the inefficient have been weeded out, but that is just not so."

Warren's statement was one of the most sensational yet made before a congressional committee—and that is saying a mouthful. He declared that profiteers "are on the loose" and are milking Uncle Sam for all he is worth. Worse still, he added, many are getting away with it.

Warren, before taking over the Comptroller job, was a Member of the House from North Carolina and was respected as a hard-working, conscientious, and extremely able conservative. The General Accounting Office, which he heads, was set up before the sorry experiences of the last war had grown cold, to check disbursements and to see that the Government got something like an even break in ordinary business dealings.

G. A. O. OUT OF PICTURE

As far as war contracts are concerned, however, the G. A. O. is out of the picture, and will be kept out if bills now before Congress are approved. They provide for the settlement of the war claims virtually on the say-so of the contractors.

Although billions of dollars are involved, the G. A. O. is restricted to a mere comparison of the figures on vouchers and the amounts agreed upon by contractors and Government officials with whom settlements are made.

It was to protest against this proposed set-up that Warren appeared before the committee, and he confronted a rather hostile audience. The committee seems to take the position that it is more important that contract settlements be made speedily than that the taxpayers shall be protected.

BLASTS COST-PLUS PACTS

"Ruthless gouging," Warren declared, is going on under cost-plus contracts, which were branded as "the most extravagant, the most vicious, and the most damnable form of business skulduggery."

"Of course," he conceded, "war itself is wasteful and large expenditures are to be expected, but that," he contended, "is no reason why ordinary prudence should be thrown to the winds. Even on the battlefields," he emphasized, "army generals try to spare their men."

"Like these generals," he asserted, "the contracting officers of the Government should make an effort to spare the public's money. Every dollar spent should show a dollar's worth in return."

JUST PLAIN CROOKS

Warren insisted with great vehemence that every contract settlement should be audited. He cited huge payments already made by "officials who made the contracts sitting across the table from the contractors."

It was at this point he declared that some of the officials were "just plain crooks, more interested in fattening the profits of contractors than in safeguarding the taxpayer."

"The tragedy is that no one seems disturbed about it," Warren said, explaining that when such matters are brought to public attention they are met with a "shrug of the shoulder and condoned under the specious plea that we have got a war to win."

LIKE OLIVER TWIST

Driving home the matter of laxity, Warren revealed that in cases where his office has had power to toss out illegal claims the contracts have been revised and the Government recovered large sums.

"If somebody would come to us and say the Government shouldn't pay for something, we would be the most surprised people in the world," Warren declared. "However, with the audacity of Oliver Twist, they come and say, 'Please, sir, we want more.'"

Warren hasn't concluded his presentation. When he again appears before the committee he promises to give chapter and verse details of how Uncle Sam is being hornswoggled on both sides of the bargaining table.

Commander Corydon M. Wassell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. F. NORRELL
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a great day for me. This war has produced many heroes and heroines, but I am especially proud of the outstanding record of heroism which one of my constituents has made.

Commander Corydon M. Wassell of St. Charles, Arkansas County, Ark., after graduating from medical college entered the practice of medicine at Tillar, Drew County, Ark. Tillar is in my home county.

It has been my privilege and honor to have been acquainted with Commander Wassell, therefore, for a good many years, during which time he has been one of my very warm personal friends. It has been my pleasure also to meet Mrs. Wassell and their children. He has two sons in the service and his daughter is married to a major presently stationed in the State of Texas.

You may recall about 2 years ago when the President referred to the outstanding acts of heroism of Commander Wassell. I listened to the President's address that evening and it was a source of pleasure and pride when I heard President Roosevelt tell of the commander's heroism. He stated that Dr. Wassell, a former missionary to China, was a "simple, modest, retiring man who was assigned to care for wounded men from the cruisers Houston and Marblehead in Java. Twelve, he said, were so badly wounded that they could not be removed when the Japanese came, and Dr. Wassell refused to abandon his men, remaining with them knowing that he would be captured by the enemy. The President further said:

But he decided to make a desperate attempt to get the men out of Java. He asked each of them if he wished to take the chance, and every one agreed.

He first had to get the 12 men to the sea coast, 50 miles away. To do this, he had to improvise stretchers for the hazardous journey. The men were suffering severely, but Dr. Wassell kept them alive by his skill and inspired them by his own courage. As the official report said, "Dr. Wassell was almost like a Christlike shepherd devoted to his flock."

On the sea coast, he embarked the men on a little Dutch ship. They were bombed and machine gunned by waves of Japanese planes. Dr. Wassell took virtual command of the ship, and by great skill avoided destruction, hiding in small bays and inlets. A few days later, Dr. Wassell and his little flock of wounded men reached Australia safely. He now wears the Navy Cross of Honor.

Dr. Wassell's friends were not surprised when they heard the President utter these words, because we knew that he was not only a great physician and surgeon but that he was courageous, kind-hearted, and that under no circumstances would he leave a post of duty, but would always go far beyond the line of duty for his fellowman and his Nation. I am told that his superior officers insisted on his getting out of that theater of war, as they expected the Japs to close in at any minute, but as above stated he refused to do so, remaining with his men.

On May 6, 1942, I had something to say with reference to Commander Wassell's heroism, and it would serve no useful purpose to review at this time what I said then, as recorded at page A1656 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. However, during the past 2 years a book has been written on the life of Commander Wassell entitled "The Story of Dr. Wassell," by James Hilton and Paramount Pictures, Inc., under the able direction of Mr. Cecil B. DeMille, has made a moving picture of the life of Commander Wassell bearing the same title. This picture was shown to the Arkansas delegation in Congress on March 22, and I believe it is the finest war picture I have ever seen. That picture is to be shown at Constitution Hall on April 1, and no one should fail to see it who can secure tickets. I understand that the proceeds of the sale of tickets will be given to worth-while public causes, no part going either to Commander Wassell or Paramount Pictures.

The first commercial showing is to be at Little Rock on or about April 26, and I am sure that Commander Wassell will be present on that occasion with many who took parts in the picture. This will be a great occasion for the people of Arkansas.

We are having a luncheon in the Speaker's dining room at 12:30 today in honor of Commander and Mrs. Wassell, presided over by Senator John L. McClellan, of Arkansas. Our senior Senator, Hon. Hattie Caraway, will be present. The luncheon is being given by the entire Arkansas delegation, and our guests will include Vice President Henry A. Wallace; Senator Alben Barkley, of Kentucky, the majority leader of the Senate; Hon. John W. McCormack, majority leader of the House; Hon. Eugene Casey, Special Executive Assistant to the President; Mrs. Joseph T. Robinson, widow of the late Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, and former majority leader of the Senate; Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, formerly of Little Rock, commanding general of the Army Service Forces; Admiral C. M. Cooke, Jr., of Fort Smith; Gen. Roy Porter, of Fordyce; Mr. and Mrs. Cecil B. DeMille; wives of the Arkansas delegation; and others. Speaker Rayburn was invited to attend, and has expressed his regrets that he shall not be able to be present.

They Do Their Part

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me, I desire to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a very revealing letter from an enlisted man now serving in the Solomon Islands. I do not recall when I have read anything more timely and pungent. A reading of this letter should bring home to each and every one of us a further realization that all is not well on the home front. Since Pearl Harbor, I have received scores of letters from men in the service. Those writing from Italy complain that there is too much politics in the conduct of that campaign, while those who write from the far Pacific complain that they do not have enough to do with. It would seem that the time is rapidly approaching when Congress must take a hand. The letter follows:

SOLOMON ISLANDS, February 25, 1944.

DEAR FRIEND: You ask me to give you some idea as to how the boys over here feel about the strikes in industry at home. I shall try to give you a fairly accurate picture, as gathered from asking about 75 men their feelings on the matter.

The truth is that many here are inclined to be more worried about the home front than we are about activities here at ringside. We know, positively, that we can take care of our end. We have proven that on many occasions, to ourselves, to our leaders, and to the home folks as well.

We also know that the production forces at home can, if they will, give every overseas unit all the help necessary for victory. But what gives us occasional worry is the news of strikes and shut-downs on the home front. We can't seem to understand such things. We can't conceive of our home fighters dropping out on us. It seems to us like an ammunition passer refusing to pass the ammunition to the ack-ack operators. It's comparable to an air unit neglecting to give support to advancing ground troops. Or truck, jeep, or ambulance drivers refusing to carry out their assignments during an attack.

Of course, things like I just mentioned could not happen here—or elsewhere on the fighting front. Not a man over here would even think of doing such a thing. His pride, his patriotism, his sense of duty to his mates and his loved ones at home, his manliness and courage, his training—in short, his Americanism—would never permit him to betray a comrade. We all know that every man who shirks here not only betrays his comrades in arms but also the loved ones at home for whom he is supposed to be fighting.

So every man on the fighting front overseas just naturally does his share, and more too, with only two thoughts in mind—victory and going home.

We cannot understand why this same all-out spirit does not prevail at home just as it does in this forsaken part of the world.

In our branch of the service we have a word which is used to describe any group, or mass, insubordination. The word is mutiny. A group is two or more. The penalty for mutiny is death. The same unpleasant penalty may be carried out against any man who neglects duty in various other ways. These crimes carry the extreme penalty because they are extreme offenses. They may easily result in the loss of a battle, a ship, a plane, or cost the lives of many other men.

A shut-down of the factories producing war material may, just as easily, result in the same consequences. We believe there is no difference between neglect of duty here and neglect of duty on the equally vital home front. We see no difference between mutiny out here and mutiny at home. We do not think there should be mutiny on either front.

It is certain that the home front would be in a nasty mess if it did not have the fighting forces in front. It is just as certain that we would be in a just as nasty a mess if we did not have the home front to give us backing. Sometimes we feel that this end of the deal is just a bit more difficult—just a mite more discouraging. But neither front can long hold up without the full support of the other. As far as the ultimate result of this horrible war is concerned—the home front is equally important with the battle front.

We do not believe that the home fighter should be permitted to let down any more than the war-zone fighter.

We are fully cognizant of the fact that one of the things we are fighting for is the privilege of labor to strike. We know, too, that another thing we are fighting against is the abuse of power. We believe that the loss of production of war materials due to strikes is a result of the abuse of power by organized labor.

Men in military service have no privilege of striking—in wartime or peacetime. They do not want such a privilege. All they want is victory—and to go home. We have the idea, and we may be mistaken, that men on the home front should be denied the strike privilege while our country, homes, and our freedom are in jeopardy.

We believe that it would do our workingmen little benefit to win a strike now only to lose the privilege of striking later.

We all agree that something should be done to increase the wage of every worker so that he may be able to adequately meet the rising cost of living. But we think it should be done by other means than strikes.

In short, we believe that no American has the moral right to go on strike at a time when such an action definitely imperils the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

The loss of a tank, a plane, a gun, a ship on the home front is even worse than such losses here. Any equipment lost here has at least had its chance to get in a few licks at the enemy.

The working hours of the servicemen run around the clock. Seven days a week, month in, and month out. We never hear of overtime, time and a half, or double time. Frequently we are on duty 24 or more hours at a stretch. We may gripe about it but we do it and are happy to have done it for the cause—for the general benefit of humanity.

We know that prices have risen in the States, perhaps considerably more in proportion than have wages. But if that is true for the man in industry, so is it also true for the man in service.

The men who are in the combat service would like to ask some of the discontented men in the production service the following questions. These questions are specially meant for those who would vote to go on strike in time of war:

Have you, in line with your industrial duties, spent 50 days at sea, jammed in the stinking, steaming holds of a ship, with 8 men sandwiched into a space smaller than husbandrymen recommend for 1 chicken?

Have you stood, suffocating in a life preserver, waiting, waiting, in the dim light of dawn or dusk, for the torpedo to strike; or with grim and anxious faces turned skyward—waiting, ready to jump if yonder plane turns out to be the enemy?

(Let me say right here, that all of the stars in azure skies, there are none so lovely, so brilliantly beautiful, so downright gorgeous and friendly, as that grand star painted on the underwing of Uncle Sam's aircraft.)

Have you landed at night, on a lonely isle, not knowing what to expect—in a driving rain, and set up your pup tent in pitch-black darkness—and had the rats, lizards, and pests of all kinds, run over and around you all night?

Have you awakened in the morning to find that wild cattle and men had been there before you, and the nasty evidence of their being there was smeared on your poncho and your clothing?

Have you pitched your tent within a few feet of a long-dead animal carcass and been too busy with other matters to move either the tent or the rotten remains?

Have you gone many long hours with no water for drinking or bathing?

Have you gone to bed only to find that rats and lizards had moved in before you, some of which were large enough to dispute your right to be there?

Have you been jarred from the deep sleep of exhaustion and run naked, to a muddy, slimy, pest-infested foxhole?

Have you carried your food to a pigpen and eaten, standing or sitting in ankle-deep mud?

Have you felt so hungry that you were sure you could almost eat a horse muffin—and almost like it?

Have you gone about the area with a sharp nail fixed in the end of a stick and with it speared up the pitiful remains of your mates?

Have you gone week on week with no word from your loved ones?

Have you kept right on working and doing your share when you knew that thousands of men at home, who should be also doing their share, were not doing it?

There are many other similar questions we could ask, but surely these are sufficient to put over our point. We are not complaining about our lot in this war. Not in the least. In fact, we all think that our outfit is quite lucky as we have it very pleasant as compared to many others.

Finally, we feel we should remind any powerful group that power is a very dangerous thing. Hitler was a great guy, for Germany, until he went nuts with the power he had and abused that power. The same thing goes for pickle puss Mussolini, and for the yellow man of Tokyo and, for some others I could mention, disaster is in the offing simply because of abuse of power.

We know that the unions—organized labor—have been the finest of boons for labor itself.

We also know that all which has been won for the workingman may easily be lost through the improper and unpatriotic use of power

Power is a disastrous thing in the wrong hands.

Signal Honor Conferred Upon Elmer H. Davis, Director of the Office of War Information

---

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a signal honor was bestowed today on Elmer Davis, Director of the Office of War Information, when the Sons of Indiana of New York City conferred upon him their distinguished service award for being "the outstanding Washington Hoosier in the United States of America Government." The selection of Mr. Davis for this honor was made in a voting contest in which he ran away from all competitors.

Mr. Everett Watkins, representative of the Indianapolis Star and a prominent member of the corps of Washington correspondents, and I were chosen by the Sons of Indiana of New York to present to Mr. Davis a scroll testifying to the action taken by the society in designating him as the favorite of the Indianians residing in New York and the presentation took place at Mr. Davis' office in the Social Security Building, this city, at 10:30 o'clock this forenoon.

My address in presenting the award was as follows:

Mr. Davis and ladies and gentlemen, my friend and comrade of the fourth estate, Everett Watkins, and I are here to perform one of the most pleasant assignments ever given to us. Back in 1942 the Sons of Indiana in New York conducted a contest to select the Hoosier who had done the most for his State and country while living in Washington. Elmer Davis led the field with 4,400 points, with Admiral Ingersoll a good second and Bill Batt and Paul McNutt fighting it out for third place. Voting in the contest were 650 Sons of Indiana in New York, 200 Hoosiers in Washington, and 675 editors of newspapers back in Indiana.

An ornate scroll recording the result of the contest was prepared for presentation to Mr. Davis but, as we all know, Mr. Davis had been rather busy in Washington in recent years—too busy to go to New York to have the scroll presented to him there—and since Mahomet could not go to the mountain the mountain has been sent over to Washington with instructions to Mr. Watkins and me to present it to Mr. Davis.

One of the conditions of the presentation, explicitly set forth in the letter of instructions from Col. William H. Rankin, president of the Sons of Indiana of New York, was that I must make a speech. Now in order to be entirely fair to Colonel Bill I will say that he never heard me speak. If he had he probably would have modified that instruction and saved you all from the punishment that is now about to be visited upon you. Whatever your reaction to my speech may be I beg you not to hold it against Colonel Rankin, but you may well say, "Lord, forgive him for he knew not what he did."

I have a very vivid recollection of the voting contest referred to, for I was an "also ran." Come to think of it, I was an "also also ran." There were numerous "also rans" and still more "also also rans," but among all of them I have not heard one word of dissent or disapproval over the fact that the award went to that sturdy, sterling, Spartan son of Indiana, whom we hail as chief.

When I think of the panorama of exciting and turbulent events of the last few years in which Mr. Davis has been a storm center I am reminded of Spartacus at Capua:

"Ye call me chief, and ye do well to call him chief who for 12 long years has met upon the arena every shape of man or beast the broad empire of Rome could furnish and who never yet lowered his arm. If there be one among you who can say that ever in public fight or private brawl (of course the 'private brawl' part does not apply to Mr. Davis) my actions did belie my tongue let him stand up and say it. O Rome, Rome, thou has been a tender nurse to me. Aye, thou hast given to that poor, gentle, timid shepherd lad who never knew a harsher tone than a flute note, muscles of iron and a heart of flint; taught him to drive the sword through plaited mail and links of rugged brass and warm it in the marrow of his foe, to gaze into the glaring eyeballs of the fierce Numidian lion even as a boy upon a laughing girl."

With a few amendments, such as changing the word "Rome" to "Washington" this ancient classic of literature fits Mr. Davis like a glove. I have seen him gaze into the glaring eyeballs of fierce antiadministration

Congressmen without twitching an eyelash and I have many times witnessed the iron determination with which he stood for what he believed to be right without even a thought of compromising a hair's breadth on principle.

Mr. Davis has met every challenge with honor and forthrightness and the arrows of his enemies have crashed and broken on his shield. The attacks on him have been like ocean spray dashing on a rock-bound coast. When the spray vanishes into nothingness, the rugged outlines of the rock-bound coast still remain. Or we might liken these attacks to a gust of wind and snow beating upon a high peak of the Alpine range. When the gust dies down the peak remains.

"Or like the snowflake on the river, a moment white, then gone forever."

When the snowflake disappears on the bosom of the river, the river continues to flow in majesty to the sea. (In parentheses let me say that the only trouble with this latter simile is that a large part of the flake that has been hurled at Elmer Davis is not exactly white, but much of it has been considerably discolored.)

I shall not attempt to present a biographical sketch of Mr. Davis on this occasion. You will find plenty of those in Who's Who and other books of reference. I feel especially warm toward him because he and I are both products of the White Water Valley of Indiana which I think both of us will agree is one of the most divinely entrancing and beautiful locations on the globe, especially in the fishing season. The town of Aurora is his honored birthplace. I was born in a log cabin farther up the valley and was raised amidst the tall corn of Fayette County. So in a manner of speaking he and I are brothers in the same lodge and like all Hoosiers I am immensely proud of Elmer Davis. If I had time I might dwell on some of the high spots of his life such as his winning a Rhodes scholarship, his perfectly admirable accomplishments as reporter, correspondent, editor, and broadcaster; the books he has written, etc., and I might weave from his highly successful career one of the real romances of American achievement, illustrating what a boy can do in this free country of ours when he hitches his wagon to a star, but for the purposes of this speech I shall content myself with a brief reference to what he has done successfully, what he is still doing successfully and what he will continue to do successfully, if Congress gives him proper support, to serve humanity in this most crucial period in the history of the world.

The Director of War Information is America's minister of propaganda. It is as America's leading propagandist, the generalissimo of the propaganda forces of this great Nation, that Mr. Davis is rendering a service of inestimable value to humanity.

Wars are not won entirely by bullets and cold steel. The right sort of propaganda, in which the rule of kindness is a predominant element, may be a great factor in winning wars. The sort of propaganda to which I refer as the right sort is the sort that has its wellsprings in the warmth of our humanitarianism, in our honesty of purpose, and our sincere earnestness to serve mankind. Propaganda of the right kind is often more effective in winning wars than big guns and battleships.

The main difference between the propaganda of the Axis Powers and the propaganda directed by Mr. Davis is that the Axis propaganda is a propaganda of falsehood and deceit, while Mr. Davis' propaganda is a propaganda of truth and as surely as God is in His Heaven the truth will finally prevail.

As rapidly as he can do so with the means at his disposal Mr. Davis is getting across to the grief-stricken, war-strafed people of the world the idea that there is the prospect of the dawn of a better day if they will unite on the principles of mutual helpfulness and understanding which are offered by the United Nations as a basis of world readjustment. Every step of progress he makes in that direction gives moral strength to the Allied cause and hastens the day of the collapse of Axis tyranny. Anyone who has the slightest doubt on this point should take note of what happened in Tunisia when hundreds of Germans who surrendered stated that they had been influenced to do so by O. W. I. leaflets which they had on their persons when they came into our camp.

The essence of military power is its destructiveness. It is created to destroy. It reduces to rubble the priceless heritages of the ages and in its relentless path the flower of youth withers and fades.

Propaganda is constructive and not destructive. It never widowed a single wife nor orphaned a single child. Every dollar judiciously invested in propaganda is a dollar invested to save the lives of our precious boys.

To General Eisenhower and the other commanders in the field is committed that grim part of the war that depends on the arbitrament of arms. To Mr. Davis is committed that part of the war that appeals to reason and conscience and all of the hopes and aspirations of the human heart. In this great global war, with the destiny of civilization trembling in the balance, both approaches are necessary and both are mighty and impelling. While we are spending billions upon billions to kill people I feel that it is desperately short-sighted to deny or begrudge to Mr. Davis the relatively few millions necessary to carry on his fine endeavors in the service of humanity. The Sons of Indiana who present this scroll have sensed his true worth. The State of Indiana, from which he sprang, is proud of him and I have no doubt that when the moving hand of time records its endorsement he will be given his true place in history.

The text of the scroll, presented in a beautiful framework to Mr. Davis, is as follows:

THE SONS OF INDIANA OF NEW YORK

PROCLAMATION

*1942 distinguished service award for leading all other Washington Hoosiers in the United States of America Government

Quite some years ago, the exact time not being essential, a tall, gangling youth began making himself useful in the office of the Dearborn Independent at Aurora, Ind.

He has continued to make himself useful since that time—so useful, in fact, that our great President and Commander in Chief has seen fit to take this Hoosier and entrust to him the full responsibility of keeping the people of the Nation informed on war news and developments.

From the banks of turbulent Laughery Creek to the banks of the calm Potomac; from the common schools of southern Indiana to the diploma from Oxford (England); from printer's devil to a Nation's editor, he remains a Hoosier. We salute you, Elmer Davis, Director of Office of War Information.

Your fellow Hoosiers honor you. They wish you well. Continue to give the news and publish the truth to the world until every man joins with our own immortal James Whitcomb Riley to say—

"For them 'at learnt at last what's right and fittin', it's a good world."

The Sons of Indiana of New York: William H. Rankin, president; B. K. Moffitt, vice president; H. M. Schackelford, chairman, War Service Committee; John W. O'Harrow, vice chairman; George B. Wellbaum, founder; Robert G. Spencer, treasurer; Jerry K. Brennan, secretary; Everett C. Watkins, Washington correspondent.

* This 1942 distinguished service award is given to you as a result of a poll of 650 members, Sons of Indiana of New York, 200 Hoosiers in Washington, and 675 editors of newspapers back home in Indiana. You led by a large margin—all other Hoosier nominees now in the service of United States of America in Washington.

The American Federation of Labor Stands Foursquare Behind the Serviceman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 29, 1944

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I offer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a splendid article which appeared in the recently released March issue of the American Federationist, the voice of organized labor, under the title or caption of "Labor Fights for the Serviceman," an article from the able pen of the well-known writer, Harry Malisoff.

As this article, if widely circulated, as reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will insure, will do much to clear away a misunderstanding in respect to labor's real attitude toward the serviceman, to bring a somewhat belated credit to those to whom credit is long overdue, its inclusion in the RECORD, this in the light of organized labor's magnificent performance in the production of munitions, materials, instrumentalities, and engines of war, would constitute a most gracious tribute to one of the greatest and most effective of our patriotic groups, the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. Speaker, the unanimous consent of the membership having been accorded me, I am happy to be able to hand the article to which I have just referred to the Public Printer for reprinting in compliance with my request. It is the following:

LABOR FIGHTS FOR THE SERVICEMAN

(By Harry Malisoff)

By all current signs American labor intends to stand second to none in helping our returning ex-servicemen obtain jobs and other needed benefits. Trade unions everywhere are announcing their determination to back the ex-servicemen without reservation, and have already taken action on their behalf in many ways. Such action cannot be too soon, for already more than 1,300,000 men have been mustered out. Half a million of these have been released on certificates of disability.

Last year the executive council of the American Federation of Labor stated that "every possible aid must be given to the returned soldier." More recently the teamsters' organ of Washington State insisted that the men who have served their country must be returned to good jobs when the shooting ceases. "If jobs are not available at once," said this labor publication, "the veterans must be given whatever benefits are necessary; they must not be forced to sell apples on the streets corners. * * * This is a teamsters' union policy—second only to the winning of this war."

At its meeting last December the executive council of the International Association of Machinists decided that "any veteran of the present war who is seeking entrance into the International Association of Machinists, whether previously a member or not, who has accumulated experience and now enters industry" will be accepted into membership without being required to pay any initiation fee. All the veteran will have to do is present evidence of his honorable discharge. In addition, the I. A. M. "will give sympathetic cooperation in the retraining of veterans and assist in fitting them into industrial life."

Last month the boilermakers' convention called for legislation to insure that jobs at standard wages and working conditions are provided for ex-soldiers. This would prevent repetition of the bitter experience of so many veterans of World War No. 1 who, when offered their old jobs, were told that their wages would be lower than what they had been.

Collective-bargaining agreements contain provisions for the protection of wage earners inducted into the armed forces. Labor has insisted upon the inclusion of such protective clauses. Usually these specify that the demobilized soldier is to be restored to his job promptly and with full seniority and other rights.

While the returning serviceman can be sure that labor will go all out to help him fulfill his supreme need—a job—many of the veteran's needs are a recognized responsibility of government. Such needs as social security, disability pensions, hospitalization, education, medical care, and others can be met only by the Federal Government.

Labor saw early that legislative action on these matters was vital and has stood out as one of the foremost supporters of such action. The American Federation of Labor Convention of 1942, which came when this country had been in the war but 10 months, called upon the Federal Government to make provisions to "finance unemployment benefits to be paid demobilized soldiers pending their hunt for jobs." The convention also insisted that Washington see to it that the old-age insurance equities of workers who had gone into uniform were maintained.

Following through, the federation secured the introduction of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, under which ex-servicemen as well as civilians would be given the benefits of a far-reaching social-security program.

In coming out wholeheartedly for the returning serviceman, labor manifests its resistance to ill-intentioned efforts to create a cleavage between those on the home front and those on the battlefronts. Persons who seek to pit Americans in uniform against Americans in mufti argue that soldiers and civilians are unrelated groups with different interests. The official journal of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers answers as follows:

"In a democracy, civilians left at home may accurately and frankly speak of the men at the front as 'our' soldiers. With 11,000,000 in the armed forces, there is no family in the United States untouched by the costs of combat. It is for this reason that there should be no division of idea or of sentiment between soldiers at the front and the soldiers at home. Persons who undertake to widen the gap between the two arms of the population are performing a disservice to the public. Our soldiers are still our boys. They are performing proudly as the sons of freemen should perform."

A recent computation disclosed that the total number of American Federation of Labor members in uniform exceeded 1,350,000. The other branches of organized labor surely have at least another 1,000,000 men in the service. With rural people—even those who are single, healthy, and decidedly young—exempt from the draft, there can be no question that the armed forces consist chiefly of city wage earners—organized and unorganized, industrial and white collar—and the sons of wage earners.

Those who seek to create artificial divisions between soldiers and civilians often insinuate that it is unfair to give special attention to the problems of ex-servicemen. They accuse disabled veterans of exploiting their status, of seeking privileged treatment. The hope is that such talk will stir up mutual hostility and block, delay, or curtail Federal pensions and other benefits for veterans.

However, labor refuses to go for this bait. Labor knows that the members of the armed forces have been compelled to make great sacrifices and that they have special problems. Labor understands that there is no truth to the charge that either soldiers or civilians are selfish. Labor sees clearly that both soldiers and civilians have real needs which must be met.

Often overlooked is the fact that the success of veterans in securing pensions from the days of the American Revolution onward encouraged the development of social legislation for the rest of the population. Perhaps that is the real reason why veterans are condemned by peacetime critics. Their crime is not that they tried to satisfy their own needs but that they set a precedent for the country as a whole.

As the war proceeds, increasing interest is being manifested in legislative action on behalf of the returning soldiers. Already 1,500 bills on this subject have been introduced in Congress. These bills would amend old provisions for the ex-serviceman and also introduce new ones. Alert labor organizations are following these developments closely. This discussion will consider the needed legislation along with a brief description of the provisions for veterans now on the statute books.

The World War No. 2 veteran is entitled to disability pensions, mustering-out payments, vocational rehabilitation, hospitalization, medical care, and other benefits. His survivors are entitled to death gratuity benefits, death pensions, national service life insurance, and other benefits. Let us consider these provisions in some detail.

Consider first the chief worry of the serviceman: "What will happen to my family if I am killed in action?" In that event, his survivors at home receive a death gratuity payment and a monthly service-connected death pension. The amount of the death gratuity is 6 months of the soldier's pay. The monthly pension is payable to the widow and dependent parents during their lifetime and to children until the age of 18 (to 21 if they remain in school). A widow gets $50 a month and a motherless child $25, with additional amounts for other children up to a total of $100. A dependent parent gets $25.

Survivors of a deceased soldier are also entitled to national service life insurance carried by him. Over 11,000,000 servicemen have purchased this insurance, which is sold by the Government. They pay premium rates that are very low compared to private insurance. From $1,000 to $10,000 worth of insurance may be bought. The average policy is about $9,000 in value. Beneficiaries are paid the insurance in monthly instalments.

A second concern of the World War No. 2 serviceman is expressed in the question, "Suppose I return home disabled and cannot earn my living as before?" In that event he is entitled to a service-connected disability pension. Service-connected means that the disability occurred during active military service. Disabilities present before induction are also service-connected when aggravated in active service. Pensions for disabilities of a general nature vary from $10 a month for 10 percent (partial) disability to $100 a month for 100 percent (total) disability. When there are specific disabilities, such as the loss of a hand or foot or eyesight, additional amounts are received up to a total of $250 a month. A pension of $150 a month is paid to ex-servicemen who are so helpless as to require regular aid and attendance.

Disabled World War No. 2 veterans who are eligible for pensions are also entitled to vocational rehabilitation under a law passed in March 1943. The law aims to help ex-servicemen get jobs by training them to overcome the handicap of their disability. During training the pension amounts are at least $80 a month for single men and $90 for married ones, with $5 extra for each child and $10 for each dependent parent.

A third concern is, "Will I get my job back?" Some of the steps taken by labor to assure that the ex-serviceman gets his old job have been touched upon. The Selective Service Act calls for reemployment of the ex-serviceman if he applies for his old job within 40 days after discharge and is able to perform his duties.

Unfortunately, some employers are seizing upon the ability clause as an excuse to refuse to rehire ex-servicemen discharged on account of various disabilities, among which psychoneurosis is very common. Psychoneurosis is just a fancy name for an individual's inability to adjust to the rigors of Army life. Yet workers discharged for this reason are met upon return with the question, How do we know you can do your old job? Nothing is more unfair than the attitude of employers and employment interviewers that a man's unfitness for the severe Army duties demonstrates his unfitness for his former civil work. It is vastly to labor's credit that already in many such cases it has vigorously "gone to bat" for the veteran whom the employer sought to turn away and persuaded the latter to change his mind.

Soldiers' fourth concern is: After I am discharged, how will I support myself and my family until I can start on a job? This is a serious problem. There have been many cases where even crippled soldiers were discharged and placed on trains bound for home with no money in their pockets. Since their service pay and family allowances ceased at the same time, they were totally unable to meet family expenses or even to buy civilian clothes. Many ex-servicemen have been forced to seek public or private relief.

This situation has now been partially alleviated by inadequate mustering-out payments which Congress adopted a few weeks ago. Mustering-out payments merely help the ex-serviceman to get started in civilian life, and cannot meet the needs of ex-servicemen who suffer unemployment of any duration. Veterans of less than 60 days' service receive $100. Veterans of longer service get $200, or $300 if they were overseas. These payments are inadequate. Most unjustly, they are denied to veterans discharged because they are over 38.

Ex-servicemen with service-connected disabilities are also entitled to hospitalization and medical, surgical, and dental services, in facilities of the Veterans' Administration. They can receive artificial limbs and other appliances for cripples. All veterans are eligible for hospitalization or care in a veteran's home if they cannot pay for private treatment.

It should be borne in mind that these veterans' benefits are noncontributory. Except for his life-insurance premiums, the serviceman makes no monetary contribution for the benefits. In order to be eligible for the benefits, the serviceman needs only his veteran's status or the service connection of his injury. But his right to all the benefits is nonetheless firmly established.

What are the shortcomings of these provisions?

It is not enough to have a disability pension law on the statute books. The law is worthless if it is not properly carried out. Labor people, who have seen progressive labor laws in certain of the States virtually nullified through failure of legislatures to appropriate sufficient funds to enforce those laws, will appreciate the situation.

Recently the country was stunned by disclosures made in a survey of claims for disability pensions pending before the Veterans' Administration. It was revealed that 1,500 cases of battle casualties were without adequate provision as to compensation, medical care, training, and other needs. Though without income and unable to work, veterans have had to wait 6 months or more before their pension claims were acted upon. The excuses advanced were that the Army was slow in sending over the soldier's service papers and that the Veterans' Administration was unprepared to handle the unexpected avalanche of 250,000 claims.

The only solution to this problem now offered is to keep the disabled soldier in a service hospital until his claim is adjudicated, so that at least he will continue to receive his service pay, medical attention, and family dependents' allowances. This is a makeshift solution and evades the question of responsibility for the sloppy administration that causes the trouble. The disabled soldier does not want to lie around in a hospital far from home while office functionaries tangle themselves up in red tape.

Administration as usual is persecution of the disabled soldier. In these days when social security handles millions of claims in short periods, is there any reason why the Veterans' Administration should not be able to process the 30,000 disability claims now filed each month? Whatever is needed to bring this about—more rating boards, congressional appropriations, better cooperation between the Army and the Veterans' Administration—should be forthcoming immediately.

Similarly, although there are laws granting hospitalization to the ex-servicemen, there are not yet enough hospital beds to meet wartime needs. At present the Veterans' Administration has some 67,000 hospital beds, of which about 10,000 are vacant. These facilities were designed for the use of veterans of former wars and our peacetime forces of less than 300,000. Today there are already well over 10,000,000 in our armed forces. And the impending invasion of Europe will undoubtedly bring large-scale casualties. Yet the Veterans' Administration now plans to expand the number of hospital beds to only 100,000 and is on record with an estimate that an ultimate total of 300,000 beds, including those in service hospitals, will be quite sufficient.

In 1935 the national commander of the American Legion told the American Federation of Labor convention of that year that when World War No. 1 ended the country was without facilities to hospitalize the wounded or domicile those whose minds had been shattered by the shock of combat. Must history repeat itself?

No American wishes large-scale casualties, but they have been predicted by our highest military authorities. Hospitals cannot be put into operation overnight. "Too little and too late" does not characterize our war-production program; for the sake of safety, our production quotas call for more than enough ships, planes, guns, and tanks, regardless of expense. Why then should a pinch-penny policy be followed toward disabled soldiers? Must thoughts of economy suddenly be injected where human beings are involved?

Administration of disability pension claims should be liberal as well as speedy. Demands are being made for discontinuance of the practice whereby, at the time of discharge, disabled soldiers sign statements to the effect that their disabilities existed prior to their induction. Although they may compromise just future pension claims, soldiers sign such statements, even though untrue, because they fear that refusal to sign will delay their return home. The practice is reminiscent of the high-pressure methods employed by unscrupulous adjusters to induce injured workers to sign away their rights to workmen's compensation.

Of obvious importance is the necessity for preparing now to meet the educational needs of the young soldiers whose schooling was interrupted by the war. They should be given every opportunity and encouragement to continue their education under Federal Government auspices after they are demobilized. Even those who had already left school prior to induction should be encouraged to perfect the skills they acquired while in service or to continue former education. The educational prcgram, by deferring the entrance of many ex-servicemen into the labor market, will be helpful during the demobilization period when millions of men will be seeking work.

Another important need is for financial assistance by way of loans and credit to ex-servicemen so that they may reestablish their homes, farms, and businesses or purchase essential tools and equipment. Many servicemen have had to give up their homes and move their families in with relatives. This disruption of normal American home life must not endure after the war. Many servicemen have had to liquidate their businesses. It is undesirable that the community should lose permanently the valuable assets represented by such small businessmen.

The question of mass unemployment of ex-servicemen is not yet touched upon by the present laws. After the last war many veterans were unemployed. Some of them were forced to beg for the price of a "flop" and to stand in line for free soup. The new generation of fighting men must not be subjected to such misery.

Following the close of the war, there is bound to be a measure of unemployment among the demobilized men as among demobilized war workers. It will take time to absorb the veterans into employment, especially when large numbers enter the labor market more or less together. Unemployment allowances should be provided until the ex-servicemen can be given jobs. The Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, sponsored by organized labor, provides for Federal benefits to unemployed ex-servicemen of from $12 to $30 a week for 26 weeks.

For the unemployed ex-serviceman, State unemployment compensation is no solution and is rapidly becoming a mockery. Most States froze the benefit rights of servicemen as of the time of induction. What did this mean? First, even if servicemen had enough earnings to qualify for unemployment benefits, the weekly amounts would vary greatly from State to State and generally prove inadequate. Second, by a new wrinkle in the compensation laws, servicemen can be disqualified from benefits because they left their employment not for a cause "attributable to the employer." Third, many servicemen will not have enough frozen rights to qualify for benefits at all. Fourth, large numbers of servicemen are not even covered under the laws.

Another gap in the provisions for ex-servicemen is the failure so far to protect their rights accumulated under old-age and survivors insurance. The Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill grants servicemen credit under old-age and survivors insurance for their period of military service. This means that they or their survivors will not find themselves disqualified from benefits or in receipt of reduced benefits on account of the loss of wage credits during service. Such protection was won by railroad labor through a 1942 amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act. Congress has no reason to delay similar action for those covered under the Social Security Act.

Of course, this raises the question of the many servicemen who are normally self-employed or agricultural, maritime, or domestic workers and who, therefore, are not covered under old-age and survivors insurance. We cannot give them credit, but let's give them coverage under social security. This, too, can be accomplished through the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

In fact, the wartime issue of adequate aid to the returning soldier has greatly emphasized the urgent need for immediate enactment of this measure. The extension of coverage to servicemen not now covered would be most timely. So would the bill's provisions for expanding the social-security system to cover the risk of disability.

There is a very close and important connection between disability insurance and disability pensions. The veterans of every former war have been entitled to non-service-connected disability pensions, which compensate for disabilities incurred after the veteran's period of military service. There has been considerable opposition to non-service-connected pensions, especially on the part of those who fought the introduction of social security. The veterans of previous wars were branded as raiders of the Federal Treasury. But their ability to secure these pensions was due to the fact that, in the absence of social security, there was always a real need for protection against invalidity of the wage earner. Since social security was as remote as a dream in the days of the veterans of former wars, they naturally sought action on their own behalf.

Today the situation in regard to World War No. 2 veterans is different because the foundation of social security has already been laid, and if extended to cover all risks will meet the basic minimum needs of veterans and civilians alike. Enactment of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill will give World War No. 2 veterans protection against peacetime disability along with civilians under the social-security system. In the meantime, the House of Representatives has voted to grant non-service-connected disability pensions to the ex-servicemen of this war. The proposed pensions would start at $50 a month and increase to $65 after 10 years of disability, or upon reaching the age of 65.

Obviously, then, full provision for the needs of both civilians and ex-servicemen requires the immediate expansion of the veterans' and social-security programs. Of course, opponents of liberalization view with alarm the cost that such expansion would entail. It is appropriate to recall that when social-security legislation was pending in 1935 these same people made dire predictions that social security would bankrupt the country. Other horrendous bogeys were conjured up. These bogeys failed to appear. Now they say that expansion of the programs will bring the bogeys. Therefore, they propose to keep the cost down by preventing expansion and denying needed benefits.

But reducing costs by ignoring needs and suffering is a solution which the American people no longer accept. The problem must be met in a manner worthy of our position as the foremost industrial nation; that is, through a program of jobs for the veterans of military service as well as for all veterans of war service at home. In other words, the solution is full employment in the post-war period, plus expanded veterans' benefits and expanded social security. That is the challenge. Will the people at home face it with battlefield courage and determination? Labor says "Yes."

Eulogy to Mrs. Annie Bates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following item, which appeared in the Sunday Telegram-News, of Lynn, Mass., on Sunday, March 26, 1944, concerning one of the finest mothers that ever lived, Mrs. Annie Bates, who recently passed away in the city of Salem, Mass., the mother of our able and capable colleague, Congressman GEORGE J. BATES, of Salem.

She was held in high admiration by her friends, neighbors, relatives, and asscciates not only in her home city but through the length and breadth of the entire Sixth Congressional District.

We, the Members of Congress, whether we are Democrat or Republican, or whether we are from the North, South, East, or West, extend to this popular Congressman from Massachusetts our sincere and heartfelt sympathy in this hour of bereavement with a sincere wish for courage and strength to sustain and comfort him in his great sorrow.

MRS. ANNIE BATES

"All that we are, and all that we ever hope to be, we owe to our sweet, lovely, little Irish mother," were the beautiful words of praise paid to his deceased mother by Congressman GEORGE BATES, of Salem.

There are volumes contained in that simple but sincere statement.

There is love and appreciation in every word.

It is a tribute paid to the memory of a devoted mother by a son who is aware of the tremendous part that his mother played in moulding his life into one of America's leading statesmen.

At the altar of her knee she murmured those priceless personality traits which blossomed into noble character in her children.

In their youth, she guided them skillfully and gently over the many hazardous obstacles strewn along life's highway.

In their childhood, she became the inspiration that made possible attaining their respective goals in life.

And now that her work on this temporal coil is done, she has gone to that reward which the Heavenly Father has prepared for those dear mothers who lived a life fashioned after the example left by the Mother of mankind.

Mrs. Annie (Burns) Bates was born in Ireland more than eight decades ago. She came to this country as did so many other Irish men and women because they saw in this new world the answer to their most cherished ambitions and heartfelt aspirations.

They came to America because they saw in this new land the opportunity to enjoy to an almost unlimited degree those God-given rights which were either denied or restricted in other countries throughout the world.

They came to America and enjoyed to the utmost those rights, and in return gave to America Ireland's greatest gifts of courage, ambition, love, loyalty, humor, faith, tenacity, and hope.

Mrs. Annie Bates will be missed by the citizens of Salem to whom she was endeared.

She will be missed by the citizens of her son's district who had come to know her and admire her.

She will be profoundly missed by her family who will never forget the loss which they have sustained.

But in their hearts have been erected monuments of love and appreciation that will become more beautiful and precious with the passage of time.

For in those monuments she will continue to live, for she "is not dead who lives in the hearts of those whom she leaves behind."

Ask the Bellhops?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, last week President Roosevelt when asked to make a definite statement as to our foreign policy, facetiously told the reporters to ask the bellhops in the Washington hotels. That answer the reporters and public were forced to accept.

A local paper brings notice of the death in action of Second Lt. Lisle P. Pullin, of Dowagiac, Mich. He, Corp. Gerald Turner, and Corp. Ernest Dohm gave their lives in the same week on the Italian battle front. Two other Dowagiac boys, Pvt. Vincent Aronld and Lt. Charles Bolton, were seriously wounded in the same battle area. I mention these names because all came in 1 week—from one small city.

Copies of the 6 dailies and of the more than 35 weeklies published in the district give other casualties listed, bring out with shocking force the hideousness, the terrible cost in young manhood, of this war.

Reading of where these young men were born, where they went to school, where they worked, of their parents, and of the wives and children of some, recalling my own boyhood, my school days, the birth of my children, my opportunities, I am forced to wonder why it is that these young men and hundreds of thousands of others like them throughout the country must die so far from home, in a strange land among strangers. Prayer is in my heart that soon some way, through victory, may be found to end this and all wars.

This is no time for frivolity and the President's light reply to the query as to what our foreign policy is to be, is no answer either to the 24 Republican Congressmen who have vigorously supported his interventionist foreign policy, nor to those who must do the fighting, to those who support them here at home.

We have sent billions of dollars' worth of materials to Russia, our ally in the war against the Germans. We have sent millions of men to Britain, our ally, against the Nazis and the Japs. We have sent some men, some materials to MacArthur in the South Pacific, to aid him in avenging those who were lost, those who were tortured by the Japs, to make sure that Japan will be conquered. We have been told that after the war is over we must join other nations in a super United States of the world where all will be harmonious and peace prevail.

Unfortunately, today, before the victory has been won, we find the war partners unable to agree among themselves. This week Russia entered into a new treaty with Japan. Though the Atlantic Charter promised all peoples the right to determine their own form of government, Russia apparently, without consulting either Britain or the United States of America, recognized Badoglio as the head of the Italian Government. That was a disappointment to Britain and to us.

Though the Atlantic Charter guaranteed the post-war freedom of Poland, it is evident that Russia intends to retain the major portion of that country.

The United States wants to feed the starving women and children of occupied conquered lands—Great Britain prevents. The United States first wanted to open the doors of Palestine to refugee Jews, but later Great Britain and those in control of our military policy decided against it. The controversy here and in Britain still goes on.

The foregoing is just a glimpse at a small part of the picture. It is sufficient to show, beyond question, that it is time that Stalin, Churchill, and Roosevelt get together, if possible agree upon the war's objectives, the demands which will be made by each nation when the conflict is over. Tell us what happened at Teheran.

MacArthur has recovered some of the islands which will be given back to Britain, to the Netherlands. We furnished some of the munitions which aided in retaking parts of Poland, which aided in carrying on the war against the Finns. We ask for no territory for ourselves, no reimbursement for the billions spent. Nothing can repay us for the lives lost. This war is being carried on throughout the world from three to nine thousand miles from home.

Rickenbacker, who should know, who has seen more of the battle front than any other man, tells us our casualties will exceed a million men. There is talk of drafting not only men but women for service here at home, requiring them to work wherever they may be sent. Our people are a free people, they have willingly paid their taxes, purchased War bonds, given their loved ones. They have the right to know now the objectives of this war and what is to be their part when victory has been won.

Our people, our men and women in the service are not asking the bellhops about our foreign policy, they are asking this administration and the President who heads it and who is asking for a fourth term.

Two Seminars Set To Knit Americas—Cultural Ties Group Sponsors Summer Sessions at Habana and Mexico Universities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following article from the Sunday, March 19, 1944, New York Times. I wish to add that Msgr. William Barry and Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, who for 4 years have been leaders of the Inter-American Seminars, are doing a patriotic service in introducing the young people of the United States to the values of university education in the good-neighbor republics. Monsignor Barry, chairman of the Committee on Cultural Relations with the American Republics and Canada, has recently been honored by an appointment to act as codirector of the Cuban-American Council of University Studies, while Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, professor of sociology at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., and visiting professor of social history at the University of Habana, is the only living United States citizen who is an honorary fellow of the Historical and Geographic Institute of Brazil. Since I know these two scholars personally and have been following the constructive nature of their work in the inter-American field, I take this occasion to emphasize the long-range, permanent value of this project, the inter-American Seminars:

TWO SEMINARS SET TO KNIT AMERICAS—CULTURAL TIES GROUP SPONSORS SUMMER SESSIONS AT HAVANA AND MEXICO UNIVERSITIES

MIAMI BEACH, FLA., March 18.—The fourth annual Inter-American Seminar of the Inter-American Institute will be held at the University of Havana for the 1944 summer session, Msgr. William Barry, Chairman of the Committee on Cultural Relations With the American Republics and Canada, and head of its university extension committee, announced here today.

Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, professor of sociology at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., and a member of the Historical and Geographic Institute of Brazil, has been named as seminar director. Dr. A. Lorenzo M. Danis, professor of social science at the University of Ottawa, has been invited to lead the Canadian delegation.

As in the past 2 years, the Cultural Relations Committee, composed of Protestants, Jews, and Catholics, will sponsor a similar seminar at the National University of Mexico.

The lay professors and students at Mexico City will be under the direction of Dr. Cyril Burke, professor of philosophy at Barry College for Women, while the religious teachers will be guided by Dr. Alcuin Heibel, former president of Mount Angel (Oreg.) College.

Monsignor Barry and Dr. Joseph B. Code, an alumnus of Louvain University, who is director of the Institute, are expected to inspect both seminars during tours that will take them to the National University of Costa Rica and the Inter-American University of Panama, where they will explore possibilities for extending the program.

Commenting on plans for extension of the seminar method as a means to promote "the spiritual phase" of the good-neighbor policy, Dr. Code termed it "the first step toward a deeper inter-American understanding."

"The current crisis in inter-American affairs demonstrates the value of a permanent, long-range policy," he said.

"Our objective is to establish organized nucleuses of scholars versed in Spanish, Portuguese, and French at the principal universities throughout Central and South America, including republics of the Caribbean such as Haiti and Santo Domingo.

"There is an acute need for centers of this character in Brazil, especially at Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo."

Cook County Leads State With 4-Cent "Penny" Milk for Its Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Daily News of March 29, 1944:

COOK COUNTY LEADS STATE WITH 4-CENT PENNY MILK FOR ITS SCHOOLS

In line with the demand on Monday by Representative RALPH CHURCH (Republican, Illinois) for a congressional investigation of the "overpayments for penny milk" in Chicago schools, examination of the records of the War Food Administration reveals that Cook County is the only large area in Illinois where 4 cents is the predominant price paid to dairies for school penny milk. With the exception of Winnebago, which has only 7 school milk programs at 4 cents, the other 56 counties in which the project is maintained show a predominant price ranging from 2 to 3.75 cents.

Cook County has 379 penny milk programs, and most of these are sponsored by the Chicago Board of Education. The price here to school children is 4 cents. The 27 school milk programs sponsored by the back-of-the-yards council get milk for 3 cents in Chicago and 9 other schools under the same sponsorship purchase milk for 3.5 cents. The Federal-State subsidy covers 3 cents of the basic cost; where half-pints of school milk cost 4 cents, the children have to pay the extra penny.

2 TO 3.75 CENTS

Federal records reveal that in the other industrial counties of the State where union wages are paid the predominant price of penny milk varies from 2 cents to 3.75 cents. In Kane County 13 school programs are able to buy milk at from 2 cents to 3.5 cents. Only 1 school in Kane had to pay 4 cents.

In Lake County the same W. F. A. records show that 7 schools buy milk for 3 cents a half-pint, 7 schools pay 3.6 cents, 13 schools pay 3.7 cents, 10 schools pay 4 cents, and 4 schools pay as high as 5 cents. Federal authorities had no comment to make on this distribution of prices within 1 county.

W. F. A. records for Peoria indicate that all penny milk is bought for 3 cents. Rock Island, with its 38 milk programs, shows a uniform cost of 3 cents, the same source revealed. In St. Clair County, which reflects the wage and labor condition of St. Louis, the price of penny milk is 3.7 cents with 2 schools being able to buy milk at 3 cents.

LESS THAN 3 CENTS

A number of counties showed penny milk being bought at less than 3 cents—Coles at 2.5 cents, De Witt at 2.7 cents (two schools paying 3.2 cents), Fulton at 2 cents (one school pays 3 cents), Hamilton at 2.7 cents, Hancock at 2 cents, Iroquois from 2 to 2.6 cents, Jersey at 2.5 cents, Kankakee at 2.3 cents (one school paying 3 cents), McLean with 14 schools buying milk at 2 cents (two pay 2.7 cents), Marshall at 2.7 cents, Mercer at 2 cents, Perry at 2 cents, Richland at 2 cents, and Tazewell at 2 cents (with two schools paying 2.7 cents).

In his address Monday in Washington, Representative CHURCH accused the Kelly-Nash machine in Chicago of snatching pennies from school children in the form of overpayments on penny milk. He said that where milk costs 4 cents a half pint, the child had to pay 1 cent, and this worked contrary to the aims of the school milk programs, since only about 60 percent of the children bought penny milk if they had to pay anything.

SEES POLITICAL PAY-OFF

According to Representative CHURCH'S speech on the floor of the House, 1-cent overpayments throughout the 10-month school year amounted to $250,000, and the Illinois Representative indicated that a slice of this money found its way from the dairies to the coffers of the Cook County Democratic Party in payment for the privilege of permitting the dairies to charge 4 cents for their half pints of milk when 3 and 3.5 cents were the true competitive prices.

Representative CHURCH called for a Federal investigation on the ground that Federal funds are involved.

Oklahoma Verdict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include here an editorial from the Washington Evening Star which I believe is a very good analysis of the recent congressional election in the Second Congressional District of Oklahoma.

The editorial follows:

OKLAHOMA VERDICT

Since the Republican political strategists saw fit to make the Roosevelt administration the principal issue in Tuesday's special election in Oklahoma's Second Congressional District, they will have to make the best of the verdict returned by the voters.

That verdict was clearly an endorsement of the President and his policies, the Democratic candidate winning by a margin of about 4,000 votes in a total of some 40,000. Nor is there anything to suggest that local rather than national considerations were the controlling factor in the balloting.

There is room for doubt, of course, as to the extent to which this result in Oklahoma in a traditionally Democratic district may be indicative of national sentiment. In 1936 the total vote in the district was 72,034, the Democrat winning by 19,414 votes. In 1938 the vote was 53,393, the Democratic majority being 22,723, and in 1940 the total vote was 80,891, with a Democratic margin of 19,721. By 1942, however, with a total vote of 42,934, the Democratic margin had shrunk to a mere 388 votes.

This formed one of the principal grounds of the anti-Roosevelt preelection trend forecasts, and now the Republicans have lost by 4,000 votes in the lightest total vote of recent years. If that is evidence of a trend, it is not of a kind to bring joy to the hearts of the G. O. P.

The Late Honorable James A. O'Leary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 21, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the House, I am sure, will grant me the indulgence of this moment to pay tribute to the late JAMES A. O'LEARY, one of our most beloved Members, who departed this life leaving a permanent record of accomplishment for and service to his country upon the journal of our proceedings during one of the critical periods in our history.

Jim, as he was universally known to us, had a genial, buoyant disposition, a ready smile, and lived up to his Irish inheritance with a fund of philosophical wit and humor. He was a true American, his patriotism reaching down to the soil and roots of our fatherland.

He served with my late esteemed predecessor, George N. Seger, and myself on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and was religiously devoted to the restoration and expansion of our merchant marine. Frequently Mr. Seger and myself rode with him back and forth to New York, discussing the future of our merchant marine in the pre-war days when the pioneering was being done for the great expansion program that made possible our present vast communication and supply lines reaching to every part of the globe.

Back in 1936 they, under the leadership of our distinguished chairman and other esteemed colleagues, laid the foundation for the winning of the war in peacetime commercial expansion.

Representing the maritime district of Staten Island and lower Manhattan, JIM O'LEARY fought mightily and successfully for the expansion of the shipbuilding industry in his community, but never at the expense of the national objective of the expansion program, only as a contribution to the greater cause.

The House, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries particularly, has lost a valuable Member. His children have been deprived of a devoted father, but their grief will be assuaged in the remembrance of the distinguished public service he has rendered his country.

Arizona Has Cooperated—Now We Hope All Others Will on Soldier Voting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] moved today to adopt the resolution concerning adjournment with an amendment, I sought to ask him the question whether the effect of it would not be to decrease the length of the recess period. I favored the adoption of the resolution in its new form because I see it does have the effect of shortening the recess period, which I think is desirable. Several gentlemen expressed the view that we should recess for only 3-day intervals and remain on the job because of the many important things to be taken care of. I appreciate that view, although I do want to get out home.

There are many weighty matters on which we need legislation, and some of these need to be acted on quickly. On my own part, I am concerned about the immediate consideration of the veterans' omnibus bill. I believe early action is demanded on it, and for that reason I have gone before the committee to propose an amendment which is in substance the same thing as the bill H. R. 3179, which I introduced months ago and on which I have scheduled hearings within less than a month. It was only recently that I was named chairman of a subcommittee of the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation to hold hearings on H. R. 3179. Because the Bureau of Reclamation officials have up to this moment been before the Appropriations Committee on the Interior bill, I had delayed hearings which would call for those same witnesses from the Bureau until after the current hearings had been closed. However, I have no pride of authorship, and if my proposal could be made an amendment to the "G. I. bill of rights," it would serve the same purpose as if separately enacted.

We have just listened today with great interest to the President's message concerning the recently enacted soldier vote bill which he has permitted to become law without his approval. In that message the President suggests some deficiencies in the measure which makes the law, in his judgment, inadequate, and he also calls on Congress for additional legislation to make it more effective. Now it happens that the additional legislation which the President calls for is exactly the same that I would favor and did favor several weeks ago. I would also like adequate provision made for permitting the soldiers to vote in the primary elections if other conditions make it possible. Ballots for the primary elections will be carried air mail, postage free, and every facility offered by the Federal Government within reasonable time limits to facilitate voting in the primaries. Appropriate cooperation on the part of every State is to be hoped for.

Again I may say to the House that Arizona by a special session of the legislature has cooperated by moving our primaries from September up to July. My State believes strongly in the States' rights ballot, and that idea includes a vote in the primaries. Now, we have in Arizona a petition system of nominations. Previously candidates must file their nomination petitions 60 days prior to the primary election. However, so anxious is Arizona to make it possible for our men and women in uniform to vote in the primaries as well as the general election, candidates must now file their nomination petitions not 60 days as previously but 90 days before the Arizona primaries. Arizona has long had the absentee ballot provision, and now, in addition to the steps already taken by the State, the Federal Government will transport the ballots by air at Federal expense and see to it that they are delivered both ways in time to be cast and counted. This is another matter of legislation which I had intended to ask for in case this latest soldier vote bill had been vetoed. Whichever Federal law—that of 1942 or of 1944—prevails, Arizona has done her duty toward making it possible for her citizens in uniform to vote.

Canadian Air Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, a very important step has been announced by our neighbor, Canada, in regard to the future of its air transportation.

According to the New York Times for Saturday, March 18, 1944, Minister of Munitions C. D. Howe, the Government spokesman on matters affecting air transportation in Canada, announced that:

> Steps would be taken to require railroads to divest themselves of ownership of air lines so that within 1 year from the end of the European war transport by air would be entirely separate from surface transportation.

Since this relationship between air and surface carriers is a matter in which we also are very much interested and upon which we must formulate a definite policy, I desire to include here, under leave to extend my remarks, an article from the New York Times.

It follows:

> OTTAWA, March 17.—Defining Canadian aims and interests in international air transport as calling for a liberal course of cooperation with other nations, Munitions Minister C. D. Howe today tabled in the House of Commons the Canadian tentative and preliminary draft of an international air-transport convention.

In brief, the proposals that the Canadian representatives will be authorized to support or initiate in international discussions, Mr. Howe said, will be as follows:

Establishment of an air-transport authority with effective powers, supported by all the Governments concerned, to further international cooperation and good will, insure that international air routes and services are divided fairly and equitably among all member nations, meet the needs of the peoples of the world for efficient transport, and contribute to the establishment and maintenance of a permanent system of general security.

Mr. Howe announced that steps would be taken to require railways to divest themselves of ownership of air lines so that within 1 year from the end of the European war transport by air would be entirely separate from surface transportation.

BUILDING PROGRAM NEEDED

Points stressed by Mr. Howe were that wartime developments would create no vested interest in air transport or air facilities in Canada for any other Governments; that Canada did not consider applications from air lines of another country unless forwarded by the Government of that country through diplomatic channels; that a vigorous airplane construction industry was an essential complement to Canada's post-war aviation plans.

Also that rivalries and disputes between nations and the establishment of uneconomic national services necessitating large subsidies had to be avoided; that each country had to decide for itself whether its companies operating international air services were to be privately or state owned, and whether there was to be one single national company or several, and that failure to devise a working system of cooperation and collaboration would lead to endless friction.

"I think," the Munitions Minister said, "that we must be prepared to subscribe to the granting of general freedom of transit for international air services on a universal basis so that national air service will automatically possess the right to cross the territory of other nations en route to their destinations and to land in other countries for refueling and reservicing without having to request the specific permission of each Government concerned.

"However, in order to prevent misuse of this freedom, it would appear necessary to grant to some international authority power to supervise the manner in which it is carried out."

IN POSITION TO HELP

In granting this freedom, countries like Canada, strategically placed athwart great traffic routes, would be making a great contribution to an effective international system, Mr. Howe observed.

"It would seem reasonable, therefore," he continued, "to suggest that freedom of air transit should be extended to cover as well a certain amount of freedom of carriage of goods and passengers in order to enable all nations to share in a proportion of the international traffic available without having to go in for all the bilateral bargaining which so confused the pre-war situation.

"It would seem necessary that each nation should at least possess the right to carry passengers and cargo from its own territory to other countries and to bring back from these other countries passengers and cargo which are intended for its own territory."

One provision suggested in the constitution of the international air transport assembly is that the number of votes each member state can cast will vary from 1 to 6, depending on its importance in international air transport. The board of 12 members must include at least 1 national of each of the 8 chief member states.

What a Fourth Term for Roosevelt Might Mean to American Freedom and Judicial Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, we hear much these days about the manipulations being handled by the palace brigade which has already started the 1944 Presidential campaign by launching its phoney fourth-term draft for President Roosevelt. Already the time-worn slogan "Don't change horses in the middle of a stream" is being worked overtime by radical left-wing theorists for whom precedent and tradition have no appeal except when they can be utilized to serve the selfish political ambitions of their little coterie of bureaucratic overlords.

Since the "don't change horses" slogan is being so vigorously emphasized by the "we must have him again" politicians, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be well to analyze just what is meant by the term "horse" in this connection. If the slogan sounders refer to some mortal man when they use the equestrian term, they are either ignorant of history or they are pleading for permanent one-man or one-family rule in this country fashioned after the royal houses of Europe. The stream of progress never stops, and if they now argue that we should keep the same horse under the same man sitting in the same saddle—sic—always, they argue for permanent tenure, whether it be conceived as a dictatorship, a royal monarchy, a hereditary ruling house, or some other form of imported European concept to replace the traditional American self-government.

IS THE CONSTITUTION THE "HORSE" THAT THEY MEAN?

However, if by the term "horse" is meant some gallant steed, such as the Constitution of the United States, or the Bill of Rights, or our American traditions of self-government and limited tenure in office, then Americans generally can agree that we should not "change horses in the middle of a stream." We should not indeed corrupt our Constitution, nullify our Bill of Rights, or destroy our American traditions of self-government and limited tenure in office during our progress through the stream of blood and sweat and tears called war nor during our travel across any other aspect of the perpetual stream of human progress. Perpetuity and permanency in the Executive office is not an American ideal, but the perpetuity and permanency of American institutions is a sacred ideal in this Republic. The election of President Roosevelt or any other mortal man to 16 consecutive years of tenure in the office of President would do violence to our American system and most dangerously provide for a "change of horses in midstream" by discarding the basis of our American way of free government in the middle of a war being fought to preserve it.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the committee for political action of the C. I. O., the officials of the Communist Party, the editors of PM and the Daily Worker, and others who are loudly calling for the election of President Roosevelt to a fourth term because we should not "change horses in midstream" would do well to consult a thesaurus or a lexicographer's code book to be sure they understand how the term "horse" is to be interpreted by the great bulk of American voters who have long been famous for their horse sense. There are growing indications that level-headed Americans have in mind that they will avoid "changing horses in midstream" by electing a Republican President in 1944 and thus continuing to keep in the tugs or under the saddle the real "horse" upon which the United States depends for motive power and a firm foundation in this and every other national crisis, namely, the Constitution of the United States and our traditional policies and principles of American self-government.

WHAT ANOTHER TERM OF ROOSEVELT MEANS TO THE COURTS

Mr. Speaker, much has been said and written about what the third term—to say nothing about the consequence of a possible fourth term—has done to reduce the independence and authority of our several States, to curtail the effective functioning of Congress, and to centralize in Washington bureaucrats economic and political functions formerly reserved for the individual or his local government. Grave as these consequences have been, however, an even more serious menace faces our courts of law and the whole functioning of freedom in this country should we have fastened upon us another 4 or 8 or 12 years of the same family rule.

It should be remembered that the last great safeguard of freemen is found in their free and independent courts in which justice should function without intimidation or interference or imposed interpretations by any higher human institution or individual. When the courts falter, freedom fails. In Germany Hitler told his courts to decide their cases on the basis of "the general sentiment prevailing in the communities" where his victims were being tried. Hitler then proceeded by the powers of propaganda over the radio and through the press, supplemented by the powers of patronage and purse, to see to it that "the sentiment prevailing in the communities" was always favorable, or at least amenable, to Hitler's point of view. Thus the German courts became mere nesting places for elderly members of the party's faithful where they could draw their pay and receive their pensions for writing into judicial decisions the party line and philosophical position conceived by Hitler and circulated by his great army of political appointees.

Mr. Speaker, if we were to have 4 more years of the Roosevelt regime in this country, undoubtedly well over 90 percent of all our Federal judges would be the personal appointees of a single individual. They would be chosen as those already selected have been chosen—on the basis of faithful service to the party and of abject devotion to the party line. They would represent a single point of view. The dangers of such a situation are so obvious and so far-reaching that just to record the fact is to reveal its tragic consequences.

Mr. Speaker, if every current argument for a fourth term for President Roosevelt were valid and such is far from being true, the very fact that another 4 years of the same regime in power would put our entire judicial system under the influence of a single individual is sufficient to merit the overwhelming defeat of any fourth-term effort. It seems inconceivable that a free Republic such as ours would voluntarily vote itself into the shackle-inviting situation which inevitably arises when a country loses its system of free and independent courts.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to a thought-provoking editorial appearing in the March 27 issue of Pathfinder magazine—said to be by many times over the most widely read publication printed in Washington, D. C. This editorial, entitled "The Roosevelt Judges," merits the careful consideration of the Congress and the country. When changing horses is being considered let us by no means change the tried and tested steed represented by an independent judiciary for a broken-down mare of European origin, which could neither walk nor move without waiting for the commands from a master to whom it has already listened too well and too long.

The editorial follows:

THE ROOSEVELT JUDGES

This is as good a time as any to ask two questions involving the caliber and fitness of the 185 judges and justices appointed to the Federal courts since 1932. There has been considerable gossip during the past 6 months about the growing dissension and acidulous language between the 9 Justices of the Supreme Court. Then, a few weeks ago, word began to get around that Randolph Paul, the "pinkish" general counsel of the Treasury Department, will probably be appointed to fill an expected vacancy on the bench for the southern district of New York. Finally, an unidentified young woman pinched a Congressman's backside during a tea party at the British Embassy the other day. She apologized, hurriedly. "I thought," she said, "you were a friend of mine in the Supreme Court."

These are three incidents in a nation's history. They are, you might say, exceedingly trivial stuff. In one way, yes. But look at them again. Federal judges are appointed for life. In their hands rest the decisions that rule our civil liberties. They are the senior guardians of national justice and law and the official interpreters of the Constitution.

What kind of men has President Roosevelt appointed to the Federal bench? The question is vital, for no other President ever appointed so many. To the United States Supreme Court he has named 7 out of 9 members; to the 56 circuit courts of appeals he has appointed 38 judges, and to the district courts he has named 140 out of 224. Of all the Federal judges he has chosen about 65 percent. Many of them were appointed because of political favor. Many are political candidates who failed to win public elections. There is no secret in the fact that the President expects personal loyalty from all of them.

Charles W. Smith, Jr., associate professor of political science, University of Kentucky, declared in the Kentucky Law Journal of May 1943 that Roosevelt's appointments to the Supreme Court "have been made with an eye on political considerations and on the social and economic views of the men appointed," and he pointed out that only one, Rutledge, had ever had any previous experience as judge of an important court. When in June 1936 the President appointed two Federal judges in New York to fill newly created positions, the independent New York Times identified them as supporters of "two local political bosses," and remarked: "It is painful to have to record that the President has again treated important appointments to the Federal courts as if they were ordinary partisan spoils." The city and county bar associations also made strong protests.

The assertion that the President "has viewed the courts as merely one part of the administrative machinery" was strikingly demonstrated in his court-packing effort of 1937 when he proposed to add to the Supreme Court six new judges who would, allegedly, move it out of its "horse and buggy" ways and make it a "puller" instead of a "balker" in the "three-horse team" of the Government branches. "We must take action," he said then, "to save the Constitution from the courts"—although he was also on record as saying that the Constitution was incomplete and always had been—"through which a team and horses can be driven on every page."

In its final report on the court-packing bill, the Senate Judiciary Committee declared it "an invasion of the judicial power such as has never before been attempted in this country," that it was a "proposal without precedent and without justification," and should be "so emphatically rejected that its parallel will never again be presented to the free representatives of the free American people."

Bottom in the President's court appointments was reached, according to Professor Smith, when he sent to the Senate in July 1942 the name of Thomas F. Meaney as district judge in New Jersey—a man whom Governor Edison dubbed "a pawn in the hands of the boss of Jersey City (Frank Hague)."

Such appointments naturally affect the tone and quality of our courts and the character of our Government. They, too, reach down through our traditions to the constitutional roots of the Republic. The Constitution defines the powers of the judiciary and, at the same time, appoints each generation of the judiciary to its council of guardians. As the New York Times so wisely said, "Those having the power to appoint (Federal judges) ought to be more than usually scrupulous and painstaking in leaving nothing undone which may redound to the repute and reverence in which the Federal judiciary ought to be held by the people."

Now, again, comes the rumor of Randolph Paul's coming appointment. And that rumor has not been denied.

In view of the record, one question might well be asked Mr. Roosevelt. It would be asked, not as an insult, not as a political move, but humbly and sincerely in the interests of the American Republic and the Republic's future. The question would be, "If you do not hold our courts and our Constitution in contempt, Mr. President, what is your attitude?"

Critical Manpower Shortage in the Fisheries Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein certain telegrams that I have received on the subject of the critical manpower shortage in the fisheries industry:

TILGHMAN, MD., March 31, 1944.

Judge OTIS BLAND,
Chairman, Marine Fisheries,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Appreciate anything you can do to have all-around fishermen and keymen in sea-food-producing plant put on critical list. Most young men, 18 to 30, in the industry have already enlisted in Coast Guard, Navy, and been drafted. What few young men are left are absolutely essential and needed to maintain sea-food products. We do not feel that there are more than 100 men left in Maryland between 18 and 26, who are fishing large pound nets, and keymen in sea-food-processing plants. Most pound-net rigs are owned by old men that obtained the services of all IV-F's and old men they can get. Each rig certainly needs 1 young man who is experienced and able to handle pound-net poles as long as 65 feet. Young men under 18 do not have the experience, old men not enough strength to do the job.

Respectfully yours,

DEPARTMENT OF TIDEWATER FISHERIES,
GEORGE T. HARRISON.

LUBEC, MAINE, March 30, 1944.

The Honorable S. O. BLAND,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Our industry has approximately 120 men 18 to 25 years of age. Approximately two-thirds of these 120 men are in IV-F; the remaining one-third have not been called due to dependents or occupational deferment. The industry has approximately 200 men ages 25 to 38. Approximately one-third of those are keymen who have been granted occupational deferment. Out of a total of 26 sardine canneries in Maine two were unable to operate the season of 1943 due to lack of manpower. I estimate if the keymen for the industry and those who have been granted occupational deferment are drafted this season, the production of Maine sardines, either through closing down of canneries or lessening capacity, will be reduced by 20 percent.

MAINE SARDINE PACKERS ASSOCIATION,
MILROY WARREN, President.

NORFOLK, VA., March 30, 1944.

HON. S. OTIS BLAND, Chairman,
Committee Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Manpower situation most critical among sea-food industry within this area. Production already subnormal because sufficient manpower not available to man fisheries processing plants, fish freezers, and primary distributing houses. United States Employment Agencies unable furnish additional men needed because shipyards defense projects, etc., seemingly have already absorbed all available men. Consequently the prospect of further skilled men being absorbed by draft is truly alarming because it would mean further decrease in supply of food fish, fish products, and fish oils, all of which are urgently needed. Although definite figures not available, believe number skilled men under 26 engaged in sea-food industry comparably small, perhaps less than 300 in critical key positions within State of Virginia. Considering volume produced and importance of sea-food as vitamin food, believe number men involved is small in comparison with any other food-producing industry. Feel sure you realize and will agree that the sea-food industry from standpoint of food production is equally vital and should be accorded identically the same consideration as farming.

Golden Gate International Airport

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. TOLAN
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include herein a powerful editorial from the Post-Enquirer, of Oakland, Calif., my congressional district.

Last August when I was home I personally inspected the proposed Golden Gate International Airport on the shallow tidelands of the Berkeley and Albany water front. It is an ideal location for an international airport and I am wholeheartedly in favor of it.

This editorial sets out facts which are unanswerable, for there is no question but what this Nation and the whole world is air-minded. The West needs such an international airport as is so fittingly described in this editorial from the Oakland Post-Enquirer:

IN THE COMING AIR AGE, OAKLAND AREA MUST BE WEST'S BIG AIR CENTER

Juan Trippe, president of the Pan-American Airways System, talked yesterday in the Hearst Greek Theater of the University of California on America in the coming air age.

If this preview of the world of tomorrow seems in some ways a rose-colored dream, remember that it is a dream based on the earthy realities and solid achievements of today.

Remember also that it is less of a dream than Henry Ford's prediction of a generation ago that America would soon be a nation on wheels—how the practical people of that day hooted at him for that. Among the conservative bankers it gained him the reputation of a dreamy, eccentric fellow, and a bit of a crackpot.

In his charter-day address Mr. Trippe told the story of how his ocean-spanning air clippers had blazed the trails from America to all the continents of the world. In air transportation that is already ancient history.

CHEAP, UNIVERSAL AIR TRAVEL

The first China Clipper cut to 7 days the travel time from California to Hong Kong. Steamer time was 21 days.

"But that achievement of 8 years ago will not meet the requirements of the post-war years ahead," says Mr. Trippe.

"Then you will again stand at the citadels of this western coast and watch new clippers take off to deliver their passengers, mail, and cargo to the Orient in 23 hours instead of 7 days. They will provide efficient, low-cost transportation over the trade routes of the world.

"The future is in the air. In the air age we are entering no American who works will find world travel beyond his means. His vacation in Europe or Asia will be lengthened by speed of transport, as well as enriched by lower travel costs. This is one—and not the least—of the stakes that the average American has in the development of aviation."

Five years ago there were 23,000 licensed civilian air pilots in the United States. Three years ago there were 100,000. Now the Army and Navy are training more than 100,000 skilled flyers every 12 months.

In 2 years the number of airports in the United States with concrete runways of 3,500 feet or more in length has increased 1,000 percent.

The new air age is not something in the remote future. We are entering it now, and with bewildering speed.

WORLD AIR CROSSROADS HERE

This metropolitan Oakland area, in the center of the western seaboard and not off in a corner, should be the great crossroad of air transportation in the Pacific world.

If we make intelligent, courageous use of our advantages and opportunities, it will be.

But there is no time for endless talking. There is no time for bickering—for the airing of little provincial and intercity jealousies. Other cities are acting, and acting fast.

There is a proposal for the development of a great central airport, to be called the Golden Gate international airport, on the shallow tidelands of the Berkeley and Albany water fronts. Its estimated cost would be $20,000,000. It would be planned and built for the needs of tomorrow, as well as of today.

The plan has been endorsed by many of the most distinguished and responsible leaders of the community, of the armed forces, and of the aviation world. It is a challenging proposal that should interest every intelligent person awake to the realities of the world of today and tomorrow.

At the same time the continuing progress of Oakland's great municipal airport is being pressed. It remains the great air center of the west coast, with a wealth of aviation history and prestige behind it.

The Civil Aeronautics Administration has granted it a new appropriation of $1,400,000, the largest given in the West since the war began. That is a recognition of its intrinsic importance.

Its runways are being strengthened and lengthened to handle aircraft weighing up to 210,000 pounds. An instrument landing system is being completed to keep the airport open in all kinds of weather. Many other big improvements are coming up.

MORE THAN ONE AIRPORT NEEDED

And yet, the total investment in the Oakland Municipal Airport has not yet reached $10,000,000. It is the second biggest in the Nation; the biggest, the Idlewild Airport of New York, cost $165,000,000.

In the new air age into which we are now entering we will need more than one great airport if we are going to be the real air transportation center of the West, if we are going to be more than a way station of the air routes.

This is important to this city. We need to think about it. We need to act on it. Juan Trippe's charter-day speech should help us to do both.

American Aviation Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at a luncheon on Air Cargo Transport sponsored by Detroit Board of Commerce and Wayne University, under the Edward S. Evans grant for air cargo research, Thursday afternoon, March 23, 1944, Book Cadillac Hotel, Detroit, Mich.:

For years the Englishman proudly said, "Britannia rules the waves," and in doing so gave expression to the fact that British seapower, as manifested in her mighty Navy and merchant marine, made possible the world-wide, closely knit British Empire and its commanding position in world affairs.

It is my fond hope and sincere belief that in the days that lie ahead after the conclusion of the present horrible war, people the world over will say "America rules the air." Not that I want this rulership to be expressed in mighty fleets of passenger and cargo airplanes hogging world-wide civil aviation; not that I want this rulership to be expressed in mighty armadas of battle planes capable of enforcing the political opinions and demands of the American people wherever they may be challenged on this globe.

On the contrary, when we can truly say "America rules the air," I want it to mean that she does so in behalf of the ideals of democracy for which this country was born and for which it is now so lavishly pouring out its blood and treasures for freedom, equality, and security for men within every nation everywhere.

To these ends let there be the keenest rivalry and competition between America and other nations of the world for leadership in the air just as there is and should be the keenest rivalry and competition between Michigan and Detroit in the race for State and city air leadership over the other States and cities of the United States.

I cannot tell such a gathering as this anything about the technical aspects of aeronautics. The members of the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Civil Aeronautics Administration, the Michigan Aeronautics Commission, the executives of the air lines who have been doing an almost miraculous job in their wartime activities and services, and many others, some of whom are here today, can advise you far better than I in the manner in which Detroit, Mich., and the country can go about obtaining the kind of air leadership which I have in mind.

Likewise, the experience and glorious achievements of our airmen of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, are an invaluable contribution to the progress of all aviation.

My role in the cause as a Representative from Michigan is that, consistent with my obligations to my country first, and then to Michigan and Detroit, I pass such judgment on the aeronautical bills introduced in the Federal Congress as will be most conducive to the realization of the kind of air leadership which I visualize and believe in for my country—locally, nationally, and internationally.

The airplane is increasingly becoming a potential instrument for world domination.

If, after this war, it is developed and used for such domination by an aggressor nation or a group of aggressor nations which, like the Axis Powers, would enslave all peoples and steal or control all things for their own selfish ambitions, such rule will be one of terror, and civilization as we know it and love it may indeed go down to destruction.

God forbid that this shall ever happen. To prevent it from happening I shall think and plan at all times to speed the day when America rules the air, not in a narrow, selfish way, not alone and unaided, but with the help of all our allies in the present ruthless conflict.

Such rulership of the air will in reality be leadership, leadership toward a better world. Undoubtedly that concept can be accepted and cherished by the leaders and peoples of all nations who surely must know, on the plain evidence of facts, that in the foreign relations of America ours is a sincerely good-neighbor policy in a community of the world.

Ninety years ago, a half-century before the Wright brothers launched their frail craft at Kitty Hawk, Alfred Lord Tennyson expressed this thought in his poem, Locksley Hall:

"For I dipt into the future,
Far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world,
And all the wonder that would be;
Saw the heavens fill with commerce,
Argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight,
Dropping down with costly bales;
Heard the heavens fill with shouting,
And there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies
Grappling in the central blue;
Far along the world-wide whisper
Of the south-wind rushing warm,
With the standards of the peoples,
Plunging thro' the thunder-storm;
Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer,
And the battle-flags were furl'd
In the Parliament of man,
The Federation of the world."

An Old-Age Pension Eliminating All Red Tape

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL STEWART
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, the time has come when we should give due consideration to the matter of equalization and simplification of old-age assistance payments under the Social Security Act. Our old people deserve this consideration and are looking to the Congress to end the confusion and restrictions imposed upon them by the administration of the old-age assistance set-up.

It is my contention that, under the provisions of House bill 4545, which I have just introduced, the matter of payments to our old people will be simplified and clarified to such an extent that administration thereof will be made much easier and the work expedited, and the people who have suffered abuses under the present system will be freed from abuses in the future.

Mr. Speaker, only two requirements should exist as to the eligibility of a person to become a recipient of old-age assistance. One of these is United States citizenship, and that is indeed an important one. The other is the age requirement.

All other provisions or restrictions which are or might be imposed on eligibles for old-age assistance are needless and not in conformity with good business practices, nor for the best interests of the recipients. All other requirements and restrictions are wholly unnecessary and only serve to use money in this fund to employ entirely too great a staff of workers, which money, by rights, belongs to the old people.

Mr. Speaker, my bill is simple and understandable, and I earnestly hope the House will take speedy and favorable action on it. Surely we owe it to the old folks to end the confusion existing in the old-age assistance set-up, and let us free them forever from the bureaucratic red tape from which they have so long been suffering. In other words, under H. R. 4545 the old people would have a pension in lieu of old-age assistance. The bill is as follows:

A bill to equalize State old-age assistance payments under the Social Security Act

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law, no payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury to any State under title I of the Social Security Act, as amended, unless the State plan for old-age assistance provides that the only limitations with respect to eligibility for old-age assistance are (1) an age requirement of 65 years or more, (2) United States citizenship, and (3) a residence requirement complying with the provisions of such title I. Such old-age assistance payments within such State shall be equal in amount for every person eligible therefor, and shall be made by check to be received by every eligible person at his or her post-office address on the first day of each calendar month.

The American Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include therein a splendid, timely, and appropriate radio address recently made by Hon. John E. Kerrigan, president of the City Council of Boston, Mass., speaking on a Brotherhood Week program over Station WMEX, Boston, Mass.

We have no place in America for bigotry in any form.

The Constitution of the United States of America is the consummation of all the centuries of man's dreams to be free—to be free in mind, to be free in body, to be free in soul. However, that Constitution would have been powerless to build this mighty Nation if the Bill of Rights had not been added to it. It is in the Bill of Rights that we find the finest expression of all of our liberties.

The most important provisions of the Bill of Rights are to be found in the first of the 10 articles. The first article was put first because it is the most important of them all. Take away from free government freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of speech, and no freedoms at all will be left. All that will be left will be a golden opportunity for tyrants and organized mobs to trample upon every human right and to reduce mankind to brutal slavery. So long as the press, speech, and religion are free America will be strong enough to resist any native or foreign dangers that may challenge them.

It wasn't by accident that freedom of religion was the first freedom to be mentioned even before the mention of freedom of the press and freedom of speech. These men who drew up this document were God-fearing men. They knew that man's most sacred possession is his conscience. They knew that into his soul has been breathed the majesty of God himself. They knew that whoever trifles with it, whoever plots to stifle, to crush, or to persecute it throws his foul hands into the ve· face of God. They knew that its substance is not material. They knew that this substance is divine. They knew that it is incapable of destruction. You may disease man's body, you may strangle, twist, and cripple his mortal frame, and you may destroy his very life, but you cannot destroy his conscience. Churches have been burned to ashes, religions have been oppressed, men and women have become martyrs of their faith, but after every succeeding outrage the church has grown stronger, religion has become more widely accepted, and the conscience of man—the will of God—has taken a more commanding place in the molding of civilization. Prejudice, hate, persecution, and wars have temporarily halted the onward march of civilization, but the halt has been only temporary; and when man has again emerged from the chaos into which these assaults have hurled him, he has taken on a higher nobility and he has dedicated himself more actively to the practices of tolerance, of justice, of peace, and of brotherly love.

The brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God have always been, and always will be, trumpet calls that will summon righteous men to action when attempts are made to divide our people and to overthrow our Government through the instruments of hate, bigotry, and prejudice. One week ago tonight St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City, the foremost Catholic cathedral in America, was desecrated. Impious hands painted the outside walls of this temple of God with red paint, and then, displaying their cowardly nature, those who did this disgraceful act slunk away into the darkness of the night. On that same night several Protestant churches were outraged and violated by a band of religious bigots. A few nights before a score of Jewish synagogs of that same city were pelted with sticks and stones. These scenes were not new when they occurred last week in New York City. They have been enacted repeatedly in many other large cities of the country.

You cannot run away from the truth without running into the face of danger. You cannot cure an evil by ignoring it. You cannot safeguard the Bill of Rights by leaving it to be defied and defiled by those who are its sworn enemies. Freedom of religion cannot be guaranteed to any man while it is openly and secretly attacked.

There are mad currents of bigotry in America. Tongues of hate and prejudice are spreading many vicious and un-American doctrines. These truths are known to all persons who will open their eyes and their ears. Many well-meaning citizens, admitting that these evils prevail, dismiss them with a careless gesture and declare that they are too petty for serious thought. Therefore, I would remind these well-meaning citizens that one rotten apple can ruin the entire barrel; one small germ can bring death to the entire human body; and one spark of prejudice can set the entire Nation on fire and bring to America the cruel wars of religious persecution that have ravaged nearly every nation of Europe and Asia for more than 1,500 years.

You cannot have peace in other parts of the world unless first you have peace at home. You cannot free the other parts of the world from the injustices that bring on wars unless you first free America from these injustices. These self-evident truths are known to the President of the United States, the Governor of this Commonwealth, and the mayor of the city of Boston. That is why they have joined with this committee on Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish faiths in setting this week apart to be known as a week of brotherhood. All of these responsible people know that grave errors of thinking and acting are present in American life. They have fears that these actions and this thinking may lead to the same discords and strifes that have followed such actions and thinking in every nation where they have occurred since the beginning of time. And so while they look upon this week as one of dedication to the spirit of brotherhood, they also call upon their fellow citizens to arm themselves with the intellectual forces that are needed to penetrate into the dark places where bigotry is generated and from which these dangerous blows are directed at our Government and at our churches.

In joining in this movement of brotherhood I am conscious of the fact that I am privileged to ally myself to the holiest cause to which a free people can be called. It is a cause that did not begin yesterday. It was inaugurated at the time when this Nation was born. If it ever dies America will die. But it will never die. When the necessity demands, the American people will not be found sleeping. Now and in the future, as it was in the beginning, when this Nation was born, when the Bill of Rights needs their defense and protection we know where the American people will be standing. They will be standing at the temples of God. They will say to all men and women of this land, enter into those temples. Enter into them in peace. Enter into them with the full assurance that so long as America is firm and steadfast, freedom of religion will not be denied to any man, the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God will prevail. This Nation will be preserved in all of its original glory. God is in His Heaven, and the American Bill of Rights is in His safe and secure keeping.

Rural Electrification—Statement of the R. E. A. Concerning Remarks of Hon. Lyle H. Boren, Printed in the Congressional Record of March 2, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, April 1, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on March 2, 1944, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement covering seven and one-third pages attacking the Rural Electrification Administration.

That statement contains so many fallacies and received such widespread comment by those interests that were continuously opposing and attempting to handicap and destroy our rural-electrification program, that Hon. Vincent D. Nicholson, Deputy Administrator and Associate Solicitor of the Rural Electrification Administration, has prepared an answer, which I am inserting as a part of these remarks.

Our rural-electrification program has been the greatest blessing the farmers of this country have ever known. It has brought the greatest good to the greatest number, provided the farmers with the comforts and conveniences of life they never knew before, and lifted from the farm men and women the burdens of drudgery under which they have struggled throughout the centuries.

To those of us who have carried on this battle for rural electrification and for its extension to every farm home in America, so as to provide electricity at rates the farmers can afford to pay, it is alarming to see these attacks made by a Member of Congress, and given widespread circulation through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

For that reason I am inserting Mr. Nicholson's reply, which I hope every Member of Congress will take the time to read. I wish it were possible to send a copy to every farmer in America.

We are not going to permit our rural-electrification program to be discredited or destroyed by propaganda of this kind.

We have started in to electrify every farm home in America at rates the farmers can afford to pay. We are making progress undreamed of by the most enthusiastic advocates of rural electrification when we began.

This program is not a financial burden to the Federal Government. Every dollar of this money will be paid back with interest, every farming community will be made richer, and every farm home reached will be made brighter as a result of this very program, which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] has seen fit to attack.

He talks about the farmers being robbed by this program. No such complaint has ever come from the farmers themselves, but such insinuations are constantly coming from those private utilities that have fought rural electrification from the beginning.

As a matter of fact, the farmers own and control these cooperative associations themselves. Is it robbery of the farmer for the Rural Electrification Administration to advance these cooperatives money to build lines and supply their homes with electricity, and to render them every assistance possible in working out their program?

Is it robbery of the farmer to make it possible for him and his wife and children to enjoy the comforts and conveniences available to the city dweller, without the noise and city taxes?

No, Mr. Speaker, this program has never robbed the farmer, except to take away from him and his family the dreariness and drudgery that in many instances have made farm life almost unbearable, and to bring into their homes light, and life, and hope and inspiration, comforts and conveniences, and relief from drudgery that really makes farm life worth living.

Mr. Nicholson's reply to Mr. BOREN follows:

STATEMENT OF THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION CONCERNING REMARKS OF HON. LYLE H. BOREN, PRINTED IN THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD OF MARCH 2, 1944

This statement of Mr. BOREN, Member of Congress from Oklahoma, was presented to the House Subcommittee on Department of Agriculture Appropriations in the form of a 33-page document. It was printed as an extension of remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix, page A1022.

It appears that Mr. BOREN is under many misapprehensions concerning the character, scope, purposes, and results of the limited R. E. A. financing of acquisitions of electric properties by cooperatives. He has indicated a strong interest in the R. E. A. program and we are sure that he will be glad to be reassured that things are going well in R. E. A. and that there has been no change of policies or purposes.

The following statement is a dispassionate, factual examination of the many issues raised. We shall not engage in an elaborate discussion of the charges that the administration of R. E. A. represents "government by the worst of men," that is "nothing more than a conspiracy to capture rural America and perpetuate it in economic serfdom," and the considerable number of other expressions challenging the motives and the personal integrity of members of the Rural Electrification Administration and the Solicitor's Office of the Department. However, we cannot idly ignore such utterances, formally made to a committee of Congress and we wish to record at the outset of this statement a complete and vigorous denial of each and every one of these accusations.

At the outset of the following statement we present a summary of the major issues raised by Mr. BOREN and the relevant facts as we know them and interpret them. This summary is followed by a complete, detailed discussion of Mr. BOREN's statement, page by page.

1. The charge that R. E. A. has been using its loan funds improperly in financing the acquisition by cooperatives of certain electric facilities in towns and small cities. The legal questions are fully discussed in the opinion of the Solicitor dated November 24, 1942, which was filed by Mr. BOREN with his statement, and there would seem to be no need for any extensive argument here by way of repetition. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves largely to a discussion of questions of fact and policy.

At the outset it is important to emphasize that each acquisition financed by R. E. A. (comprising approximately 4 percent of all R. E. A. loans) has been for the purpose of enabling the borrowing cooperative to reach a considerable and significant number of unserved persons in rural areas who could not be served feasibly except through the means of the acquisition, and therefore the loan was in accord with the legal position taken by the Solicitor and the Comptroller General. It is true, as Mr. BOREN states, that some of these acquired facilities have been in small urban communities. With respect to such communities, a study of our records, made this week, indicates that there have been only a few towns or small cities having populations of more than 1,500—most of them under 2,000, and the largest approximately 3,500. In every instance, however, the acquisition was incidental and contributory to the sole purpose of making possible more extensive service to unserved persons in rural areas. In each case the system acquired was not an "urban" system as that term is usually used in the utility industry, but was a system which fitted into the rural economy and was essential to an optimum program of rural electrification in the area.

In the construction of certain small privately owned systems the rural areas were largely ignored and the power company lines "jump" from town to town picking up only the areas of greater consumer density. To accomplish adequate coverage of such unserved rural areas, an acquisition of the existing facilities by the cooperative has been necessary. These facilities, in most instances, have had to be acquired in their entirety or not at all and from the standpoints of engineering and economics it was necessary to incorporate all of the acquired properties in the combined cooperative system. By this term "combined cooperative system" we have reference to an adequate integrated system consisting of the lines already owned by the cooperative, the lines acquired, and the new lines to reach unserved persons made possible by the acquisition.

2. The charge that acquisitions of existing facilities are being imposed upon electric cooperatives against their wishes and interest and for the benefit of utility holding companies. The facts are that there has been a strong and widespread farmer demand throughout the country for this type of R. E. A assistance. In many cases the acquisition has been fought for aggressively by the cooperatives and their farmer members against the vigorous opposition of the utility industry. This opposition has expressed itself in proceedings before Federal and State regulatory bodies, the public press, in publications of the industry, and in other forms of propaganda. The companies that oppose these acquisitions are frequently the same companies that have opposed every aspect of the R. E. A. program and have tried to destroy or cripple the efforts of farmers to serve themselves with electricity. These acquisitions, as we shall indicate later in more detail, have resulted in strengthening the cooperatives, rendering them more capable of serving unserved areas, and improving their financial position.

The opposition has not, in any instance, come from the farmers. It has been chiefly of two kinds. In some instances, it has been on the part of private interests which sought to purchase the facilities in question, usually after the cooperative had commenced negotiations. This was the situation in the Oklahoma case referred to by Mr. BOREN and discussed later in this statement. In other instances, the opposition has been on the part of companies which had no desire to purchase the properties in question or to serve the unserved areas which the selling company had failed to serve. Typical of such a situation was the Sho-Me case in Missouri, also refered to by Mr. BOREN and discussed later in this statement.

3. The charge that the financing of acquisitions is a radical change in R. E. A. policy. The facts are that R. E. A. financing of acquisitions has shown no significant variation during the past 6 years, except for fiscal year 1942, as indicated by the following table:

Loan allotments for acquisitions

Fiscal year:
1937	$77,289.72
1938	43,515.75
1939	2,787,960.46
1940	1,825,849.37
1941	3,009,217.72
1942	8,697,892.64
1943	1,858,659.05
1944 up to February 29	3,027,338.26

It should be noted that these properties must be purchased, if at all, when they are on the market and the divestiture orders of the Securities and Exchange Commission have necessarily affected the timing of these cooperative acquisitions. This explains the bulge in the allotments in the fiscal year 1942, when several such acquisitions of considerable size happened to develop at that time. The above table shows that acquisition loans in the fiscal year 1939 were considerably greater than in fiscal 1943.

R. E. A. loans for the purchase price of acquired facilities have been about 4 percent of total loans throughout the entire R. E. A. program. It is true, of course, that such transactions now constitute a greater percentage of current loans than was the case before the war, but this is only because of war conditions affecting new construction and not because of any change in R. E. A. policy.

4. The charge that acquisitions are imposing upon the cooperatives a burden of debt that has adversely affected their financial position. The facts are that these acquisitions, in addition to the primary purpose of enabling the cooperatives to reach unserved persons in rural areas, have greatly improved their financial position. We have made exhaustive studies of each acquisition costing more than $50,000, in instances where we could compare the cooperative's financial condition 1 year before the acquisition with the financial condition 1 year after the acquisition. The following table, taken from these studies, gives the ratio of net earnings to total indebtedness in the case of every such cooperative. In practically every instance the financial condition was improved as a result of the acquisition, and in more than half of the cases this improvement was marked and considerable. In many instances, cooperatives which showed a net operating loss a year before the acquisition showed net earnings 1 year after the acquisition sufficient for successful operation, including provision for the current debt service. In certain instances, as a direct result of the acquisition, the cooperatives were able to earn the maximum debt service several years before such maximum payments were required.

The following table represents situations where the operating experience is for 6-month periods only:

Rural Electrification Administration project designation	Percentage of net operating income to total indebtedness
	6 months before	6 months after
Colorado 29	0.3	0.8
Florida 29	.4	2.6
Ohio 31	2.4	2.8
Ohio 39	1.9	2.3
Ohio 68	.7	2.2
Ohio 87	1.5	2.9

The studies also showed, in almost every case, that the indebtedness per consumer has been substantially reduced, the operating ratio has been reduced, and the average revenue per mile, average number of consumers per mile, and average kilowatt-hour consumption per consumer have been greatly increased.

5. The charge that R. E. A. is financing the purchase of "obsolete and junk-pile properties" at inflated values. This charge is answered in part by the discussion under the preceding point 4. We desire to record an emphatic denial of any such practice, but it would be quite impracticable in this statement to enter upon any exhaustive presentation of data.

The R. E. A. acquisition in Oklahoma, discussed at length by Mr. BOREN, has an interesting relevance to this charge. It would seem obvious that the cooperative in this instance did not purchase a poor property at an inflated price. The Oklahoma Gas and Electric Co., which offered $13,000 more than the cooperative paid, is one of the most successful operating companies in the country, and it can be assumed that the cooperative made a good bargain and a good business decision.
